HISTORY CRITICAL AND BIOGRAPHI-CAL OF AUTHORS IN THE ENGLISH TONGUE FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TILL THE PRESENT DAY, WITH SPECI-MENS OF THEIR WRITINGS 20 20 20

VOLUME III.

LONDON 20 20 20 AND 20 20 EDINBURGH

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED

ENVOY

The New Edition of the Cyclopædia of English Literature is completed by the issue of a third volume little over two years after the appearance of the first. The first volume carried the history down to near, the close of the seventeenth century, the second was mainly devoted to the men and women of the eighteenth. The third volume commences with the group of great writers who had begun their work in the eighteenth century, but were destined to be the glory of early nineteenth century, letters, and, refusing to attempt a hard and fast line between nineteenth and twentieth, essays to bring down the story to the present time and include—under obvious limitations and conditions—the writers of the day

In a work of this kind—which is essentially a history—it would be out of place, even if it were possible, to attempt to deal with contemporaries as has been done with the men of the past, and the limits of the volume debar it from allotting to the incalculably more numerous writers of the present day—whose best work, it may be, is not yet given to the world—the same amount of illustrative quotation as has been conceded to the older writers By favour of a few of the most eminent living authors. we are permitted to illustrate the brief articles on them with quotations from their choicest work. But in the case of the great majority of quite recent and living authors, it has been inevitable that the Cyclopædia should limit its scope to giving the essential biographical and bibliographical facts demanded in a work of reference, and for the rest to refer to their books, which are even now passing from hand to hand, and are to be found in And of even the ablest of the younger writers of the day, by far the larger number are, along with some older authors not fully in the main currents of national literature, commemorated only by a brief paragraph in a complementary list of British authors—an earnest surely that erelong an additional or supplementary volume may be required to give more adequate treatment than is here possible to those with whom lies the nearer future of British letters. In such a volume some account of the several Celtic literatures of the British Isles, and their chief ornaments, might well find a place.

The limitations of space and detail in regard to recent writers must obviously press more closely on the younger branches—on the literature of the United States and of the British dominions beyond the seas. And it may be anticipated that in any future supplement to this work the contributions of Greater Britain in the wider sense will occupy a space proportionately much larger than in the century which saw the daughter literatures arise—for the story of American national literature may fairly be said to begin with the century so recently closed. And therefore it has been found advantageous to give here, and not in an earlier volume, a brief history of the origins of American literature, yet of the authors separately treated there are only three who did not at least live into the nineteenth century. As in the corresponding British one, the complementary list of American authors is selective, suggesting rather than 'expressing multitude,' and does not pretend to be in any sense complete or exhaustive

The Editor and Publishers have again to thank the distinguished men—whose names will be found appended to their articles—who have contributed the large body of critical work to which this volume owes its main interest and value.

They have further to thank Lord Tennyson for revising the article on his father, and for choosing the selections to be here presented in illustration of it. Mr Barrett Browning for his co-operation with the writer of the article on his father and mother, Mr Watts-Dunton for invaluable advice

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

The Renascence of Wonder in Poetry.

AD the great change in the poetry of the end of the eight-eenth century and the begin in the poetry of the nineteenth been a revolution of artistic methods merely, it would still have been the most important change in the history of English literature. But it affected the very soul of poetry. It had two sides one side concerned that of poetic methods, and one that of poetic energy. It was partly realistic as seen in Wordsworth's portion of the Lyrical Ballads, and partly imaginative as seen in Coleridge's portion of that incongruous but epochmaking book. As the movement substituted for the didactic materialism of the eighteenth century a new temper-or, rather, the revival of an old temper which to all appearance was dead-it has been called the Romantic Revival. The French Revolution is generally credited, by French writers at least, with having been the prime factor in this change. Now, beyond doubt, the French Revolution, the mightiest social convulsion recorded in the history of the world, was accompanied in France by such romantic poetry as that of André Chénier, and was followed, many years afterwards, by the work of writers like

Dumas, Victor Hugo, and others, until at last the bastard classicism of the age of Louis XIV was entirely overthrown In Germany, too, the French Revolution stimulated the poetry of Goethe and Schiller, and the prose of Novalis, Tieck, and F Schlegel. And in England it stimulated, though it did not originate, the romanticism of Scott, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Byron, Shelley, and But in this as in so many matters, while other countries have had the credit of taking the lead in the great human march, the English race has really been in the van. Just as Cromwell and Washington preceded and were perhaps the main cause of Mirabeau and Danton, so Chatterton, Burns, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, Keats, and Byron preceded and were the cause of the romantic furore in France which, later on, was decided by the great battle of Hernam As the storm-wind is the cause and not the effect of the mighty billows at sea, so the movement in question was the cause and not the effect of the French, Revolution. It was nothing less than a great revived movement of the soul of man, after a long period of prosaic acceptance in all things, including literature and art. To this revival the present writer, in the introduction to an imaginative work dealing with this movement, has already is the incongruity of some departure from the laws of convention, in the case of absolute humour it is the incongruity of some departure from the normal as fixed by Nature herself In other words, while relative humour laughs at the breach of the conventional laws of man and the symmetry of the social pyramid of the country and the timewhich laws and which symmetry it accepts as final -absolute humour sees the incongruity of these conventional laws and this pyramid with the absolute sanction of Nature's own harmony follows that in trying to estimate the value of any age's humour, the first thing to consider is how it stands in regard to absolute humour and how it stands in regard to relative humour. Was there more absolute humour in the age of wonder than in the age of acceptance?

On the vhole, the answer must be, we think, in the affirmative. Chaucer's humour was more closel, related to absolute humour than any kind of humour in English poetry which followed it until we get to the greatest absolute humourist in English poetry, Burns

The period of wonder in English poetry may perhaps be said to have ended with Milton. For Milton, although born only twenty three years before the first of the great poets of acceptance, Dryden, belongs properly to the period of romantic He has no relation whatever to the poetry of Augustanism which followed Dryden, and which Dryden received partly from France and partly from certain contemporaries of the great romantic dramatists themselves, headed by Ben Jonson From the moment when Augustanism really began -in the latter decades of the seventeenth century -the periwig poetry of Dryden and Pope crushed out all the natural singing of the true poets the periving poets became too 'polite' to be natural As acceptance is, of course, the parent of Augustanism or gentility, the most genteel character in the world is a Chinese mandarin, to whom everything is vulgar that contradicts the symmetry of the pyramid of Cathav. It was, notwithstanding certain parts of Virgil's work, the temper of Rome in the time of Horace as much as it was the temper of England in the time of Pope, Congreve, and Addison, and of France at that period when the blight of gentility did as much as it could to poison the splendid genius of Corneille and of Moliere. In Greek literature the genteel finds no place, and it is quite proper that its birth should have been among a people so comparatively vulgar as the Romans of the Empire. A Greek Horace would have been as much an impossibility as a Greek Racine or a Greek Pope. When English writers in the eighteenth century tried to touch that old chord of wonder whose vibrations, as we have above suggested, were the first movement in the development of man, it was not in poetry but in prose.

Yet there was no more interesting period of English history than that in which Milton and Dryden lived—the period when the social pyramid of England was assaulted but not overturned, nor even seriously damaged, by the great Rebellion This Augustan pyramid of ours had all the symmetry which Blackstone so much admired in the English constitution and its laws, and when, afterwards, the American colonies came to revolt and set up a pyramid of their own, it was on the Blackstonian model. At the basepatient as the tortoise beneath the elephant in the Indian cosmogony—was the people, born to be the base and born for nothing else ing on this foundation were the middle classes in their various strata, each stratum sharply marked off from the others. Then above these was the strictly genteel class, the patriciate, picturesque and elegant in dress if in nothing else, whose privileges were theirs as a matter of right. Above the patriciate was the earthly source of gentility, the monarch, who would, no doubt, have been the very apex of the sacred structure save that a little - 1 very little-above him sat God, the suzerain to whom the prayers even of the monarch himself were addressed. The leaders of the Rebellion had certainly done a daring thing, and an original thing, by striking off the apex of this pyramid, and it might reasonably have been expected that the building itself would collapse and crumble away. But it did nothing of the kind. It was simply a pyramid with the apex cut off-a structure to serve afterwards as a model of the American and French pyramids, both of which, though aspiring to be original structures, are really built on exactly the same scheme of hereditary honour and dishonour as that upon which the pyramids of Nineveh and Babylon were no doubt built. Then came the Restoration the apex was restored the structure was again complete, it was, indeed, more solid than ever-stronger than ever Subject to the exception of certain great and glorious prose writers of that period, the incongruity which struck the humourist as laughable was incongruity not with the order of nature and the elemental laws of man's mind, but with the order of the Augustan It required the genius of a Swift in England, as it required in France the genius of a Molière, to produce absolute humour In Fielding, to be sure (notably in Joseph Andrews), and sometimes in Addison, as in the famous scene of Sir Roger at church, and in the less-known but equally fine description of the Tory squire in The Freeholder, we do sometimes get it, but in poetry very rarely

As to the old romantic temper which had in spired Spenser's Faeric Queene, Marlowe's Faustus, Shalespeare's Hamlet, that was dead and gone—seemed dead and gone for ever. In order to realise how the instinct of wonder had been wiped out of English poetry we have only to turn to Dryden's modernisation of Chaucer, his translations from Virgil, Boccaccio, and others, of so complex an epoch as those of the twentieth century

Poetic art had come to consist in clever manipulations of the stock conventional language common to all writers alike-the language of poetry had become so utterly artificial, so entirely removed from the language in which the soul of man would naturally express its emotions, that poetry must die out altogether unless some kind of reaction should set in Roughly speaking, from the appearance of the last of Milton's poetry to the publication of Parnell's Night-piece, the business of the poet was not to represent Nature, but to decorate her and then work himself up into as much rapture as gentility would allow over the decorations Not that Parnell got free from the Augustan vices, but partially free he did get at last. Among much that is tawdry and false in his earlier poems, the lines describing the osier-banded graves, given in the notice of Parnell in Volume II of this work, might have been written at the same time as Wordsworth's Excursion so far as truthful representation of Nature is concerned. Then came Thomson's Seasons and showed that the worst was over If we consider that his Winter appeared as early as 1726, and Summer and Spring in 1727 and 1728, and if we consider the intimate and first-hand knowledge Thomson shows of Nature in so many of her moods in the British Islands, it is not difficult to find his place in English poetry No doubt his love of Nature was restricted to Nature in her gentle and even her homely moods He could describe as 'horrid' that same Penmaenmawr which to the lover of Wales is so fascinating Still, from this time a new life was breathed into English poetry the new growth was slow Take the case of Gray, for instance. Not even the Chinese mandarin above described was more genteel than Gray him we get the very quintessence of the Augustan Yet no one who reads his letters can doubt that Nature had endowed him with a true eye for local colour And although Gray was not strong enough to throw off the conventional diction of his time, he was yet strong enough to speak to us sometimes through the muffler of that diction with a voice that thrills the ears of those who have listened to the song of Coleridge, Keats, and Shelley As the present writer has said on the occasion above mentioned, his chief poem, the famous elegy, furnishes a striking proof of the poet's slavery to Augustanism While reading about 'the solemn yew-tree's shade,' 'the ivymantled tower,' and the rest of the conventional accessories of such a situation, the reader yearns for such concrete pictures as we get in plenty not only in Wordsworth and those who succeeded him, but even in Parnell and Thomson. Noble as this poem is, it has a fundamental fault-a fault which is great—it lacks individual humanity Who is the 'me' of the poem—this 'me' to whom, in company with 'Darkness,' the homeward-plodding ploughman 'leaves the world'? The thoughts are fine, but is the thinker a moralising ghost among the tombstones, or is he a flesh-trammelled philosopher sitting upon the churchyard wall? The poem rolls on sonorously, and the reader's imagination yearns for a stanza full of picture and pathetic suggestion of individual life—full of those bewitching qualities, in short, which are the characteristics of all English poetry save that of the era of acceptance, the era of gentility-the Augustan era. At last, however, the poet does strike out a stanza of this kind, and immediately it sheds a warmth and a glow upon all that has gone before-vitalises the whole, in short. Describing the tomb of the hitherto shadowy moraliser, Gray says

There scattered oft, the earliest of the year,
By hands unseen, are showers of violets found,
The redbreast loves to build and warble there,
And little footsteps lightly print the ground

Now at last we see that the moraliser is not a spectre-whose bones are marrowless and whose blood is cold, but a man, the homely creature that Homer and Shakespeare loved to paint, a man with friends to scatter violets over his grave and little children to come and mourn by it, a man so tender, genial, and good that the very redbreasts loved him And having written this beautiful stanza, full of the true romantic temper, having printed it in two editions, Gray cancelled it, and no doubt the age of acceptance and gentility approved the omission. For what are children and violets and robins warbling round a grave compared with 'the muse's flame' and 'the ecstasy' of the 'living lyre,' and such elegant things?

And again, who had a finer imagination than Collins? Who possessed more fully than he the imaginative power of seeing a man asleep on a loose hanging rock, and of actualising in a dramatic way the peril of the situation? But there is something very ungenteel about a mere man, as Augustanism had discovered. A man is a very homely and common creature, and the worker in 'polite letters' must avoid the homely and the common, whereas a personification of Danger is literary, Augustan, and 'polite.' Hence Collins, having first imagined with excessive vividness a man hanging on a loose rock asleep, set to work immediately to turn the man into an abstraction

Danger, whose limbs of giant mould What mortal eye can fixed behold? Who stalks his round, a hideous form, Howling amidst the midnight storm, Or throws him on the ridgy steep Of some loose hanging rock to sleep

But if Gray and Collins were giants imprisoned in the jar of eighteenth century convention, they were followed by a 'marvellous boy' who refused to be so imprisoned. It may be said of Chatterton that he was the Renascence of Wonder mearmate Io him St Mary Redcliffe Church was is much alive as were the men about whom Pope wrote with such astonishing prosaic brilliance. This is one of the reasons why he bulks so largely unong the poets of the Renascence of Wonder For this renascence was shown not merely in the way in which Man's mysterious destiny was conceived, but also in the way in which the theatre of the human drama was confronted This theitre became as fresh, as replete with wonder, as the actors themselves A new seeing was lent to man's eyes And of this young poet it may almost be said that he saw what science is now affirming-the kinship between man and the lower animal, nay, even the sentience of the vegetable further still, he felt that what is cilled dead matter is-as the very latest science is telling us-in a certain sense ilive, shedding its influence around it

Then came Cowper, whose later poetry, when it is contrasted with the jargon of Hayley, seems to belong to another world. But it is possible, perhaps, to credit Cowper with too much in this matter.

He was followed by a poet who did more for the romantic movement than even the 'marvel lous boy' himself could do Although Burns, like so many other fine poets, has left behind him some poor stuff, it would be as difficult to exaggerate his intellectual strength as to overestimate his For not one of his predecessors—not even Chatterton-had been able to get away from the growth of poetic diction which had at last become so rank that originality of production was in the old forms no longer possible The dialect of the Scottish peasantry had already been admirably worked in by certain of his predecessors, but it was left to Burns to bring it into high poetry mere style he is, when writing in Scots, to be ranked with the great masters No one realised more fully than he the power of verbal parsimony in poetry As a quarter of an ounce of bullet in its power of striking home is to an ounce of duck shot, so is a line of Burns to a line of any other poet save two, both of whom are extremely unlike him in other respects and extremely unlike each other To conciseness he made everything yield as com pletely as did Villon in the 'Ballade des Danies du Temps Jadis' and in 'Les Regrets de la Belle Heaulmière,' and as completely as did Dante in the most concise of his lines As surely as Dante's condensation is born of an intensity of imaginative vision, so surely is Burns's condensation born of an intensity of passion Since Drayton wrote his sonnet beginning-

Since ther's no helpe, come let us kiss and part!

there had been nothing in the shape of passionate poetry in rhyme that could come near Burns's lines—

Had we never loved sac kindly, Had we never loved the blindly, Never met or never parted, We had ne er been broken he arted

But, splendid as is his passionate poetry, it is specially is in absolute lumourist that he towers above all the poets of the eighteenth century. Un doubtedly, to get away on all occusions from the shadow of the great social pyramid was not to be expected of a poet at the time and in the conditions in which Burns was born. Yet it is a tonishing how this Scottish yeom in did get iway from it it times, as in 'A Man's a Man for a' that.' It is astonishing to realise how he was able to show a feeling for absolute humour such is in the eighteenth century had only been shown by prose writers-prose writers of the first rink-like 5 vit and Sterne. Indeed, if we did not remember that he followed the creator of Uncle Foly, he would take, if that were possible, a still higher place than he now does as an absolute humourist. Not even Uncle Toby's apostrophe to the fly is finer than Burns's lines to a mouse on turning her up with a But his lines to a mount in daisy which he had turned down with the plough are full of a deeper humour still-+1 humorous sympathy with the vegetable no less than with the animal kingdom. There is nothing in all poetry which touches it. Much admiration has been given, and couldtly given, to Dorothi Wordsworth's beautiful plose words in her diary about the danodil, is showing how a nature lover without the 'accomplishment of verse' can make us conscious of the consciousness of a wild flower. But they were written after Burns, and though they have some of Burns's play fulness, they cannot be said to show his humour It is in poems of another class, however—in such poems as the Address to the De'il'-that we get his greatest triumph as an absolute humourist, for there we get what the present writer has eilled 'cosmic humour'-the very crown and flower of absolute humour And take 'Holy Willie's Prayer,' where, biting as is the satire, the poet's humorous enjoyment of it carries it into the rirest poem In 'Tam o' Shanter' we get the finest nuxture of humour and wisdom, the finest instance of Teutonic grotesque, to be found in all English poetry In 'The Jolly Beggars' Burns now and again shows that he could pass into the mood of true Puntagruelisin-a mood which is of all moods the rarest and the finest-a mood which requires in the humourist such a blessed mixture of the juices as nature cannot often in a climate like ours achieve.

A true child of the Renascence of Wonder who followed Burns, William Blake, though he was entirely without humour, and showed not much power of giving realistic pictures of nature, had a finer sense of the supernatural than any of his predecessors.

And now, after this wide circuit, we are able to turn, better equipped for understanding them, to those writers of the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth who are the accredited fathers of the Renascence of Wonder It is not the purpose of the present essay to discuss the poetry of any one of the poets of this great epoch except in regard to this Renascence. Their work will be found fully presented and analysed by eminent specialists in this volume. In 1765 Percy had published his famous collection of old ballads, and this directed general attention to our ballad literature. The first poet among the great group who fell under the influence of the old ballads was probably Scott, who in 1802 brought out the first two volumes of his priceless Border Minstrelsy The old ballads were, of course, very unequal in quality, but among them were 'Clerk Saunders,' 'The Wife of Usher's Well,' 'The Young Tamlane,' the ballad which Scott afterwards named 'The Demon Lover,' and certain others which compel us to set the 'Border Ballads,' as they are called, at the very top of the pure poetry of the modern world. Coleridge, as we are going to see, could give us the weird and the beautiful combined, but he could not blend with these qualities such dramatic humanity and intense pathos as are expressed in such a stanza as this from 'Clerk Saunders,' where Saunders's mistress, after he has been assassinated by ber brothers, throws herself upon his grave and exclaims

> Is there ony roome at your head, Saunders? Is there ony roome at your feet? Or ony roome at your side, Saunders, Where fain, fain, I wad sleep?

Scott, we say, is entitled to be placed at the bead of those who are generally accredited with originating the Renascence of Wonder in the nineteenth century. But great as was the influence of Scott in this matter, it is hard to see how the effect of his romantic work would have been so potent as it now is without the influence of Coleridge. For, as has been pointed out in the notice of Byron in this volume, Scott's friend Stoddart, having heard Coleridge recite the first part of Christabel while still in manuscript, and having a memory that retained everything, repeated the poem to Scott, and Scott at once sat down and produced The Lay of the Last Minstrel There is no need to say with Leigh Hunt that Scott's vigorous poem is a coarse travesty of Christabel in order to admit that, full as it is of splendid poetical qualities, it is defective in technic and often cheap in diction Some of Scott's romantic lyrics, however, scattered through his novels show that it was a languid artistic conscience alone that prevented him from taking a much higher place as a poet than he now takes. If he never learnt, as Coleridge did, the truth so admirably expressed in Joubert's saying that 'it is better to be exquisite than to be ample,' it really seems to have been because he did not care to learn it For the distinctive quality of Scott is 1 to feel the most tremendous and awe inspiring that he seems to be greater than his work-as much greater, indeed, as a towering oak seems greater than the leaves it sheds. Coleridge's Christabel, The Ancient Mariner, and Kubla Khan are, as regards the romantic spirit, above—and far above—any work of any other English poet. Instances innumerable might be adduced showing how his very nature was steeped in the fountain from which the old balladists themselves drew, but in this brief and rapid survey there is room to give only one. In the 'Conclusion' of the first part of Christabel he recapitulates and summarises, in lines that are at once matchless as poetry and matchless in succinctness of statement, the entire stor, of the bewitched maiden and her terrible foe which had gone before

> A star hath set, a star hath risen, O Geraldine ' since arms of thine Have been the lovely lady's prison O Geraldine ! one hour was thine-Thou'st had thy will! By tairn and rill, The night-birds all that hour were still But now they are jubilant anew, From cliff and tower, tu whoo! tu whoo! Tu whoo! tu whoo! from wood and fell!

Here we get that feeling of the inextricable web in which the human drama and external nature are woven which is the very soul of poetic wonder So great is the maleficent power of the beautiful witch that a spell is thrown over all Nature. For an hour the very woods and fells remain in a shuddering state of sympathetic consciousness of her-

The night birds all that hour were still.

When the spell is passed Nature awakes as from a hideous nightmare, and 'the night-birds' are jubilant anew. This is the very highest reach of poetic wonder—finer, if that be possible, than the night storm during the murder of Duncan And note the artistic method by which Coleridge gives us this amazing and overwhelming picture of the oneness of all Nature. However the rhymes may follow each other, it is always easy for the critic, by studying the intellectual and emotional movement of the sequence, to see which rhyme-word first came to the poet's mind and suggested the rbymewords to follow or precede it. It is the witch's maleficent will-power which here dominates the poet's mind as he writes. Therefore we know that he first wrote-

Thou'st had thy will

In finding a rhyme-word for 'will' and 'rill,' the word 'still' would of course present itself, among others, to any poet's mind, but it required a poet steeped in the true poetic wonder of pre-Augustanism—it required Coleridge, whose genius was that very

Lady of the Lake, Sole sitting by the shores of Old Romance-picture, perhaps, in all poetry called up to his imagination—

The night birds all that hour were still

The nearer in temper any other line approaches this, the nearer does it approach the ide il of poetic wonder It is, however, owing to the very rarity of Coleridge's genius that not he but Scott popularised the romantic movement such purely poetical work as the first part of Christabel, which was entirely unlocalised, realistic medieval pictures were not requisite as they were in the Lay of the Last Minstrel such work as Coleridge's all that the romantic revival needed was a poet who would supply it with feet in addition to wings Scott sup plied those feet. However, in the second part of Christabel, written later-in which the poem is localised after Scott's manner-Coleridge showed so much of Scott's influence that it may not lic too fanciful to call these two immortal poets the binary star of romanticism revolving around one common poetic centre. Scott's poetry became so immensely popular that it soon set every poet and every versifier, from Byron downwards, writ ing romantic stories in octosyllabic couplets, with the old mapæstic lilt of romantic poetry

As regards Wordsworth's share in this movement, though it was, no doubt, confined largely to poetic methods, the following superb lines from 'Yew Trees' can be set beside even Coleridge's masterpieces as regards the romantic side of the Renascence of Wonder

Beneath whose sable roof
Of boughs, as if for festal purpose, decked
With unrejoieing berries—ghostly Shapes
May meet at noontide, Fear and trembling Hope, Silence and Foresight, Death the Skeleton
And Time the Shadow,—there to celebrate,
As in a natural temple scattered o'cr
With alters undisturbed of mossy stone,
United worship, or in mute repose
To be, and listen to the mountain flood Murmuring from Glaraniara's inmost caves.

Whether the reaction would have died out (as did the revival of natural language by Theocritus after such comparatively feeble followers as Bion and Moschus) had not Wordsworth's indomitable will and masterful simplicity of character stood up and saved it, or whether, on the contrary, the movement was injured and delayed by this obstinacy and simplicity of character-which led him into exaggerated theories, exposing it to ridicule-is perhaps a debatable question ever, it ended by the 'poetic diction' of the eighteenth century being swept away. But as to real knowledge of the mere physiognomy of mediævalism, Coleridge and Scott were perhaps on a par Indeed, imperfect knowledge of this physiognomy was a weak point in the entire group of poets who set to work to revive it. Coleridge showed a certain knowledge of it, which, like Scott's, was no doubt above that of Horace Walpote and Mrs Radcliffe But since the great recumulation of learning upon this subject which came afterwards for the use of Linglish poets it seems slight enough Abbotsford done is enough to show that Scott did not fully escape the let tard nieth evalism of the eighteenth century. If he in Ivanhoe vanquished every dimentity and wrote in immortal medias il romance with not many touches of true medica alism, that is only another proof of his vit thang margin ition and genia. Fortun itely, however, Scott was something more than a man like his successor Membold, who had every median d derul at his command. Had the unifor of Laurese been as truly medicial as the author of Sidema, he would have appealed to a lest red few by whom the past is more beloved than the pre ent, but he would not have given the English speaking race those superb works of his which me

Though the Ettrick Shepherd, in  $T \in \Omega$  across Wake, shows plenty of the trice feeling for the supernatural side of the movement, he had not sufficient governance over his vial imagination to express himself with that concentrated energy which is one of the first requisite

Is to Wordsworth is an iture poet, there are, of course, three attitudes of the poet to saids Nature There is Wordsworth's att tude-that which recomses her as Natura Benigia, there is the ittiti de which recognises her as Natura Mai na, that of the poet who by temperament exclums with the Syrian Gnostics, 'Matter is darlage a-matter is evil, and of matter is this body, and to become incarnate is to inherit sorrow and priceous pain," and there is the attitude which recognises her is being neither benigh nor in il guant but the cold, passionless, unloving mother to whom the sortous, fears, and aspirations of man are indifferent because unknown—the attitude, in a vord, of Matthe v Arnold and other recent poets who have written after the general acceptance of the evolutionary hypothesis

Wordsworth's influence in regard to the painting of Nature was no doubt great upon all the poets of his time, and upon none was it greater than upon Byron, who scoffed at him In order to see Wordsworth's influence upon Byron we have only to compare the third and fourth cantos of Civille Harold with the first and second. But besides this, Byron was evidently in the later decade of his life a student of Wordsworth's theories as to the use of natural language instead of poetic diction. In Julia's letter in Don Juan, notwithstanding occasional echoes like that of Barton Booth's complet given on page 290, Vol. II of this work—

So shakes the needle, and so stands the pole, As vibrates my fond heart to my fixed soul, is an admirable illustration of Wordsworth's aphorism, 'What comes from the heart goes to the heart.' The same may be said concerning the pathetic naturalness of the Haidée episode. Would this ever have been written as we now have it had it not been for Wordsworth's Preface? What makes Byron an important figure in the romantic revival is that, while his own draughts of romanticism were drawn from the well-springs of Scott, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, it was from his own' reservoir that the French romantiques drank. Indeed, it may almost be said that to his influence was largely due that revival which, according to Banville, 'made French poetry leap from the sixteenth century to the nineteenth' As regards, however, the French romantiques of the thirties to whom Banville alludes-those whose revolt against French classicism culminated, perhaps, in that great battle of Hernam before mentioned-their revolt was even more imperfectly equipped with knowledge of the physiognomy of mediævalism than that of Scott.

With regard to Victor Hugo, however, it may be said that, modern as he was in temper, he was able by aid of his splendid imagination in La Pas d'Armes du Roi Jean, and indeed in many other poems, to feel and express the true renascence of wonder But in poetry the mere physiognomy of life is only suggested in prose it has to be secured. Hugo never secured it.

Shelley's place in the Renascence of Wonder is peculiar His vigorous imagination was partially strangled by his humanitarianism and ethical impulse, inherited largely from Rousseau. Of all the poets of this group he was by far the most influenced by the social upheaval of the French Revolution, and, of course, apart from his splendid work in so many kinds of poetry, he is a very important figure in the revival of romanticism broadly considered. But those poems of his dealing with subjects akin to those represented by the purely romantic work of the old ballads and Christabel show that in the Renascence of Wonder his place is not among the first. Queen Mab is not the least in touch with the spiritual world. And there is more of the pure romantic glamour in Keats's two lınes--

than in the whole of The Witch of Atlas

Southey's voluminous and industrious work upon romantic lines is receiving at this moment less attention than it deserves. There is really a fine atmosphere of romance thrown over Thalaba and The Curse of Kehama. But the atmosphere is cold.

With regard to Keats in relation to it, the present writer has elsewhere dwelt upon the fact that, brief as was his life, he who had already passed through so many halls of the poetic palace was at one time passing into yet another—the magic hall of Coleridge and the old ballads. As expressions of the highest romantic temper there are not many things in our literature to be set above The Eve of St Mark and La Belle Dami sans Merci.

Our object being merely to trace to its sources that stream of Romanticism upon which the poetry of the nineteenth century has been nourished, this essay should properly close with Keats And if a word or two is here said upon the poets who immediately followed the great group, it must not be supposed that any general criticism of these latter poets is attempted.

Tennyson, in virtue of the large mass of perfect work actually done, would perhaps be the greatest poet of the nineteenth century if Coleridge had not left us among his own large mass of inferior work half-a-dozen poems which will be the wonder and the despair of English poets in all time to come. In the blending of music and colour so that each seems born of each, it is hard to think that even the poet of The Eve of St Agnes and The Ode to a Nightingale was the superior of him who gave us The Lady of Shalott and The Lotos-Eaters But when it comes to the true romantic glamour it cannot be said that he was instinctively in touch with the old spirit. The magnificent Idylls of the King, in temper as well as in style one of the most modern poems of its time, does occasionally, as in the picture of the finding of Arthur, give us the old glamour very But the stately rhetorical movement of hisblank verse is generally out of harmony with it. That romantic suggestion which Shakespeare's blank verse catches in such writing as we get in the fifth act of the Merchant of Venice, and in hundreds of other passages, shows, however, that blank verse, though not so 'right' in romantic poetry as rhyme, can yet be made sufficiently flexible. It is only in the poetic methods of his rhymed poems that Tennyson successfully worked on romantic lines, though of course the naïvelé, the fairy-like, unconscious grace of Coleridge at his best, were never caught by any of his suc-And yet above all nineteenth-century poets Tennyson is steeped in the absolute humour of romanticism. In Shakespeare himself there is no finer example of absolute humour than he givesus in those lines where the 'Northern Farmer' expresses his views on the immorality of Bessy Marris

Bessy Marris's barne' tha knaws she laaid it to mea. Mowt a bean, mayhap, for she wur a bad un, shea. 'Siver, I kep 'um, I kep 'um, my lass, tha mun understond,

I done moy duty boy 'um as I 'a done boy the lond

As to Browning, in order to discuss adequately his place as regards the Renascence of Wonder a long treatise would be required. On the realistic side of the Romantic movement he is, of course, very strong. His sympathies, however, are as modern as Matthew Arnold's own, except, of course, on the theological side, where he is a century behind his great poetic contemporaries. His desire is to express not wonder but knowing ness, the opposite of wonder In a study of his works made by the present writer many years ago, the humour of Browning was named feutonic grotesque. The name is convenient, and nearly, though not quite, satisfactory But subsequent writers on Browning seem to have caught it up Perhaps Teutonic grotesque, which, in architecture at least, lies in the expression of deep ideas through fantastic forms, is the only absolute grotesque In Italian and French grotesque the incongruity throughout all art lies in a simple departure from the recognised line of beauty, spiritual or physical, but in the Teutonic mind the instinctive quest is really not-save in music-beauty it all, but the wonderful, the profound, the mysterious, and the incongruity of Teutonic grotesque lies in expressing the emotions aroused by these qualities in forms that are unexpected and bizarra. It is easy, however, to give too much heed to Browning's grotesquery in considering his relation to Romin ticism Ruskin has affirmed that such poems is The Bishop Orders his Tomb is the best rendering to be found in literature of the old temper, and on this point Ruskin speaks with authority

With regard to Matthew Arnold, in The Scholar Gypsy he undoubtedly shows, reflected from Words worth, a good deal of the realistic side of Romanticism. But there is no surer sign that his temper was really Augustan than the fact that in his selections from Gray in Ward's Luglish Poets, he actually omits the one stanza in Gray's Elegy which shows him to have been a true poet—the stanza about the robin, above quoted in the re marks upon Gray The Forsaken Merman, whose very name suggests the Renascence of Wonder, beautiful as it is, is quite without the glamour and magic of such second-rate poets as the author of the Queen's Wake, and has no kinship with Cole ridge or the old ballads As to his attitude towards Nature, it is in such poems as Morality and In Harmony with Nature that Arnold shows that he comes under the third category of nature poets above mentioned With regard to his humour, Arnold was essentially a man of the world-of the very modern world-and his humour, though peculiarly delicate and delightful, must r maps be called relative and not absolute.

As regards the Romantic temper, two English imaginative writers only have combined a true sympathy with a true knowledge of it, and these were of more recent date—F Letti and William Moris. They had, of course immense advantages owing to such predecessors in literature as Meinhold, and also to the attention that had been given to the subject in Pugin's Gothic Architecture and in the works of other architects, English and foreign.

The poet of Christabel himself was scarcely more steeped in the true magic of the romantic temper than was the writer of The Blessed Themosel and Sister Helen, while in I nowledge of romance he was fir behind the Liter poet. With regard to humour, he and Morris hold in their poetry no place either with the absolute or relative humourists, but those who knew them intunately can affirm that personally they were both humourists of a very fine order. The truth is that Rosecti consciously, and Morris unconsciously, worked upon the entirely mistal on theory that in romantic poetry humour has properly no place.

It is wint of spice alone that preents our bringing prose fiction into this east, otherwise Mr Meredith would receive more attention in these remarks than almost any other writer, but to discuss so vist a subject is that of the Renacence of Wonder as seen in prose fiction would require the space of a large book, or rather of a library

It is hard to think that even the singer of the Ode to the West Wind is in lyric power greater than he who wrote the choruses of Atalants and the still more superb measures of Songs lafore Sunrise and Erechtheus Indeed, we have only to recall the fact that before Shelley wrote it a sin axioni imong poets and critics that few, if ins, more metres could ever be invented in order to give his proper place to a poet who has invented more metres than all the poets combined from the author of Piers Plown in down to the present day Mr Swinburne too seems, consciously or encon sciously, to act upon the theory that humour is out of place in romantic poetry. For in his prose writings he shows a great deal of with and humour With regard to form and artistic quality shererally, a new kind of poetic diction now grew up-a diction composed mainly of that of " D'er and of Keats, of Tennyson, of Rossett, i Mr Symburne, vet mixed with Elizabeth in Jacore archaic formsa diction, to be sur-To e poetic in its clements than that which ζε, Scott, and Wordsworth did so much 1 'i-li, but rone the less arti ficial when me, rated by a purely artistic iiii pul e for the pulluction of purely artistic ver-It is, we say, true enough that the gorgeous and beautful word spinning of writers like Arthur OSI aughnessy, Philip Bourke Marston, and those e ded the Pre Raphaelite poets is far more like genuine poetry than was the worn out, tawdry texture of eighteenth century platitudes in which Hayley and Samuel Jackson Pratt bedecked their puny limbs Rossetti, the great master of this kind of poetic diction, san this, and during the last few years of his life endeavoured to get away from it when writing his superb poems, .1 King's Tragedy and The White Ship His relative, Mr Ford Madox Hueffer, in his monograph on Rossetti tells us that it should be pointed out that the White Ship was one of Rossetti's last works, and that in it he was aiming at simplicity of narrative under the advice of the present writer

William Wordsworth.

The story of Wordsworth's earlier life is told in The Prelude, 'the long poem on my own education,' finished in 1805, but not published till after the author's death in 1850. This poem was addressed to Coleridge, who described it in the verses written in acknowledgment

An Orphic song indeed, A song divine of high and passionate thoughts. To their own music chanted.

It had to be kept back, because the great work to which it was an introduction—The Recluse, of which The Excursion is only a fragment-was never completed. If Wordsworth had published the Prelude immediately, it might have saved his literary reputation from some tedious controversies; it would certainly have given pleasure to Shelley and Keats, both of whom were fascinated by Wordsworth and anxious to discover his mean-It is an authentic story, the course of his life and the growth of his faculties are described sincerely It is one of the happiest of lives, blest from the outset with natural gifts of the most fortunate kind, a pilgrim's progress, in which the ordeals are indeed severe, but saved from the worst afflictions, and especially from low spirits By keeping back the Prelude Wordsworth made he Excursion his most authoritative work regarding his own temper and ideas. His contemporaries generally judged him from the Excursion, and the Excursion, taken by itself, gives a false impression of Wordsworth. It makes him too much of a philosopher, too sedate, too tame The Prelude is a story of life and will, not mainly of meditations or theories, these have their place in it, but the purport of the whole book is to show that his reflections spring from what is alive. Wordsworth's life, which to many of his readers has appeared a monotonous affair, comes out in the Prelude as a life of pure-energy from the beginning, wakeful, Also by accident (or 'divine alert, self-willed. chance') he was carried into the middle of great He stood nearer to the reality of the things French Revolution than any of his contemporaries in England, and he discovered the secret of the Alps. The slow mooning person which Wordsworth seemed to be in later life is hardly to be found in the Prelude 'The story of his childhood and boyhood is an enthusiastic description of all kinds of adventure. The pride of life kindled and lit up his world for him, Nature for him was full throughout of 'danger and desire.'

He was born at Cockermouth, on 7th-April 1770, the son of John Wordsworth, law-agent to Sir James Lowther His mother, who died when he was eight years old, was anxious about him, owing to the faults of his disposition, more than about any of her other children. He says himself that he was 'of a stiff, moody, and violent temper,' but his wilfulness had nothing unsound in it. His account of his school life (at Hawkshead) would be interesting simply as a story of a boy's adventures. The early revelations of sublimathings came to him not in moments of a wise passiveness, but in the crisis of heroic action

When I have hung
Above the raven's nest by knots of grass
And half inch fissures in the slippery rock
But ill sustained, and almost (so it seemed) Suspended by the blast that blew amain, Shouldering the naked crag, oh, at that time
While on the perilous ridge I hung alone,
With what strange utterance did the loud dry wind
Blow through my ear! The sky seemed not a sky
Of earth—and with what motion moved the clouds!

The first book of the Prelude is a commentary on the lines in Tintern Abbey

The coarser pleasures of my boyish days And their glad animal movements all gone by

It explains how different Wordsworth's love of Nature was from mere critical observation of the 'beauties' of Nature or what is called 'scenery' It is through life that Nature is revealed to him, in rowing, riding, and skating, and the old panic terror found him, about his tenth year, in night raids on the fells

I heard among the solitary hills
Low breathings coming after me, and sounds
Of undistinguishable motion, steps
Almost as silent as the turf they trod

In October 1787 Wordsworth went up to St John's College, Cambridge. The change of scene was a trial for him, but he was not depressed. He found that his mistress, Nature, was lady of the fens also, and in the flat country he surrendered himself to the elemental beauty of light and air, and the broad general aspect of the earth

As if awakened, summoned, roused, constrained, I looked for universal things, perused The common countenance of earth and sky

There was at the same time a certain lowering of temperature in his life, as was perhaps natural and right. The touch of worldliness m his conversation at Cambridge gave him tolerance, and saved his enthusiasm from wasting itself. In his third long vacation (1790) Wordsworth went for a walking tour in France and Switzerland with his friend Jones, of the same college, and found himself in the middle of the Revolution —Europe at that time was thrilled with joy, France standing on the top of golden hours, And human nature seeming born again.

There is no one who has borne better witness than Wordsworth to the unselfish happiness, the overpowering hope, that seemed to attend the first movement of the Revolution.

The two Cambridge men, however, saw one he required, but motives He verified the saying of Burke, that the world would be ruined 'if the practice of all moral duties and the foundations of society rested upon having their reasons made clear and demonstrative to every individual' His progress led him through the valley of Abstract Thought, where he was not happy

Viewing all objects unremittingly In disconnexion dead and spirilless, as it is expressed in the Excursion, or as in the Prelude

Dragging all precepts, judgments, maxims, creeds Like culprits to the bar, calling the mind Suspiciously to establish in plain day Her titles and her honours.

His deliverance from futile analysis was in great part due, he says, to his sister Dorothy

She in the midst of all preserved me still A Poet, made me seek beneath that name, And that alone, my office upon earth

In 1795 they settled at Racedown, a house near Crevkerne in Dorset. There in June 1797 they were visited by Coleridge, who had read Wordsworth's Descriptive Sketches (published in 1793), the next month the Wordsworths moved to Alforden, a house in the Quantocks not far from Coleridge's home at Nether Stowey Coleridge and Wordsworth, walking about the hills, found occasion for all sorts of imaginative projects, Lyrical Ballads, their common venture, came out in 1798, beginning with the 'Ancient Mariner' and ending with 'Tintern Abbey' Coleridge explained their partnership later 'It was agreed that my efforts should be directed to persons and characters supernatural, or at least romantic, yet so as to transfer from our inward nature a human interest and a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment which constitutes poetic faith Mr Wordsworth, on the other hand, was to propose to himself as his object to give the charm of novelty to things of every day, and to excite a feeling analogous to the supernatural, by awakening the mind's attention from the lethargy of custom and directing it to the loveliness and the wonders of the world before us, an mexhaustible treasure, but for which, in consequence of the film of familiarity and selfish solicitude, we have eyes yet see not, ears that hear not, and hearts that neither feel nor understand?

Wordsworth and his sister did not stay long in Somerset. In the autumn of 1798 they went to Germany, travelling with Coleridge in the earlier part of their journey. German literature did not affect Wordsworth strongly, he imitated Burger's verse in two of his worst poems, and disapproved of it in one of his critical essays. But his German winter was productive, the poems of that year are among the finest in the second volume of Lyrical Ballads, published in 1800. He came back to England in 1799, and settled at Grasmere. The Prelude was already begun, part of the great ambition of Wordsworth's life-'a philosophical poem containing views of Man, Nature, and Society, and to be entitled The Recluse, as having for its principal subject the sensations and opinions of a poet living in retirement' The Prelude was finished in 1805, but it was not the only work of these years. In 1807 appeared two volumes, about the same size as the Lyrical Ballads of 1800, containing poems in some respects considerably different from anything of Wordsworth's hitherto published the 'Sonnets on Liberty,' the 'Happy Warrior,' the 'Ode to Duty,' and at the end, with a motto of its own, paullo majora cananius, the 'Ode on Intimations of Immortality' There were also the poems of the tour in Scotland in 1803 recorded in Dorothy Wordsworth's Journal-Yarrow Unvisited, Stepping Westward, The Solitary Reaper The most obvious difference between 1800 and 1807 in Wordsworth's poetry was the result of his studies among the older English poets -Chaucer, Drayton, Daniel, Sidney-of whom he had known little or nothing before. Milton and Spenser he had long known and praised now their influence returned to him along with the others, and gave a new character to his poctical language.

In 1813 he went to Rydal Mount, his home for the rest of his life. About the same time he obtained the office of Distributor of Stamps for Westmorland In 1814 he made his second tour in Scotland (Yarrow Visited), and published the Excursion, being a portion of The Recluse, a Poem.' A collected edition of his Poems was published in the following year, and also in 1815, separately, The White Doe of Rylstone Peter Bell, a tale in verse, begun long before among the Quantocks but not included in Lyrical Ballads, was published in 1819, preceded by the mischievous work of the same name, 'the ante-natal Peter,' a parody of Wordsworth by Keats's friend Reynolds, and followed by Shelley's Peter Bell the Third Other publications are The Waggoner (1819), The River Duddon (1820), Memorials of a Tour on the Continent (1820), Ecclesiastical Sketches (1822) There were few adventures in Wordsworth's later life He travelled in Switzerland, Italy, Holland, Wales, Ireland, in 1831, with his daughter, he went to see Scott at Abbotsford, just before his departure for Naples. Scott refusing Wordsworth's commendation of the Italian landscape, and quoting 'although 'tis fair, 'twill be another Yarrov' Yarrow Revis led and other poems appeared in 1835, and at the end of the year, in the Atnenwam, the 'Extempore Effusion on the Death of James Hogg'-Wordsworth's lament for the poets. Coleridge and Lamb had died the year before

> Like clouds that rake the mountain summits, Or waves that own no curb ng hand, How fast has brother followed brother From sunshine to the sunless land

1800 he became more magnificent, he went back to the Elizabethans and used more elaborate forms of verse and a richer language, 'armoury of the invincible knights of old' But this implicit withdrawal of his thesis did not affect his main position except to strengthen it the conviction, namely, that the poetical idea or view, or whatever it may be called—the poetical comprehension of the theme—must determine the expression of it to the minutest point of detail. When the eye is single, the body of poetry is full of light. Further, the poetic vision is not mere vision poetical insight (which he called imagination) is one with its passionate motive, the demonstration of this is the whole scope and upshot of the Prelude.

He meant to write a great philosophical poem, and he failed to complete his design Nothing would have contented him in it unless it had included all the poetical meaning of all his works, when finished, it was to be like 'a Gothic church' in regard to which his shorter poems were to be chapels and oratories. With all his sense of the value of his work, he underrated these shorter poems, not to speak of the Prelude, which was, as he says, his 'portico' He did not know that in some of these poems and in some passages of the Prelude he had gone to the very verge of what is permissible in the use of poetry dealing with the mystery of the world. The tension of mind in the Tintern poem, in part of the Ode on Immortality, in the verses on the Simplon, is near the limits of speech a little more, and speech and thought would vanish, above these heights of speculation there is no footing for mere humanity Beyond them poetry can hardly go without turning into something else than poetry. And it is not certain what it may be come, it is certain there is danger. If a loftier mode of vision is denied, then what remains is apt to be mere talk about the Universe, no more inspiring than the talk about education noted by Mr Arnold in his essay on Wordsworth

Not even the philosophical poem which he imagined, and hoped for, could take the place of Wordsworth's actual accomplished work in the smaller chapels and oratories. The variety of his style is not shown in the Recluse as it is, for example, in the poems of 1807, and luckily there is no need to restrict one's self to these two glorious volumes. He had command of many different instruments, and was more sensitive to poetical influences, more humble as a student of old masters, than is commonly supposed. The Yarrow poems are on the beautiful old model

Sing Erceldoune and Condenknowes Where Homes had once commanding

Resolution and Independence is in Milton's stanza—a Spenserian variety—used in the proem of the Nativity ode. The verse of The Green Linnet is borrowed from Drayton's Nymphidia, the form of the Ode to Duty from Gray—His poetry is full of reminiscences, sometimes acknowledged Michael and The Brothers, poems that work out his principle of plain language, also justify it by the commanding dignity and pathos of their thought transforming the simple words into sublimity But the author of Michael could also use, in spite of all his prefaces, the language of the courtly schools -'invested with purputeal gleams' And no one since Dryden has used the heroic couplet like Wordsworth-with an onward rush, sometimes louder, as in the Expected Invasion, sometimes more varied and musical, as in the Happy Warrior His poetry of the 'trump and timbrel' is irresistible, no fighting poet, not even Byron, ever struck harder at the enemy than Wordsworth no political satire ever went home more cleanly and effectively than Wordsworth's conclusion against a certain possible type of Ministry

> A servile hand Who have to judge of danger which they fear And honour which they do not understand

This, it is true, is borrowed from Sir Philip Sidney, but the edge is given to it by Wordsworth. The moral of Yarrow Revisited, its pure and reverend grace, gives a new meaning to the old poetic praise of rightcousness, 'more beautiful than the morning or the evening star,' the friendship of Wordsworth and Scott is recorded in words that seem to have the whole soul of human goodness and nobility in them

For busy thoughts the stream flowed on In formy agriction,
And slept in many a crystal pool
For quiet contemplation,
No public and no private care
The freeborn mind enthralling,
We made a day of happy hours
Our happy days recalling

Into a single plirase—'breaking the silence of the seas'—he can put the spirit of all the myths about the powers of Winter and Spring—the voice of the Spring triumphing in the very heart of the vast desolation—He has a new mythology of his own, not displayed in large works like Hyperion or Prometheus Unbound, but expressing itself in apparently casual ways—The Ode to Duty is his largest mythological poem, and there the personi fying imagination really does its work in one sentence. With his poetical magic he scatters phrases that fill the mind as if they were complete works, like flaunting Summer when he throws His soul into the briar rose

The simplicity of Wordsworth's style is more varied than most poets' opulence, just as the tranquillity of his life, the contemplative quiet of much of his writings, is consistent with a rebellious energy law and impulse in him were reconciled, but impulse was not degraded or diluted in this harmony of opposite powers. The things that give him most delight are lawless—his heart leaps up at the humour of the two Thieves His zest for happiness is unfailing, and he finds it out and blesses it with the same sincerity as wisdom or In two different ways he has praised the River-once in the morning at Westminster Bridge, and again because he saw a miller and two women dancing at sunset on one of the floating mills. 'Charles Lamb was with me at the time, and I thought it remarkable that I should have to point out to him, an idolatrous Londoner, a sight so interesting as the happy group dancing on the platform' Nature has more meanings for him even than those of Tintern Abbey, and his poetical mind has regard to many things that are neither solemn nor contemplative. It has not been found necessary here to consider the less interesting parts of his work, it may be observed, however, that the later poems, which are seldom read, include many things like those of 1800 and 1807 one of them, that may be called his last word, written in his seventy-fifth year, has already been quoted.

Wordsworth's prose is not all of one kind, but it is all good. It has given some phrases to literature that have the currency of Milton's, like 'the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge,' and there are others less known, especially in the blazing tract on the Convention of Cintra (1809), as vehoment as Burke. He had not lost his pover in 1844 when he wrote against the proposed Kendal and Windermere Railway. The Guide to the Lakes is in a different style.

Expostulation and Reply

'Why, William, on that old grey stone, Thus for the length of half a day, Why, William, sit you thus alone, And dream your time away?

Where are your books ?—that light bequeathed To Beings else forlorn and blind 'Up! up' and drink the spirit breathed From dead men to their kind

You look round on your Mother Earth, As if she for no purpose bore you, As if you were her first born birth, And none had lived before you!

One morning thus, by Esthwaite lake, When life was sweet, I knew not why, To me my good friend Matthew spake, And thus I made reply

'The eye—it cannot choose but see We cannot bid the ear be still, Our bodies feel, where'er they be, Against or with our will.

Nor less I deem that there are Powers Which of themselves our minds impress, That we can feed this mind of ours In a wise passiveness

Think you, 'mid all this mighty sum Of things for ever speaking, 'That nothing of itself will come, But we must still be seeking' 106 —Then ask not wherefore, here, alone, Conversing as I may,
I sit upon this old grey stone,
And dream my time away'

(From Lyrical Ballads, 1793)

The Tables Turned.

Up' up' my Friend, and quit your books, Or surely you'll grow donble Up' up' my Friend, and clear your looks, Why all this toil and tronble?

The sun, above the mountain's head, A freshening lastre mellow Through all the long green fields has spread, His first sweet evening vellow

Books 1 'tis a dull and endless strife Come, hear the woodland linnet, How sweet his music ' on my life, There's more of wisdom in it

And hark! how blithe the throstle sings! He, too, is no mean preacher Come forth into the light of things, Let Nature be your teacher

She has a world of ready wealth, Our minds and hearts to bless— Spontaneous wisdom breathed by health, Truth breathed by cheerfulness

One impulse from a vernal wood May teach you more of man, Of moral evil and of good, Than all the sages can.

Sweet is the lore which Nature brings,
Our meddling intellect
Mis-shapes the beanteous forms of things —
We murder to dissect.

Enough of Science and of Art, Close up those barren leaves, Come forth, and bring with you a heart That watches and receives

Lines composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey on revisiting the Banks of the Wye during a Tour July 13 1798

(179°)

Five years have past, five summers, with the length Of five long winters ' and again I hear These waters, rolling from their mountain springs With a soft inland murmur -Once again Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs, That on a wild secluded scene impress Thoughts of more deep seclusion, and connect The landscape with the quiet of the sky The day is come when I again repose Here, under this dark sycamore, and view These plots of cottage ground, these orchard tufts, Which at this season, with their unripe fruits, Are clad in one green hie, and lose themselves 'Mid groves and copses Once again I see These hedge rows, hardly hedge rows, little lines Of sportive wood run wild these pastoral farms, Green to the very door, and wreaths of smoke Sent up, in silence, from among the trees ! With some nucertain notice, as might seem Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods, Or of some Hermit's cave, where by his fire The Hermit sits alone.

These beauteous forms, Through a long absence, have not been to me As is a landscape to a blind man's eye But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din Of towns and cities, I have owed to them, In hours of weariness, sensations sweet, Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart, And passing even into my purer mind, With tranquil restoration -feelings too Of unremembered pleasure such, perhaps, As have no slight or trivial influence On that best portion of a good man's life, His little, nanicless, unremembered, acts Of lindness and of love Nor less, I trust, To them I may have owed another gift, Of aspect more sublime, that blessed mood, In which the burthen of the mystery, In which the heavy and the weary weight Of all this unintelligible world, Is lightened -that serene and blessed mood, In which the affections gently lead us on,-Until, the breath of this corporeal frame And even the motion of our human blood Almost suspended, we are laid asleep In body, and become a living soul While with an eye made quiet by the power Of harmony, and the deep power of joy, We see into the life of things

Be hut a vain belief, yet, oh' how oft—
In darkness and aimd the many shapes
Of joyless daylight, when the fretful stir
Unprofitable, and the fever of the world,
Have hung upon the beatings of my heart—
How oft, in spirit, have I turned to thee,
O sylvan Wye' thou wanderer thro' the woods,
How often has my spirit turned to thee!

And now, with gleams of half extinguished thought, With many recognitions dim and faint, And somewhat of a sad perplexity, The picture of the mind revives again While here I stand, not only with the sense Of present pleasure, but with pleasing thoughts That in this moment there is life and food Tor future years And so I dare to hope, Though changed, no doubt, from what I was when first I came among these hills, when like a roc I bounded o'er the mountains, by the sid Of the deep rivers, and the lonely streams, Wherever nature led more like a man I'lying from something that he dreads, that one Who sought the thing he loved. For na'ure then (The coarser pleasures of my boytsh days, And their glad animal movements all gone by) To me was all in all -I cannot paint What then I was The sounding cataract Haunted me like a passion, the tall rock, The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood, Mier colours and their forms, were then to me An appetite, a feeling and a love, That had no need of a remoter charm, By thought supplied, nor any interest Unborrowed from the eye -That time is past, And all its aching joys are now no more, And all its dizzy raptures Not for this Faint I, nor mourn nor murmur, other gifts

Have followed, for such loss, I would believe, Abundant recompense I or I have learned To look on nature, not as in the hour Of thoughtless youth, but hearing oftentimes The still, sad music of humanity, Nor harsh nor grating though of ample power To chasten and subdue. And I have felt A presence that disturbs me with the joy Of elevated thoughts, a sense sublime Of something for more deeply interfused, Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns, And the round ocean and the living air, And the blue sky, and in the mind of man A motion and a spirit, that impels All thinking things, all objects of all thought, And rolls through all things Therefore am I still A lover of the meadows and the woods, And mountains, and of all that we behold From this green earth, of all the mighty world Of eye, and ear, -both what they half create, And what perceive, well pleased to recognise In nature and the language of the sense, The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse, The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul Of all my moral being

Nor perchance, If I were not thus taught, should I the more Suffer my genial spirits to decay For thou art with me here upon the banks Of this fair river, thou my dearest Friend, My dear, dear Friend, and in thy voice I catch The language of my former heart, and read My former pleasures in the shooting lights Of thy wild eyes Oh I yet a little while May I behold in thee what I was once, My dear, dear Sister 1 and this prayer I make Knowing that Nature never dio betray The heart that leved her, 'tis her privilege, Through all the years of this our life, to lead From joy to joy for she can so inform The mind that is within us, so impress With quietness and beauty, and so feed With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues, Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men, Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all The dreary intercourse of daily life, Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb Our cheerful futh that all which we behold Is full of blessings Therefore let the moon Shine on thee in thy solitary walk. And let the misty mountain winds be free To blow against thee and, in after years, When these wild ecstasies shall be matured Into a sober pleasure, when thy mind Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms, Thy memory be as a dwelling place For all sweet sounds and harmonies, oh! then, If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief, Should be thy portion, with what healing thoughts Of tender joy wilt thou remember me, And these my exhortations 1 Nor, perchance-If I should be where I no more can hear Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams Of past existence-wilt thou then forget That on the banks of this delightful stream We stood together, and that I, so long

A worshipper of Nature, hither came Unwearied in that service rather-say
With warmer love—oh! with far deeper zeal
Of holier love. Nor wilt thou then forget,
That after many wanderings, many years
Of absence, these steep woods and lofty cliffs,
And this green pastoral landscape, were to me
More dear, both for themselves and for thy sake!

I have not ventured to call this Poem an Ode but it was written with a hope that in the transitions, and the impassioned music of the versification, would be found the principal requisites of that species of composition. (Note, 1800.)

The Simplon Pass

---Brook and road Were fellow travellers in this gloomy Pass, And with them did we journey several hours The immeasurable height At a slow step Of woods decaying, never to be decayed, The stationary blasts of waterfalls, And in the narrow rent, at every turn, Winds thwarting winds bewildered and forlorn, The torreuts shooting from the clear blue sky, The rocks that muttered close upon our ears, Black drizzling crags that spake by the wayside As if a voice were in them, the sick sight And giddy prospect of the raving stream, The unfettered clouds and region of the heavens, Tumult and peace, the darkness and the light-Were all like workings of one mind, the features

The types and symbols of Eternity,
Of first, and last, and midst, and without end
(From The Prelude)

Strange fits of passion have I known And I will dare to tell, But in the Lover's ear alone, What once to me befel.

Of the same face, blossoms upon oue tree,

Characters of the great Apocalypse,

When she I loved looked every day Fresh as a rose in Jnne, I to her cottage bent my way, Beneath an evening moon

Upon the moon I fixed my eye, All over the wide lea, With quickening pace my horse drew nigh Those paths so dear to me

And now we reached the orchard plot, And, as we climbed the hill, The sinking moon to Lucy's cot Came near, and nearer still.

In one of those sweet dreams I slept, Kind Nature's gentlest boon ' And all the while my eyes I kept On the descending moon.

My horse moved on, hoof after hoof He raised, and never stopped When down behind the cottage roof, At once, the bright moon dropped

What fond and wayward thoughts will slide Into a Lover's head! 'O mercy!' to myself I cried, 'If Lucy should be dead!'

(From Lyrical Ballads, vol. 11., 1800)

She dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,
A Maid whom there were none to praise
And very few to love

A violet by a mossy stone '
Half Indden from the eye!
—Fair as a star, when only oue
Is shining in the sky

She lived unknown, and few could know When Liney ceased to be,
But she is in her grave, and, oh,
The difference to me!

(From Lyrical Ballads, vol 11., 1800.)

Three years she grew in sun and shower, Then Nature said, 'A lovelier flower On earth was never sown, This Child I to myself will take, She shall be mine, and I will make A Lady of my own

Myself will to my darling be Both law and impulse and with me
The Girl, in rock and plain,
In earth and heaven, in glade and bower,
Shall feel au overseeing power
To kindle or restrain

She shall be sportive as the fawn That wild with glee across the lawn Or up the mountain springs, And hers shall be the breathing balm, And hers the silence and the calm Of mute insensate things

The floating clouds their state shall lend To her, for her the willow bend, Nor shall she fail to see Even in the motions of the Storm Grace that shall mould the Maiden's form By silent sympathy

The stars of midnight shall be dear To her, and she shall lean her ear In many a secret place Where rivulets dance their wayward round, And beauty born of murmuring sound Shall pass into her face.

And vital feelings of delight Shall rear her form to stately height, Her virgin bosom swell, Such thoughts to Lucy I will give While she and I together live Here in this happy dell'

Thus Nature spake—The work was done—How soon my Lucy's race was run! She died, and left to me
This heath, this calm, and quiet scene,
The memory of what has been,
And never more will be.

(From Lyrical Ballads, vol 11, 1800.)

A slumber did my spirit seal,
I had no human fears,
She seemed a thing that could not feel
The touch of earthly years.

No motion has she now, no force,
She neither hears not sees,
Rolled round in earth's diurnal course,
With rocks, and stones, and trees
(From Lyrical Ballads, vol. 11., 1800)

I travelled among unknown men, In lands beyond the sea, Nor, England! did I know till then What love I bore to thee.

'Tis past, that melaneholy dream '
Nor will I quit thy shore
A second time, for still I seem To love thee more and more.

Among thy mountains did I feel
The joy of my desire,
And she I cherished turned her wheel
Beside an English fire.

Thy mornings showed, thy nights concealed
The bowers where Lucy played,
And thine too is the last green field
That Lucy's eyes surveyed

(From Peents, 1807)

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils,
Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine And twinkle on the milky way, They stretched in never ending line Along the margin of a bay Ten thousand saw I at a glance, Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them dauced, but they Outdid the sparkling waves in glee A poet could not but be gay, In such a jocuid company I gazed—and gazed—but little thought What wealth the show to me had brought

For oft, when on my couch I lie
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude,
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils

(From Poents, 1807)

Resolution and Independence

There was a roaring in the wind all night,
The rain came heavily and fell in floods,
But now the sun is rising calm and bright,
The birds are singing in the distant woods,
Over his own sweet voice the Stock dove broods,
The Jay makes answer as the Magpie chatters,
And all the air is filled with pleasant noise of waters.

All things that love the sun ure out of doors, The sky rejoices in the morning's birth. The grass is bright with rain-drops,—on the moors. The hare is running races in her mirth, And with her feet she from the plashy earth. Raises a mist, that, glittering in the sun, Runs with her all the way, wherever she doth run.

I was a Traveller then upon the moor,
I saw the hare that raced about with joy,
I heard the woods and distant waters roar,
Or heard them not, as happy as a boy
The pleasant season did my heart employ
My old remembrances went from me wholly,
And all the ways of men, so vain and melancholy

But, as it sometimes chanceth, from the might
Of joy in minds that can no further go,
As high as we have mounted in delight
In our dejection do we sink as low,
To me that morning did it happen so
And fears and fancies thick upon me came [name.
Dim saduess—and blind thoughts, I knew not, nor could

I heard the skylark warbling in the sky, And I bethought me of the playful hare Even such a happy Child of earth am I. Even as these blissful creatures do I fare, Far from the world I walk, and from all care, But there may come another day to me—Solitude, pain of heart, distress, and poverty

My whole life I have lived in pleasant thought, As if life's business were a summer mood, As if all needful things would come unsought To genial faith, still rich in genial good, But how can He expect that others should Build for him, sow for him, and at his call Love him, who for himself will take no heed at all?

I thought of Chatterton, the marvellons Boy,
The sleepless Soul that perished in his pride,
Of Him who walked in glory and in joy
Following his plough, along the mountain side
By our own spirits are we defied
We Poets in our youth begin in gladness,
But thereof come in the end despondence and madness

Now, whether it were by peculiar grace,
A leading from above, a something given,
Yet it befel that, in this lonely place,
When I with these untoward thoughts had striven, Beside a pool bare to the eye of heaven
I saw a Man before me unawares
The oldest man he seemed that ever wore grey hairs.

As a huge stone is sometimes seen to lie Couched on the bald top of an eminence, Wonder to all who do the same espy, By what means it could thither come, and whence, So that it seems a thing endued with sense Like a sea beast erawled forth, that on a shelf Of rock or sand reposeth, there to sun itself,

Such seemed this Mun, not all alive nor dead, Nor all asleep—in his extreme old age. His body was bent double, feet and head. Coning together in life's pilgrimage, As if some dire constraint of pain, or rage. Of sickness felt by him in times long past, A more than human weight upon his frame had east.

Himself he propped, limbs, body, and pale face, Upon a long grey staff of shaven wood And, still as I drew near with gentle pace, Upon the margin of that moorish flood Motionless as a cloud the old Man stood, That heareth not the loud winds when they call And moveth all together, if it move at all

At length, himself unsettling, he the pond Stirred with his staff, and fixedly did look Upon the muddy water, which he conned, As if he had been reading in a book. And now a stranger's privilege I took, And, drawing to his side, to him did say, 'This morning gives us promise of a glorious day '

A gentle answer did the old Man make, In courteous speech which forth he slowly drew And him with further words I thus bespake, 'What occupation do you there pursue? This is a lonesome place for one like you? Ere he replied, a flash of mild surprise Broke from the sable orbs of his yet-vivid eyes His words came feebly, from a feeble chest,

But each in solemn order followed each, With something of a lofty utterance drest-Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach Of ordinary men, a stately speech, Such as grave Livers do in Scotland use, Religious men, who give to God and man their dues

He told, that to these waters he had come To gather leeches, being old and poor Employment hazardous and wearisome ! And he had many hardships to endure From pond to pond he roamed, from moor to moor, Housing, with God's good help, by choice or chance, And in this way he gained an honest maintenance.

The old Man still stood talking by my side, But now his voice to me was like a stream Scarce heard, nor word from word could I divide, And the whole body of the Man did seem Like one whom I had met with in a dream, Or like a man from some far region sent, To give me human strength, by apt admonishment My former thoughts returned the fear that kills, And hope that is unwilling to be fed. Cold, pain, and labour, and all fleshly ills, And mighty Poets in their misery dead -Perplexed, and longing to be comforted, My question eagerly did I renew,

He with a smile did then his words repeat, And said, that, gathering leeches, for and wide He travelled; stirring thus about his feet The waters of the pools where they abide. 'Once I could meet with them on every side, But they have dwindled long by slow decay, Yet still I persevere, and find them where I may '

'How is it that you live, and what is it you do?'

While he was talking thus, the lonely place, The old Man's shape, and speech-all troubled me In my mind's eye I seemed to see him pace About the weary moors continually, Wandering about alone and silently While I these thoughts within myself pursued, He, having made a pause, the same discourse renewed

And soon with this he other matter blended, Cheerfully uttered, with demeanour kind But stately in the main, and when he ended, I could have laughed myself to scorn to find In that decrepit Man so firm a mind "God," said I, "be my help and stay secure I'll tlink of the I eech gatherer on the lonely moor 1" (From Parms, 1807) The Green Linnet

Beneath these fruit tree boughs that shed Their snow-white blossoms on my head With brightest sunshine round me spread

Of spring's unclouded weather, In this sequestered nook how sweet To sit upon my orchard seat ! And birds and flowers once more to greet, My last year's friends together

One have I marked, the happiest guest In all this covert of the blest Hail to Thee, far above the rest

In joy of voice and pinion! Thou, Linnet 1 in thy green array, Presiding Spirit here to-day, Dost lead the revels of the May,

And this is thy dominion

While birds, and butterflies, and flowers Make all one band of paramours, Thou, ranging up and down the bovers.

Art sole in thy employment A Life, a Presence like the Air, Scattering thy gladness without care Too blest with any one to palr, Thyself thy own enjoyment

Amid von tuft of liazel trees, That twinkle to the gusty breeze, Behold him perched in eestasies,

Yet seeming still to hover, There ' where the flutter of his wings Upon his back and body flings Shadows and sunny glimmerings, That cover him all over

My dazzled sight he oft deceives, A Brother of the dancing leaves, Then flits, and from the cottage eaves

Pours forth his song in guslies. As if by that exulting strain He mocked and treated with disdain The voiceless Form he chose to feign,

While fluttering in the hushes (From Poems, 1807)

The Solitary Reaper

Behold lier, single in the field, Yon solitary Highland Lass! Reaping and singing by herself, Stop here, or gently pass I Alone she cuts and binds the grain, And sings a melancholy strain; O listen ' for the Vale profound Is overflowing with the sound No Nightingale did ever chaunt So sweetly to reposing bands Of travellers in some shady haunt. Among Arabian sands A voice so thrilling ne'er was heard In spring time from the Cuckoo-bird, Breaking the silence of the seas Among the farthest Hehndes.

Wall no one tell me what she sing 2-Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow For old, unhappy, far-off things, And battles long ago

Or is it some more humble lay, Familiar matter of to day? Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain, That has been, and may be again?

Whate'er the theme, the Maiden sang As if her song could have no ending, I saw her singing at her work, And o'er the sickle bending — I listened, motionless and still, And, as I mounted up the hill, The music in my heart I bore, Long after it was heard no more.

(From Poeins, 1807)

Yarrow Unvisited.

(See the various Poems the scene of which is laid upon the banks of the Yarrow, in particular, the exquisite Ballad of Hamilton beginning,

Busk ye, busk ye, my bonny, bonny Bride, Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome Marrow! --)

From Stirling castle we had seen
The mazy Forth unravelled,
Had trod the banks of Clyde, and Tay,
And with the Tweed had travelled,
And when we came to Clovenford,
Then said my 'winsome Marrow,' 'Whate'er betide, we'll turn aside,
And see the Braes of Yarrow'

'Let Yarrow folk, frae Selkirk town, Who have been buying, selling, Go back to Yarrow, 'tis their own, Each maiden to her dwelling! On Yarrow's banks let herons feed, Hares couch, and rabbits burrow! But we will downward with the Tweed, Nor turn aside to Yarrow

There s Galla Water, Leader Haughs, Both lying right before us, And Dryborough, where with chiming Tweed The lintwhites sing in chorus, There's pleasant Tiviot dale, a land Made blithe with plough and harrow Why throw away a needful day To go in search of Yarrow?

What's Yarrow but a river bare,
That glides the dark hills under?
There are a thousand such elsewhere
As worthy of your wonder'
—Strange words they seemed of slight and scorn,
My True love sighed for sorrow
And looked me in the face, to think
I thus could speak of Yarrow!

'Oh! green,' said I, 'are Yarrow's holms,
And sweet is Yarrow flowing!
Fair hangs the apple frae the rock,
But we will leave it growing
O'er hilly path, and open Strath,
We'll wander Scotland thorough,
But, though so near, we will not turn
Into the dale of Yarrow

Let beeves and home bred Line partake The sweets of Burn mill meadow The swan on still St Mary's Lake Float double, swan and shadow! We will not see them, will not go, To day nor yet to morrow, Enough if in our hearts we know There's such a place as Yarrow

Be Yarrow stream unseen, unknown!
It must, or we shall rue it
We have a vision of our own,
Ah! why should we undo it?
The treasured dreams of times long past,
We'll keep them, winsome Marrow!
For when we're there, although 'tis fair,
'Twill be another Yarrow!

If Care with freezing years should come,
And wandering seem but folly,—
Should we be loth to stir from home,
And yet be melancholy,
Should life be dull, and spirits low,
'Twill sootlie us in our sorrow,
That earth has something yet to show,
The bonny holms of Yarrow'

Yarrow Visited-September 1814.

And is this—Yarrow?—This the Stream Of which my fancy cherished, So faithfully, a waking dream? An image that hith perished! O that some Minstrel's harp were near, To utter notes of gladness, And chase this silence from the ur, That fills my heart with sadness!

Yet why?—a silvery current flows
With uncontrolled meanderings,
Nor have these eyes by greener hills
Been soothed, in all my wanderings.
And, through her depths, Saint Mary's Lake
Is visibly delighted,
For not a feature of those hills
Is in the mirror slighted

A blue sky bends o'er Yarrow vale. Save where that pearly whiteness Is round the rising sun diffused, A tender hazy brightness, Mild dawn of promise that excludes All profitless dejection, Though not unwilling here to admit A pensive recollection

Where was it that the famous Flower
Of Yarrow Vale lay bleeding?
His bed perchance was yon smooth mound
On which the herd is feeding
And haply from this crystal pool,
Now peaceful as the morning,
The Water wraith ascended thrice—
And gave his doleful warning

Delicious is the Lay that sings. The haunts of happy Lovers,
The path that leads them to the grove,
The leafy grove that covers.
And Pity sanctifies the Verse.
That paints, by strength of sorrow,
The unconquerable strength of love,
Bear witness, rueful Yarrow!

But thou, that didst appear so fair To fond imagination, Dost rival in the light of day Her delicate creation Meek loveliness is round thee spread, A softness still and holy, The grace of forest charms decayed, And pastoral melancholy

That region left, the vale unfolds Rich groves of lofty stature, With Yarrow winding through the pomp Of cultivated nature, And, rising from those lofty groves, Behold a Rnin hoary The shattered front of Newark's Towers, Renowned in Border story

Fair scenes for childhood's opening bloom, For sportive youth to stray in, For manhood to enjoy his strength, And age to wear away in ' You cottage seems a bower of bliss, A covert for protection Of tender thoughts, that nestle there-The brood of chaste affection.

How sweet, on this antumnal day, The wild wood fruits to gather, And on my True love's forehead plant A crest of blooming heather ! And what if I enwreathed my own! 'Twere no offence to reason, The sober Hills thus deck their brows To meet the wintry season.

I see-but not by sight alone, Loved Yarrow, have I won thee, A ray of fancy still survives-Her sunshine plays upon thee ! Thy ever youthful waters keep A course of lively pleasure And gladsome notes my lips can breathe, Accordant to the measure.

The vapours linger round the Heights, They melt, and soon must vanish, One honr is theirs, nor more is mine-Sad thought, which I would banish, But that I know, where'er I go, Thy genuine image, Yarrow ! Will dwell with me-to heighten joy, And cheer my mind in sorrow

Yarrow Revisited.

(The following Stanzas are a memorial of a day passed with Sir Walter Scott and other Friends visiting the Banks of the Yarrow under his guidance, immediately before his departure from Abbots ford, for Naples. The title Varrow Remaited will stand in no need of explanation for Readers acquainted with the Author's previous poems suggested by that celebrated Stream.)

> The gallant Yonth, who may have gained, Or seeks, a 'winsome Marrow,' Was but an Infant in the lap When first I looked on Yarrow Once more, by Newark's Castle gate Long left without a warder, I stood, looked, listened, and with Thee, Great Minstrel of the Border!

Grave thoughts ruled wide on that sweet day, Their dignity installing In gentle bosoms, while sere leaves Were on the bow, or falling, But breezes played, and sunshine gleamed-The forest to enibolden, Reddened the fiery hues, and shot Transparence through the golden. For busy thoughts the Stream flowed on In foamy agitation, And slept in many a crystal pool For quiet contemplation No public and no private care

The freeborn mind enthralling, We made a day of happy hours, Our happy days recalling Brisk Youth appeared, the Morn of youth, With freaks of graceful folly,-Life's temperate Noon, her sober Lve, Her Night not melancholy, Past, present, future, all appeared In harmony united, Like guests that meet, and some from far, By cordial love invited.

And if, as Yarrow, through the woods And down the meadow ranging, Did meet us with unaltered face. Though we were changed and changing, If, then, some natural shadows spread Our inward prospect over, The sonl's deep valley was not slow Its brightness to recover

Eternal blessings on the Muse, And her divine employment I The blameless Muse, who trains her Sons For hope and calm enjoyment, Albeit sickness, lingering yet, Has o'er their pillow brooded, And Care wavlays their steps-a Sprite Not easily eluded

For thee, O Scott! compelled to change Green Eildon hill and Cheviot For warm Vesuvio's vine-clad slopes, And leave thy Tweed and Tiviot For mild Sorrento's breezy waves, May classic Fancy, linking With native Fancy her fresh aid, Preserve thy heart from sinking '

O' while they minister to thee, Each vying with the other, May Health return to mellow Age With Strength her venturous brother ! And Tiber, and each brook and rill Renowned in song and story, With unimagined beauty shine, Nor lose one ray of glory !

For Thou, upon a hundred streams By tales of love and sorrow, Of faithful love, undaunted truth, Hast shed the power of Yarrow, And streams unknown, hills yet unseen, Wherever they invite Thee, At parent Nature's grateful call, With gladness must requite Thee.

A gracious welcome shall be thine, Such looks of love and honour As thy own Yarrow gave to me
When first I gazed upon her, Beheld what I had feared to see, Unwilling to surrender Dreams treasured up from early days, The holy and the tender

And what, for this frail world, were all
That mortals do or suffer,
Did no responsive harp, no pen,
Memorial tribute offer?
Yea, what were mighty Nature's self?
Her features, could they win us,
Unhelped by the poetic voice
That hourly speaks within us?

Nor deem that localised Romance
Plays false with our affections,
Unsanctifies our tears—made sport
For fanciful dejections
Oh, no! the visions of the past
Sustain the heart in feeling
Life as she is—our changeful Life
With friends and kindred dealing

Bear witness, Ye, whose thoughts that day
In Yafrow's groves were centred,
Who through the silent portal arch
Of mouldering Newark enter d,
And clomb the winding stair that once
Too timidly was mounted
By the 'last Minstrel,' (not the last ')
Ere he his Tale recounted.

Flow on for ever, Yarrow Stream!

Fulfil thy pensive duty,

Well pleased that future Bards should chant

For simple hearts thy beauty,

To dream light dear while yet unseen,

Dear to the common sunshine,

And dearer still, as now I feel,

To memory's shadowy moonshine!

(1831, published 1835.)

Gipsies

Yet are they here the same unbroken knot Of human Beings, in the self same spot ' Men, women, children, yea the frame Of the whole spectacle the same ! Only their fire seems bolder, yielding light, Now deep and red, the colouring of night, That on their Gipsy faces falls, Their bed of straw and blanket walls. -Twelve hours, twelve bounteous hours are gone, while I Have been a traveller under open sky, Much witnessing of change and cheer. Yet as I left I find them here ! The weary Sun betook hunself to rest,-Then issued Vesper from the fulgent west, Outshiming like a visible God The glorious path in which he trod And now, ascending, after one dark hour And one night's diminution of her power,

Behold the mighty Moon! this way

She looks as if at them-but they Regard not her —oh better wrong and strife

(By nature transient) than this torpid life,

Life which the very stars reprove
As on their silent tasks they move!

Yet, witness all that stirs in heaven or earth!
In scorn I speak not,—they are what their birth And breeding suffer them to be,

Wild outcasts of society!

(From Paens, 1807)

Ode to Duty

'Jam non consilio bonus, sed more eb perductus, ut non tantum recte facere possim, sed nisi recte facere non possim.'

Stern Daughter of the Voice of God!

O Duty! if that name thou love
Who art a light to guide, a rod
To check the erring, and reprove,
Thou, who art victory and law
When empty terrors overawe,
From vain temptations dost set free,
And calm'st the weary strife of frail humanity!

There are who ask not if thine eye
Be on them, who, in love and truth,
Where no misgiving is, rely Upon the genial sense of youth
Glad Hearts! without reproach or blot,
Who do thy work, and know it not Oh! if through confidence misplaced
They fail, thy saving arms, dread Power! around them cast.

Serene will be our days and bright,
And happy will our nature be,
When love is an unerring light,
And joy its own security
And they a blissful course may hold
Even now, who, not unwisely bold,
Live in the spirit of this creed,
Yet seek thy firm support, according to their need.

I, loving freedom, and untried,
No sport of every rindom gust,
Yet being to myself a guide,
Too blindly liave reposed my trust
And oft, when in my heart was heard
Thy timely mandate, I deferred
The task, in smoother walks to stray,
But thee I now would serve more strictly, if I may

Through no disturbance of my soul,
Or strong compunction in me wrought,
I supplicate for thy control,
But in the quietness of thought
Me this unchartered freedom tires,
I feel the weight of chance desires
My hopes no more must change their name,
I long for a repose that ever is the same.

Stern Lawgiver! yet thou dost wear
The Godhead's most benignant grace,
Nor know we any thing so fair
As is the smile npon thy face
Flowers laugh before thee on their beds,
And fragrance in thy footing treads,
Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong,
And the most ancient heavens, through Thee, are fresh and strong

To humbler functions, awful Power l
I call thee I myself commend Unto thy guidance from this hour,
Oh, let my weakness have an end '
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self sacrifice,
The confidence of reason give,
And in the light of truth thy Bondman let me live!

(From Poems, 1807)

Character of the Happy Warrior Who is the happy Warrior? Who is lie That every man in arms should wish to be? -It is the generous Spirit, who, when brought Among the tasks of real life, hath wrought Upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought Whose high endeavours are an inward light That makes the path before him always bright Who, with a natural instinct to discern What knowledge can perform, is diligent to learn, Abides by this resolve, and stops not there, But makes his moral being his prime care, Who, doomed to go in company with Pain, And Fear, and Bloodshed, miserable train Turns his necessity to glorious gain, In face of these doth exercise a power Which is our human nature's highest dower, Controls them and subdues, transmntes, bereaves Of their bad influence, and their good receives By objects, which might force the soul to abate Her feeling, rendered more compassionate, Is placable—because occasions rise So often that demand such sacrifice, More skilful in self knowledge, even more pure, As tempted more, more able to endure As more exposed to suffering and distress, Thence, also, more alive to tenderness -Tis he whose law is reason, who depends Upon that law as on the best of friends, Whence, in a state where men are tempted still To evil for a guard against worse ill, And what in quality or act is best Doth seldom on a right foundation rest, He labours good on good to fix, and owes To virtue every triumph that he knows -Who if he rise to station of command, Rises by open means, and there will stand On hononrable terms, or else retire, And in himself possess his own desire, Who comprehends his trust, and to the same Keeps faithful with a singleness of aim, And therefore does not stoop, nor he in wait For wealth, or honours, or for worldly state Whom they must follow, on whose head must fall, Like showers of manna, if they come at all Whose powers shed round him in the common strife, Or mild concerns of ordinary life, A constant infinence, a peculiar grace, But who, if he be called upon to face Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined Great issnes, good or bad for human kind, Is happy as a Lover, and attired With sudden brightness, like a Man inspired, And, through the heat of conflict, keeps the law In calmness made, and sees what he foresaw, Or if an inexpected call succeed, Come when it will, is equal to the need

-He who, though thus endued as with a sense And faculty for storm and turbulence, Is yet a Soul whose master bias leans To home felt pleasures and to gentle scenes, Sweet images! which, wheresoe'er he be, Are at his heart, and such fidelity It is his darling passion to approve, More brave for this, that he hath much to love -'Tis, finally, the Man who, lifted high, Conspicuous object in a Nation's eye, Or left unthought of in obscurity,-Who, with a toward or untoward lot, Prosperous or adverse, to his wish or not-Plays, in the many games of life, that one Where what he most doth value must be won Whom neither shape of danger can dismay, Nor thought of tender happiness betray, Who, not content that former worth stand fast, Looks forward, persevering to the last From well to better, daily self surpast Who, whether praise of him must walk the earth For ever, and to noble deeds give birth, Or he must fall, to sleep without his fame, And leave a dead unprofitable name-Finds comfort in himself and in his cause, And, while the mortal mist is gathering, draws His breath in confidence of Heaven's applause This is the happy Warrior, this is He That every Man in arms should wish to be. (From Poemis, 1807)

Ode —Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood.

The Child is father of the Man, And I could wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream, The earth, and every common sight,

To me did seem Apparelled in celestial light, The glory and the freshness of a dream.

It is not now as it hath been of yore,— Turn wheresoe'er I may,

By night or by day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.

The Rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the Rose,
The Moon doth with delight
Look round her when the heavens are bare,
Waters on a starry night
Are beautiful and fair,
The snnshine is a glorious birth,
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath past away a glory from the earth

Now, while the birds thus sing a joyons song, And while the young lambs bound

As to the tabor's sound,
To me alone there came a thought of grief
A timely ntterance gave that thought relief,
And I again am strong

The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep;
No more shall grief of mine the season wrong,
I hear the Echoes through the mountains throng,
The Winds come to me from the fields of sleep,
And all the earth is gay,

Land and sea

Give themselves up to jollity,

And with the heart of May

Doth every Beast keep holiday,

Thou Child of Joy,

Shout round me, let me hear thy shouts, thou happy Shepherd boy '

Ye blessed Creatures, I have heard the call Ye to each other make, I see The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee, My heart is at your festival,

My head hath its coronal,

The fulness of your bliss, I feel—I feel at all,

Oh evil day! if I were sullen

While Earth herself is adorning,

This sweet May morning, And the Children are culling On every side,

In a thousand valleys far and wide, Tresh flowers, while the sun shines warm,

And the Babe leaps up on his Mother's arm — I hear, I hear, with joy I hear'

-But there's a Tree, of many, one,

A single Field which I have looked upon, Both of them speak of something that is gone The Pansy at my feet

Doth the same tale repeat

Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star, Hath had elsewhere its setting,

> And cometh from afar Not in entire forgetfulness, And not in utter nakedness,

But trailing clouds of glory do we come

From God, who is our home Here en hes about us in our infiner! Shades of the prison house begin to close

Upon the growing Boy,

But He beholds the light, and whence it flows He sees it in his joy,

The youth, who daily farther from the east
Must travel, still is Nature's Priest,
And by the vision splended
Is on his way attended,

At length the Man perceives it die away, And fade into the light of common day

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own, Yeurnings she hath in her own natural kind, And even with something of a Mother's mind,

And no unworthy aim,
The homely Nurse doth all she can

To make her Foster child, her Inmate Man, Forget the glories he hath known, And that imperial palace whence he came Behold the Child among his new born blisses, A six years' Darling of a pigmy size!

See, where 'mid work of his own hand he lies, Freited by sallies of his mother's kisses, With light upon him from his father's eyes!

See, at his feet, some little plan or chart, Some fragment from his dream of human life, Shaped by himself with newly learned art

A wedding or a festival,
A mourning or a funeral,
And this hath now his heart,
And unto this he frames his song
Then will he fit his tongue
To dialogues of business, love, or strife,

But it will not be long Ere this be thrown aside,

And with new joy and pride

The little Actor cons another part,
Filling from time to time his 'humorous stage'
With all the Persons, down to palsied Age,
That Life brings with her in her equipage,

As if his whole vocation Were endless imitation.

Thou, whose exterior semblance doth belie
Thy Soul's immensity, Thou best Philosopher, who yet dost keep Thy heritage, thou Eye among the blind,
That, deaf and silent, read'st the eternal deep,
Haunted for ever by the eternal mind,—

Mighty Prophet I Seer blest!
On whom those truths do rest,

On whom those truths do rest,
Which we are toiling all our lives to find,
In darkness lost, the darkness of the grave,
Thou, over whom thy Immortality
Broods like the Day, a Master o'er a Slave,
A presence which is not to be put by,
Thou little Child, yet glorious in the might
Of heaven born freedom on thy being's height,
Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
Full soon thy Soul shall have her earthly freight,
And custom he upon thee with a weight,
Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life!

O joy! that in our embers Is something that doth live, That nature yet remembers What was so fugitive!

The thought of our past years in me doth breed Perpetual benediction—not indeed For that which is most worthy to be blest, Delight and liberty, the simple creed Of Childhood, whether busy or at rest, With new fledged hope still fluttering in his breast—

Not for these I raise
The song of thanks and praise,
But for those obstinate questionings
Of sense and outward things,
Fallings from us, vanishings,
Blank misgivings of a Creature

Moving about in worlds not realised, High instincts before which our mortal Nature Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised

But for those first affections,
Those shadowy recollections,

Which, be they what they may, Are yet the fountain light of all our day, Are yet a master light of all our seeing,

Uphold us, eherish, and have power to make Our noisy years seem moments in the being Of the eternal Silence truths that wake,

To pensh never, Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavour, Nor Man nor Boy,
Nor all that is at enmity with joy,
Can utterly abolish or destroy!
Hence in a season of calm weather
Though inland far we be,
Our Souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither,
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the Children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore

Then sing, ye Birds, sing, sing a joyous song!

And let the young Lambs bound

As to the tabor's sound!

We in thought will join your throng,

Ye that pipe and ye that play,

Ye that through your hearts to-day

Feel the gladness of the May! What though the radiance which was once so bright Be now for ever taken from my sight,

Though nothing can bring back the hour
Of splendour in the grass, of glory in the flower,
We will grieve not, rather find Strength in what remains behind,
In the primal sympathy
Which having been must ever be
In the soothing thoughts that spring
Out of human suffering,
In the faith that looks through death

In years that bring the philosophic mind

And O, ye Fountains, Meadows, Hills, and Groves, Forebode not any severing of our loves! Yet in my heart of hearts I feel your might, I only have relinquished one delight. To live beneath your more habitual sway. I love the Brooks which down their channels fret, Even more than when I tripped lightly as they, The innocent brightness of a new born Day.

Is lovely yet,
The Clouds that gather round the setting sun
Do take a sober colouring from an eye
That hath lept watch o'er man's mortality,
Another race hath been, and other palms are won
Thanks to the human heart by which we live,
Thanks to its tenderness, its joys, and fears,
To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often he too deep for tears

(From Poems, 1807)

If this great world of joy and pain Revolve in one sure track, If freedom, set, will rise again, And virtue, flown, come back, Woe to the purblind crew who fill The heart with each day's care, Nor gain, from past or future, skill To bear, and to forbear!

(1833, published 1835)

Composed upon Westminster Bridge September 3 1802.

Earth has not any thing to show more fair Dull would he be of soul who could pass by A sight so touching in its majesty
This City now doth, like a garment, wear
The beauty of the morning, silent, bare,

Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie Open unto the fields, and to the sky, All bright and glittering in the smokeless air Never did sin more beautifully steep. In his first splendour, valley, rock, or hill, Ne er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep. The river glideth at his own sweet will Dear God, the very houses seem asleep, And all that mighty heart is lying still.

On the Extinction of the Venetian Republic.

Once did She hold the gorgeous east in fee, And was the safeguard of the west—the worth Of Venice did not fall below her birth, Venice, the eldest Child of Liberty
She was a maiden City, bright and free, And guile seduced, no force could violate, And, when she took unto herself a Mate, She must espoise the everlasting Sen.
And what if she had seen those glories fade, Those titles vanish, and that strength decay, Yet shall some tribute of regret be paid When her long life hath reached its final day Men are we, and must grieve when even the Shade Of that which once was great is passed away

To Toussaint L'Ouverture

Toussaint, the most unhappy man of men 1
Whether the whistling Rustie tend his plough
Within thy hearing, or thy head be now
Pillowed in some deep dungeon's earless den,— O miserable Chieftain! where and when Wilt thou find patience? Yet die not, do thou
Wear rather in thy bonds a cheerful brow
Though fallen thyself, never to rise again,
Live, and take comfort—Thou hast left behind
Powers that will work for thee, air, earth, and skies,
There's not a breathing of the common wind
That will forget thee, thou hast great allies,
Thy friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man's unconquerable mind

September 1802

Inland, within a hollow vale, I stood,
And saw, while sea was calm and air was clear,
The coast of France—the coast of France how near!
Drawn almost into frightful neighbourhood
I shrunk, for verily the barrier flood
Was like a lake, or river bright and fair,
A span of waters, yet what power is there!
What mightiness for evil and for good!
Even so doth God protect us if we be Virtuous and wise Winds blow, and waters roll, Strength to the brave, and Power, and Deity,
Yet in themselves are nothing! One decree
Spake laws to them, and said that by the soul
Only, the Nations shall be great and free.

It is not to be thought of that the Flood Of British freedom, which, to the open sea Of the world's praise, from dark antiquity Hath flowed, 'with pomp of waters, unwithstood,' Roused though it be full often to a mood Which spurns the check of salutary bands, That this most famous Stream in bogs and sands Should perish, and to evil and to good Be lost for ever In our halls is hung Armoury of the invincible Knights of old We must be free or die, who speak the tongue That Shakspeare spake, the faith and morals hold Which Milton held -In every thing we are sprung Of Earth's first blood, have titles manifold

The world is too much with us late and soon, Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers Little we see in Nature that is ours, We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon i This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon, The winds that will be howling at all hours, And are up gathered now like sleeping flowers, For this, for every thing, we are out of tune, It moves us not -Great God! I'd rather be A Pagun suckled in a creed outworn, So might I, standing on this pleasant lea, Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn, Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea, Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn

Where hes the Land to which you Ship must go? Fresh as a lark mounting at break of day, Festively she puts forth in trim array, Is she for tropic suns, or polar snow? What boots the inquiry?—Neither friend nor foe She cares for, let her travel where she may She finds familiar names, a beaten way Ever before her, and a wind to blow Yet still I ask, what haven is her mark? And, almost as it was when ships were rare, (From time to time, like Pilgrims, here and there Crossing the waters) doubt and something dark, Of the old Sea some reverential fear, Is with me at thy forewell, joyous Bark ! (From Poems 1807)

Burns

In illustration of this sentiment, permit me to remind you that it is the privilege of poetic genius to catch, under certain restrictions of which perhaps at the time of its being exerted it is but dimly conscious, a spirit of pleasure wherever it can be found-in the walks of nature, and in the business of men -The poet, trusting to primary instincts, luxurates among the felicities of love and wine, and is enraptured while he describes the fairer aspects of war nor does he shrink from the company of the passion of love though immoderate-from convival pleasure though intemperate-nor from the presence of war though savage, and recognised as the hand maid of desolation. Frequently and admirably has Burns given way to these impulses of nature, both with reference to himself and in describing the condition of others. Who, but some impenetrable dunce or narrow minded puritan in works of art, ever read without delight the picture which he has drawn of the convivial exalta tion of the rustic adventurer, Tam o' Shanter? poet fears not to tell the reader in the outset that his hero was a desperate and sortish drunkard, whose exces es were frequent as his opportunities. This repro late sits down to his cubs, while the storm is roaring, and heaven and earth are in confusion, -the night is driven on by song and tumultuous noise-laughter and jest thicken as the beverage improves upon the palateconjugal fidelity archly bends to the service of general benevolence-selfishness is not absent, but wearing the mask of social cordiality-and, while these various elements of humanity are blended into one proud and happy composition of elated spirits, the anger of the tempest without doors only heightens and sets off the enjoy ment within -I pity him who cannot perceive that, in all this, though there was no moral purpose, there is a moral effect

> 'Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious, O'er a' the ells of life victorious'

> > (From 'A letter to a friend of Robert Burns, 1816.)

A Delusion Confuted

But it is a belief propagated in books, and which passes currently among talking men as part of their familiar wisdom, that the hearts of the many are constitutionally weak, that they do languish, and are slow to answer to the requisitions of things I entreat those who are in this delusion to look behind them and about them for the evidence of experience Now this, rightly understood, not only gives no support to any such belief, but proves that the truth is in direct opposition to it. The history of all ages, tumults after tumults, wars, foreign or civil, with short or with no breathing spaces, from generation to generation, wars-why and where fore? yet with courage, with perseverance, with selfsacrifice, with enthusiasm-with cruelty driving forward the cruel man from its own terrible nakedness, and attracting the more benign by the accompaniment of some shadow which seems to sanctify it, the senseless weaving and interweaving of factions-vanishing and reviving and piercing each other like the Northern Lights, public commotions, and those in the bosom of the individual, the long calenture to which the Lover is subject, the blast, like the blast of the desert, which succeps perenuially through a frightful solitude of its own making in the mind of the Gamester, the slowly quickening but over quickening descent of appetite down which the Miser is propelled, the agony and cleaving oppression of grief, the ghost like hauntings of shame, the meubus of revenge, the life distemper of ambition, -these inward existences, and the visible and familiar occurrences of daily life in every town and village, the patient curiosity and contagious acclamations of the multitude in the streets of the city and within the walls of the theatre, a procession, or a rural dance, a hunting. or a horse race, a flood, or a fire, rejoicing and ringing of bells for an unexpected gift of good fortune, or the coming of a foolish heir to his estate, --- these demonstrate incontestably that the passions of men (I mean, the soul of sensibility in the heart of man)-in all quarrels, in all contests, in all quests, in all delights, in all employments which are either sought by men or thrust upon them-do immeasurably transcend their objects true sorrow of humanity consists in this, -not that the mind of man fails, but that the course and demands of action and of life so rarely correspond with the dignity and intensity of human desires and hence that which is slow to languish is too easily turned aside and abused But-with the remembrance of what has been done, and in the face of the interminable coils which are threatened -a Spaniard can never have cause to complain of this while a follower of the tyrant remains in arms upon the Peninsula. (From The Convention of Cintra, 1809.)

Ossian.

All hail, Macpherson hail to thee, Sire of Ossian! The Phantom was begotten by the smug embrace of an impudent Highlander upon a cloud of tradition-it travelled southward, where it was greeted with acclama tion, and the thin Consistence took its course through Europe, upon the breath of popular applause. The Editor of the Reliques had indirectly preferred a claim to the praise of invention, by not concealing that his supplementary labours were considerable! How selfish his conduct, contrasted with that of the disinterested Gael, who, like Lear, gives his kingdom away, and is content to become a pensioner upon his own issue for a beggarly pittance !- Open this far famed Book !-I have done so at random, and the beginning of the 'Epic Poem Temora,' in eight Books, presents itself 'The blue waves of Ullin roll in light. The green hills are covered with day. Trees shake their dusky heads in the breeze Grey torrents pour their noisy streams. Two green hills with aged oaks surround a narrow plain. The blue course of a stream is there On its banks stood Cairbar of Atha His spear sup ports the ling, the red eyes of his fear are sad. Cormac rises on his soul with all his ghastly wounds? Precious memorandums from the pocket-book of the blind Ossian '

If it be unbecoming, as I acknowledge that for the most part it is, to speak disrespectfully of Works that have enjoyed for a length of time a widely spread reputation, without at the same time producing irrefragable proofs of their unworthiness, let me be forgiven upon this occasion —Having had the good fortune to be born and reared in a monntainous country, from my very -childhood I have felt the falsehood that pervades the volumes imposed upon the world under the name of Ossian. From what I saw with my own eyes, I knew that the imagery was sphrious. In Nature everything is distinct, yet nothing defined into absolute independent singleness. In Macpherson's work it is exactly the reverse, everything (that is not stolen) is in this manner defined, insulated, dislocated, deadened,-yet nothing distinct. It will always be so when words are substi tuted for things. To say that the characters never could exist, that the manners are impossible, and that a dream has more substance than the whole state of society, as there depicted, is doing nothing more than pronouncing a censure which Macpherson defied, when, with the steeps of Morven before his eyes, he could talk so familiarly of his Car borne heroes, -of Morven, which, if one may judge from its appearance at the distance of a few miles, contains scarcely an acre of ground sufficiently accommodating for a sledge to be trailed along its surface.—Mr Malcolm Laing has ably shown that the diction of this pretended translation is a motley assemblage from all quarters, but he is so fond of making out parallel passages as to call poor Macpherson to account for his 'ands' and his 'buts' and he has weakened his argument by conducting it as if he thought that every striking resemblance was a conscious plagiarism It is enough that the coincidences are too remarkable for its being probable or possible that they could arise in different minds without communication between them. Now, as the Translators of the Bible, and Shakespeare, Milton, and Popc, could not be indebted to Macpherson, it follows that he must have owed his fine feathers to them, unless we are prepared gravely to assert, with Madame de Stael, that many of the characteristic beauties of our most celebrated English Poets are derived from the ancient Fingallian, in which case the modern translator would have been but giving back to Ossian his own—It is consistent that Lucien Buonaparte, who could censure Milton for having surrounded Satan in the infernal regions with courtly and regal splendour, should pronounce the modern Ossian to be the glory of Seotland—a country that has produced a Dinbar, a Buchanan, a Thomson, and a Birns!

The chief editions of Wordsworth's poetry are the author's editions published by Moxon (1836-37, 1845, and 1849-50), the library edition by Professor Knight (1882-86) that by Mr John Morley (1888) the Aldine edition by Professor Dowden (1893), and the complete edition with prose works, life, and Dorothy's journals and letters, by Professor Knight (16 vols. 1896-97). The text of the Lyrical Ballads (1793) has been reprinted with notes by Professor E. Dowden (1890) and Mr T Hutchinson (1898), and the Poems of 1807 have been also edited by Mr Hutchinson (2 vols. 1897) There are selections by Palgrave (1862), Matthew Arnold (1879), and Knight (1898) The prose works were collected by Grosart (3 vols. 1876) There are Lives by his nephew, [Bishop] Christopher Wordsworth (1851), F W H Myers (1880) J M Sutherland (1887), Elizabeth Wordsworth (1891), and Professor Knight (1880) The most important criticisms are those of Coleridge, M Arnold, Pater, Swinburne and W Raleigh (Wordstworth 1903). Dorothy Wordsworth (1771-1855), only sister of the poet, set up housekeeping with her brother in 1795 at Racedown Lodge in Dorset-In 1832 she had an attack of brain-fever from which she never entirely recovered. Her Journals Lept at Alfoxden and Grasmere, and the records of her journeys in Scotland, the Isle of Man, Germany, France, Switzerland, and Italy, reveal a mind as subtly sensitive to nature as the poet's own, and an exquisiteness of expression which he hardly surpassed 'She gave me eyes, she gave me ears,' said her brother, and, as Professor Shairp pointed out, his poems 'are sometimes little more than poetic versions of her descriptions of the objects which she had seen, and which he treated as if seen by himself' Compare these sentences from her journal with Wordsworth's poem quoted above (page 20)

Daffodils

When we were in the woods below Gowbarrow Park, we saw a few daffodils close by the water side. As we went along there were more and yet more, and at last, under the boughs of the trees, we saw there were a long belt of them along the shore. I never saw daffodils so beautiful. They grew among the mossy stones about them. Some rested their heads on the stones, as on a pillow, the rest tossed, and reeled, and danced, and seemed as if they verily laughed with the wind, they looked so gay and glancing

Dorothy Wordsworth s Tour in Scotland was edited by Principal Shairp in 1874, her Journals were edited by Professor Knight in 1897

Sir Walter Scott.

Walter Scott was born in Edinburgh on the His father, a Writer to the 15th of August 1771 Signet, vas of the family of Scott of Harden, his mother, Anne Rucherford, vas also of good Border descent on bo h sides The Border was truly Scott's own country, and he spent much of his childhood there, he had to be sent as ay from Edinburgh after the fever which lamed him. In his third year, at

Sandyl nove, he used to be left to lie on the grass all day long, vith his friend Sandy Ormistoun, the co -bulle, to take care of him

As he told Miss Sevard, he had a regiment of horse exercising through his head ever since he was five years old. Whatever may be due to his incestry for this bent of mind, at any rate it was helped in the most natural and old fashioned was b, his upbringing. He learned the history of his country as history was learned by Homer, no' out of books, to begin with The Bride of Lamn ermoor for example, is a story that came to Seo t's I no vier ge by oral tradition, like the stories of the hero cares

His lameness as he grew older ceased to interfere with his activity and enjoyment. High School of Edinburgh, to which he vent in 1778, he was not prevented from taking part in the common amusements, he climbed 'the kittle nine steps' of the Castle Rock, like Darsie Latimer, and shared in the battles of the Crosscauseway and the Potterrow The episode of Greenbreeks gave him an example of what is meant by chivalry, I the story, as he tells it, is as good as Richard and

In 1786 Scott was apprenticed to his father, in the next year he sav Burns at Professor Ferguson's, and as thanked by him for giving the author of a quotation which no one else in the company lnew (see Vol. II p 521) In 1792 he was called to the Bar, this was the year of his first raid into Liddesdule to look for ballads, along with Mr Shortrede, the Sheriff-Substitute of Roxburgh, who accompanied him in all these expeditions for seven years 'He was malin' himsell a' the time,' said Mr Shortrede, 'but he didna ken maybe what he was about till years had passed, at first he thought o' little, I dare say, but the queerness and the fun' In 1793 he saw the scenery of The Lady of the Lake, and heard from old men such stories of the Highlands as formed the groundwork of many of his novels up German, which at that time meant Romance and Poetry, and in 1795 made his translation of Bürgers Lenore, the ballad of terror and wonder Later, he translated Goethe's adventurous drama of Goetz of the Iron Hand (1799) romance and historical fiction doubtless helped him to find his way among his own subjects, the mingled likeness and difference of the German work quickening (if that were possible) his interest in kindred thenies at home, such as True Thomas or Kinmont Willie, and encouraging him to think of modern renderings on his own account a time he was strongly affected by the German manner, not to his advantage, and indulged in horrors 'written at the request of Mr Lewis,' and too like Mr Lewis's own productions appointment in love, referred to long afterwards in Scott's Journal, was at the time kept to himself, it was not his habit to complain. After his marriage to Miss Charpentier in 1797 he had many years of prosperity before him, making himself known as 'the hardest worker and the heartiest player,' and steadily going on with his poetry, then with his novels, at the same time carrying on all sorts of historical and antiquarian researches, besides miscellaneous literary work by the way, not to speak of his duties as Sheriff of Selkirk and (after 1806) as Clerk of Session He had also a commission in the Edinburgh Light Horse (a yeomanry regiment), and did not neglect his military calling

The Lay of the Last Minstrel was published ın 1805 It followed close upon the Border Ministrelsy (1802-3) and the edition of the old rhyming romance Sir Tristrem (1804), from the famous Auchinleck manuscript, to which Scott was attracted (among other reasons) because it begins with Erceldoune Scott added some strings of his own in the old language, the original of Sir Tristrem having lost its proper ending. After this antiquarian work came the Lay, Marmion, and their successors, down to the year 1814, when The Lord of the Isles closed the senes and another order of romance was founded in Waverley Neither the poems nor the novels kept him fully occupied even in the time that he gave to literature, which was by no means the whole of his life. His edition of Dryden, which appeared in the same year as Marmion (1808), might have served any ordinary man of letters for a long task, that book, with its admirable biography and its rich historical notes, was followed by an edition of Swift, and by innumerable miscellaneous articles and reviews, without hindering the poems or the novels Very few people could make out how he worked, his visitors never knew that he was working at all

Scott moved from Ashestiel in 1812 to a place lower down the Tweed near Melrose, where he built the house he called Abbotsford His reputation, wealth, and power of mind went on increasing together His health was not always good the Bride of Lammermoor was composed in pain so great, and with such an effort, that the author's mind refused to remember the story afterwards, the opera of Ivanhoe in Paris amused him by recalling the distressing conditions (cramp in the stomach) in which the novel had been put together But his strength seemed inexhaustible, he had sons and daughters and many friends, and the affection of all who knew him Beyond American tourists and literary ladies there were few grievances In 1822, at the king's visit to Edinburgh, Scott, who had been made a baronet in 1820, found himself the representative of his country, as well as his town, by a kind of general consent every one knew that he was the greatest man

In 1826 the reverse came, in his fifty fifth year, when he was beginning to feel himself no longer young, he was involved in Constable's failure to the amount of £117,000. Shortly before that he had begun to keep a journal, and he continued it—his own story, told without any illusions, sad enough, but never dispirited nor merely pathetic. On the contrary, the humour of Scott is shown nowhere more truly than in the 'Gurnal'

Between 1826 and 1828 he earned for his creditors nearly £40,000 But he was an old man, before his time, he himself did not reckon on living much over sixty. He had to leave Abbotsford for Naples in September 1831, the day after the expedition to Yarrow along with Wordsworth, who wrote the best meniorial of Scott in his poem on that day, and in the verses on Scott's departure

A trouble not of clouds nor weeping rain,
Nor of the setting sun's pathetic light
Engendered, hangs o'er Eildon's triple height.
Spirits of Power assembled there complain
I or kindred power departing from their sight,
While Tweed, best pleased in chanting a blithe strain,
Saddens his voice again and yet again
Lift up your hearts, ye Mourners, for the might
Of the whole world's good wishes with him goes,
Blessings and prayers in nobler retinue
Than sceptred king or laurelled conqueror knows
Follow this wondrous potentate Be true
Ye winds of ocean, and the midland sea,
Wafting your charge to soft Parthenope 1

Scott went first to Malta, at Naples he showed himself still unbeaten, though, as he had told Wordsworth beforehand, he got little good from the beauty of Italy He was interested in the manuscript of Sir Bevis of Hamtoun at Naples, at Lake Avernus the verse that ran in his head was about 'Charlie and his men'

He spent a short time in Rome in the spring of 1832, then he came home. On the 21st of September he died at Abbotsford Goethe had died earlier in the same year, a much older man

Scott's poetry, at any rate the common form of his tales in verse, was well described, some years before he acknowledged himself the author of Waverley, in the comparison of the poems and novels by J L. Adolphus, of which there is a fair account in Lockhart. The passage is worth quoting, for many reasons. It is one of the soundest pieces of criticism ever written by a contemporary. It uses the favourite method of Mr Arnold, and with equal judgment, in the choice of illustrative lines to express the different types of poetry. The book appears to be almost unknown to Scott's countrymen (apart from Lockhart's quotations), and is not to be found in the most learned libraries of Edinburgh.

'If required to distinguish the poetry of the author of Marmion from that of other writers by a single epithet, I should apply to it the term The same easy openness which was remarked in his prose style is also a prevailing quality of his poetical composition, where, however, it appears not so much in verbal arrangement as in the mode of developing and combining thoughts Few authors are less subject to the fault of overdescribing, or better know the point at which a reader's imagination should be left to its own activity, but the images which he does supply are placed directly in our view, under a full noonday light. It is a frequent practice of other poets, instead of exhibiting their ideas in a detailed and expanded form, to involve them in a brilliant complication of phrase, high wrought and pregnant with imagery, but supplying materials only, which the reader may shape out in his own mind according to his reach of fancy or subtlety of appre hension, and not presenting in itself any regular, fixed, or definite representation of objects. This style of composition is well exemplified in the ποντίων κυμάτων ανήριθμον γέλασμα of Æschylus, the lines of Shal espeare

Now

(Chorus to Henry I', Act is ) these of Milton

(Comus)

and when, describing the battle of the angels, he says, that the "war"

Soaring on main wing,

Tormented all the air (Paradise Lest Book vi)

In no instance that I recollect does the author of Marmion adopt this I ind of poetical phraseology, which conveys in a few words the germ and essence of a beautiful or sublime description, but is not itself that description. I do not insist upon the circumstance as a subject of either praise or censure, I only point to it as distinguishing the method of an individual writer from those of his brethren and predecessors

'Agun, it is very common with poets of strong feeling and evuberant fancy to describe (if that word may be applied to such a process) by accumulating round the principal object a number of images not physically connected with it, or with each other, but which, through the unfailing association of ideas, give, unitedly, the same impulse to the imagination and passions as would have been produced by a finished detail of strictly coherent circumstances. Such is the effect of that well-known passage in Macbeth, where murder is thus personified wither'd murder,

Alarum'd by his sentinel, the wolf,
Whose howl's his watch, thus with his stealthy pace,
With Tarquin's ravishing strides, towards his design
Moves likes a ghost.

(Macheth, Act 11 sc. 1)

This method, also, appears unsuitable to the simplicity with which the author of Marmion is accustomed to unfold his poetical conceptions his mode of describing, the circumstances, however fanciful in themselves, still follow each other by natural consequence, and in an orderly series, and hang together, not by the intervention of unseen links, but by immediate and palpable conjunction His epithets and phrases, replete as they often are with poetic force and meaning, have always a direct bearing on the principal subject He pursues his theme, in short, from point to point, with the steadiness and plainness of one who descants on a common matter of fact. The difference between his style of description and the two kinds from which I have distinguished it, is very perceptible in the following lines

They

bade the passing knell to toll

For welfare of a parting soul.

Slow o'er the midnight wave it swung,

Northumbrian rocks in answer rung,

To Warkworth cell the echoes rolled,

His beads the wakeful hermit told,

The Bamborough peasant raised his head,
But slept ere half a prayer he said,

So far was heard the mighty knell,

The stag sprung up on Cheviot Fell,

Spread his broad nostril to the wind,

Listed before, aside, behind,

Then couched him down beside the hind,

And quaked among the mountain fern,

To hear that sound so dull and stern.

(Marmuon, Canto 11 st. 33.)

'These remarks, which in part explain my application of the term "popular," will not, I think, appear irrelevant, when it is considered that a poet accustomed to express himself in this expanded, simple, and consecutive style can readily transfer the riches of his genius to prose composition, while the attempt would be almost hope less to one who delighted in abrupt transition and funciful combination, and whose thoughts habitually condensed themselves into the most compendious phraseology,'

It is impossible to find a better description of Scott's narrative style, or of the difference between his plain, straightforward method and that of the great tragic poets What is wanting in the passage quoted is something that did not suit the writer's purpose at the time. For a comparison of the poems with the Waverley Novels it was expedient to take what might be called ordinary passages from both, not the exceptional things in either But it is in the large number of exceptions to his ordinary style that Scott shows his quality as a poet, especially in the songs and lyrical poems, of which there is a great variety Scott gave way to Byron in poetry 'I gave over writing romances because Byron beat me He hits the mark where I don't even pretend to fledge my arrow access to a stream of sentiment unknown to me.' The public generally accepted this view, and preferred the Graour and its successors to Marmion and the Lady of the Lale Neither Scott nor Byron nor their readers seem to have known the value of Scott's lyrical poetry His songs are as distinct in quality as Shakespeare's, and Byron had no access to the sources of their music. Some of them, like the songs of Burns, are founded on the Scottish tradition of popular songs, and take up old phrases and rhythms

> He turned his charger as he spake Upon the river shore.

'O Brignall banks are fresh and fair' was probably suggested by the verse of 'Bothwell banks,' which the traveller in Palestine, long before, heard sung by a woman to her child—the beautiful story is told by Scott in the Ministrelsy Scott, like Burns, had his own way of dealing with these suggestions, and the best of his lyrics are in the poet's own style, as clearly as those of Keats or They also have in them the magic that is found so seldom in the course of Scott's narra tive verse Proud Maisie and County Guy are as different from the narrative verse as from the prose of the novels They belong, as the Ettrick Shepherd put it (in speaking of his own poetry compared with Scott's), to 'a far higher order' 'Dear Sir Walter, ye can never suppose that I belang to your school o' chivalry ' Ye are king o' that school, but I'm the king o' the mountain and fairy school, which is a far higher ane nor yours' Hogg, whatever his manners may have been, had a sense of the difference between picturesque romance like Marmion and the kind that vill not bear strong lights or definite language, that is all vague—1 thing of dreams. He was right also in feeling the want of this 'fine fabling' in Scott's tales But the songs are different, and claim their place in that kingdom of fantasy which the author of Kilmeny asserted for himself, in which the true queen is La Belle Dame sans Mercy

Besides these, which are the essential part of Scott's poetry, there are other songs of a different and less exacting kind, like Jock o' Hazeldean and

Donald Caird, and the noble lyrics in the old-fashioned reflective style of the eighteenth century, recitative rather than lyrical—the poems of the Ettrick sunset, 'The Sun upon the Weirdlaw Hill,' and Rebecca's hymn, 'When Israel of the Lord beloved.' Scott professed no great care for the niceties of verse, and took small interest in the run of syllables and the other technical details that Dryden was so fond of But, careless as he might be, he had the gift of verse, and struck out harmonies such as many weaker poets have laboured hard for

There rose the choral lymn of praise, And trump and timbrel answered keen

This is a different kind of lyric poetry from County Guy, but it has a rank of its own, and an honourable one, much of Johnson's verse belongs to the same kind, serious and dignified, and there is one other poem of Scott's there also, the quatrum in which his work is summed up, the utterance of almost his whole heart

Sound, sound the clarion, fill the fife!

To all the sensual world proclaim,
One crowded hour of glorious life.
Is worth an age without a name.

Many of the shorter poems were written after the tales in verse had been given up Scott's poetical genius did not fail when he took to prose for story-telling

The tales themselves were hardly treated by their author, and in yielding to Byron he gave his own work less than its due. There was more of passion in Byron, but he could not tell a story like Scott. William of Deloraine and Roderick Dhu are stronger in adventures than The Corsair. The Corsair may be better at getting sympathy from his readers, but one cannot be always giving sympathy, whereas a large number of people can always be found to listen to stories of adventure even when the hero is wanting in the passionate attractions of Conrad.

The battle passages, especially Flodden in Marmion and the battle of Beal' an Duine in the Lady of the Lale, have a sound and swell in them beyond the ordinary tone of the stories. This is heard not less plainly in some of the shorter poems

Dark Morton, girt with many a spear, Murder's foul minion, led the van, And clash'd their broadswords in the rear The wild Macfarlane's plaided clan

How much of Scott's war-songs may have gone to fortify the old ballads in the Minstrelsy is hard to say. There is something of him in Kinmont Willie, and though his confessed additions to the Minstrelsy are inferior to that heroic poem, he wrote, later, the ballad of the Harlaw

What wouldst thou do, my squire so gay,
That rides beside my reyne,
Were ye Glenallan's Earl the day

chief characters, and it is their talk that makes the greatness of Scott as a novelist. Stendhal ras right about the historical trappings. pageantry of Ivanhor and Kendevorth was learned and repeated like a lesson, by professional novelists, East and West, till the wearied reader would almost have turned, like Niebuhr, to Josephus for recruation. It was not so easy to imitate the other things, except by a share of Scott's genius Scenes like the beginning of the Antiquary, the drama of the slow coach and the start for Queens ferry, are to be copied, like Hamlet, by 'those who have the mind? But the imitators, as happened with Chaucer also, generally repeated the least characteristic things in their master, the conventional framework and decorations, and made a living that way But the real excellence of Scott is in the dramatic dialogue

Sometimes there are curious discrepancies in Scott, inequalities and incongruities, of which the most obvious is in Rob Roy, in the conversation of the Bailie with Helen MacGregor. The two characters are not in the same world, the Bailie is alive, the wafe of Rob Roy has no language but that of rhetoric. There is the same sort of thing in Shakespeare, only in Shakespeare the mere rhetoric is usually kept in its place—he does not produce one of his humorous characters talking, at the front of the stage, with one of the rhetorical personages, or if he does, the rhetoric is for the time modified.

Scott's style has been severely treated by many critics, and it has become permissible to speak of his carelessness, his slipshod grammar, and so forth But there is no way of summing up the qualities of Scott's style in prose or verse, because in both he has many varieties. There is a common, plan manner, fluent and clear, in his prose as in his verse, there are also passages in his prose as distinct from this as his lyries from his narrative poetry, and fortunately in much greater profusion Wandering Willic's tale in Redgauntlet is the most famous of these, a story in which the strong and careless writer proces himself inferior to none of the careful artists in composition and clegance of phrising The readers of Scott have grown so familiar with his casi methods that they do injustice to his powers of compression, and forget the literary reserve, the concentration of the tragic motive, in the Highland Widow, the True Drovers, and the story of Elspeth Mucklebackit. is manifest enough on the face of his writings how his stile is quickened to meet the crisis of action, hos the leisurely, expository manner that came natural to Scott as a historian is exchanged for another sort of language in such places, for example, as Inversion Castle in the Legend of fonteree, when Sir Dugald Dalgetty is setting Inc with against Argile

Scott i as treated by Carlyle in the same way as Fielding by Johnson, and almost in the same terms. There is as great a difference between

Richardson and Fielding as between a man who knows how a watch is made and a man who can tell the hour by looking on the dial-plate.' Scott imitates the surface of life, says Carlyle, he does not imagine his characters from within the less need to discuss this since Mr Rusl in's praise of Scott in Fors Clavigera, a piece of criticism not easily refuted with regard to dramatic imagination in the Waverley Novels No analytic novelist ever showed a finer psychological sense than the author who kept two such characters as the Bailie and Andrew Fairservice on the stage at the same time. They belong to the same country, they breathe the same Westland air, they have the same sort of humour in many ways, the same power of evasion and escape when they are asked to commit themselves, the same comfortable sense of their own importance. But they are never allowed to interfere with one another, there is no discord or The character, the man himself, shines through the humour of Mr Janue, there is a grip in his talkative discourse, something of substance and courage The likeness in garrulous humour does not in the least obscure the difference in character between the honourable man and the

Scott as a leader in the romantic movement, followed by the authors of The Three Musketeers and Notre-Dame de Paris, and many more beyond counting, was never in full sympathy with the ideals of the romantic school, except in the short poems already mentioned The unrest, the my stery of romance, felt by many poets of that time, was not attractive to Scott. Notably, there was little of the medieval spirit in his study of mediæval literature He speaks of what Milton might have done for King Arthur, and finds in the books of Lancelot and Tristiam 'a thousand striking Gothic incidents, worthy subjects of the pen of Milton' 'What would he not have made of the adventure of the Rumous Chapel, the Perilous Manor, the Forbidden Seat, the Dolorous Wound, and many others susceptible of being described in the most sublime poetry I' Scott himself does not make anything of these 'Gothic incidents,' and never comes nearer than this to the sources most revered by some other scholars in romance. He loves Froissart, he is not greatly touched by the Quest of the Grail His mediævalism is generally positive and reasonable, there is great variety in it, great historical interest. But it was not by his antiquities that Scott established his lasting fame. The dialogue in his novels is little in debt to the romantic accessories, except where the problems of an older time give an opportunity for modern character to show itself Cuddie Headingg, for example, belongs to the seventeenth century in precisely the same sense as Falstaff to the time of Henry IV Before either of these humourists the ordinary critical formulas of 'realist' and 'romantic' disappear, they are irrelevant. The injustice from which Scott's reputation has suffered most is that I which assumes his mastery of romantic fiction, and undervalues his triumphs in the more difficult art of comedy

The Minstrel.

The way was long, the wind was cold, The minstrel was infirm and old, His withered cheek, and tresses gray, Seemed to have I nown a better day, The harp, his sole remaining joy, Was carried by an orphan boy The last of all the bards was he Who sung of Border chivalry, For, well a day ' their date was fled, His tuneful brethren all were dead, And he, neglected and oppressed, Wished to be with them, and at rest. No more, on prancing palfrey borne, He caroled, light as lark at morn, No longer, courted and caressed, High placed in hall, a welcome guest, He poured, to lord and lady gay, The unpremeditated lay Old times were changed, old manners gone, A stranger filled the Stuarts' throne. The bigots of the iron time Had called his harmles art a crime. A wandering harper, scorned and poor, He begged his bread from door to door, And tuned, to please a peasant's ear, The harp a king had loved to hear

The Sun upon the Weirdlaw Hill.

The sun upon the Weirdlaw Hill,
In littre?'s vale is sinking so eet.
The veitland wind is hush and still.
The lake lies sleeping at my feet.
Ve not the land-cape to mine eye.
I have loos bright hues that once it bore.
The all evening with her richest die.
I lames over the hills of Fitrick's shore.

With listless look along the plain,
I see Tweed's silver current glide,
And coldly mark the holy fane
Of Melrose rise in ruined pride.
The quiet lake, the balmy air,
The hill, the stream, the tower, the tree—
Are they still such as once they were,
Or is the dreary change in me?

Alas, the warped and broken board,
How can it bear the painter's dye?
The harp of struned and tuneless chord,
How to the minstrel's skill reply?
To aching eyes each landscape lowers,
To feverish pulse each gale blows chill,
And Araby's or Eden's howers
Were barren as this moorland hill.

Coronach.

He is gone on the mountain,

He is lost to the forest,

Like a summer dried fountain,

When our need was the sorest

The font, reappearing,

From the rain drops shall borrow,

But to us comes no cheering,

To Duncan no morrow '

The hand of the reaper
Takes the ears that are hoary,
But the voice of the weeper
Wails manhood in glory
The autumn winds rushing,
Waft the leaves that are searest,
But our flower was in flushing
When hlighting was nearest.

Fleet foot on the correi,
Sage counsel in eumber,
Red hand in the foray,
How sound is thy slumber!
Like the dew on the mountain,
Like the foam on the river,
Like the babble on the fountain,
Thou art gone, and for ever!

County Guy

Ah' Coanty Guy, the hour is nigh,
The sun has left the lea,
The orange flower perfumes the bower,
The lireeze is on the sea.
The lark, his lay who thrilled all day,
Sits hushed his partner nigh,
Breeze, bird, and flower confess the honr,
But where is County Guy?

The village maid steals through the shade,
Her shepherd's suit to hear,
To beauty shy, by lattice high,
Sings high born cavalier
The star of Love, all stars above,
Now reigns o'er earth and sky,
And high and low the influence know—
But where is County Gny?

(From Quentus Durward)

Hymn of the Hebrew Maid.

When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out from the land of bondage came,
Her father's God before her moved,
An awful guide in smoke and flame.
By day, along the astonished lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow,
By night, Arabia's crimsoned sands
Returned the fiery column's glow

There rose the choral hymn of praise,
And trump and timbrel answered keen,
And Zion's daaghters poured their lays,
With priest's and warrior's voice between.
No portents now our foes amaze,
Forsaken Israel wanders lone,
Our fathers would not know Thy ways,
And Thou hast left them to their own

But, present still, though now unseen!
When brightly shines the prosperous day,
Be thoughts of Thee a cloudy screen,
To temper the deceitful ray
And oh, when stoops on Judah's path
In shade and storm the frequent night,
Be Thou, long suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning and a shining light!

Our harps we left by Babel's streams,

The tyrant's jest, the Gentile's scorn,

No censer round our altar beams,

And mutch tre timbrel, trump, and horn.

But Thou hast said, 'The blood of goat,

The flesh of rams, I will not prize,

A contrite heart, a humble thought,

Are mine accepted sacrifice' (From Ivanhoe)

The Battle of Beal' an Duine

The minstrel came once more to view The eastern ridge of Benvenue. For ere be parted, he would say Farewell to lovely Loch Achray-Where shall he find, in foreign land," So lone a lake, so sweet a strand !-There is no breeze upon the fern, Nor ripple on the lake, Upon her eyry nods the erne, The deer has sought the brake, The small birds will not sing aloud, The springing tront lies still So darkly glooms you thunder cloud, "That swathes, as with a purple shroud, Benledi's distant hill Is it the thunder's solemn sound That mutters deep and dread, Or echoes from the groaning ground The warrior's measured tread? Is it the lightning's quivering glance That on the thicket streams. Or do they flash on spear and lance The sun's retiring beams? —I see the dagger crest of Mar. I see the Moray's silver star, Wave o'er the cloud of Saxon war.

O Brianall Banks

the line a macrice.

And as I rode by Dalton hall, Beneath the turrets high, A maiden on the castle wall Was singing merrily—

Chorus—'O, Brignall banks are fresh and fair,
And Greta woods are green,
I d rather rove with Edmund there,
Than reign our Linghish queen'—

'If, maiden, thou wouldst wend with me,
To leave both tower and town,
Thou first must guess what life lead we,
I hat dwell by dale and down?
And if thou canst that riddle read,
As read full well you may,
Then to the greenwood shalt thou speed,
As bithe as Queen of May'—

Clorus—Yet sung slie, 'Brignall banks are fair,
And Greta woods are green,
I'd rather rove with Edmund there,
I han reign our English queen.

'I read you, by your bugle horn,
And by your palfrey good,
I read you for a ranger sworn,
To keep the king's greenwood'—
'A ranger, lady, winds his horn,
And 'tis at peep of light,
His blast is heard at merry morn,
And mine at dead of night'—

Crorus—Vet sung she, 'Brignall banks are fair,
And Grata woods are gay,
I would I were with Edmund there,
To reign his Queen of May!

'With burnish d brand and musketoon,
So gallantly you come,
I read you for a bold Dragoon,
That lists the tuck of drum'—
'I list no more the tuck of drum,
No more the trumpet hear,
But when the beetle sounds his hum,
My contrades take the spear

Chorus—'And, O' though Briginal banks be fair,
And Greta woods be gry,
Act mickle must the maiden dare,
Would reign my Queen of May!

'Maiden' a nameless life I lead,
A nameless death I ll die,
The fiend, who e lantern lights the mead,
Were better mate than I'
And when I my till my comrades met,
Beneath the greenwood bough,
What once we were ve all forget,
Nor think what we are now

Charus—'Yet Brignall banks are fresh and fair,
And Greta woods are green,
And you may gather garlands there
Would price a summer queen'

A Weary Lot is Thine

"A weary lo is thine, fair maid,
A weary lot is thine!

To pail the thorn thy brow to braid,
And press the rue for wine!

A lightsome eye, a soldier's mien,
A feather of the blue
A doublet of the Lincoln green—
No more of me you knew,
My love!

No more of me you knew

'This morn is merry June, I trow,
The rose is budding fain,
But she shall bloom in winter snow,
Ere we two meet again'
He turn'd his charger as he spake,
Upon the river shore,
He gave his bridle reins a shake,
Said, 'Adieu for evermore,
' My love!

And adien for evermore.

Proud Maisie is in the wood, Walking so early, Sweet Robin sits on the bush, Singing so rarely

'The grey headed sexton That delves the grave duly

'The glow worm o er grave and stone

St Mary's

When, musing on companions gone, We doubly feel ourselves alone, Something, my friend, we yet may gain, There is a pleasure in this pain It soothes the love of lonely rest, Deep in each gentler heart impress'd. 'Tis silent amid worldly toils, And stifled soon by mental broils, But, in a bosom thus prepared, Its still small voice is often heard, Whispering a mingled sentiment, Truxt resignation and content Oft in my mind such thoughts awake, By Ione Saint Mary's silent lake, Thou know'st it well-nor fen, nor sedge, Pollute the pure lale's crystal edge, Abrupt and sheer, the mountains sink At once upon the level brink, And just a trace of silver sand Marks where the water meets the land Far in the mirror, bright and blue, Each hill's huge outline you may view, Shaggy with heath, hut lonely bare, Nor tree, nor bush, nor brake, is there, Save where, of land, you slender line Bears thwart the lake the scatter'd pine. Yet even this nakedness has power, And aids the feeling of the hour

Nor thicket, dell, nor copse yon spy, Where living thing concealed might lie, Nor point, retiring, ludes a dell, Where swain, or woodman lone, might dwell, There's nothing left to fancy's guess,

You see that all is loneliness
And silence aids—though the steep hills
Send to the lake a thousand rills,
In summer tide, so soft they weep,
The sound but fulls the ear asleep,
Your horse's hoof tread sounds too rude,
So stilly is the solitude

Nought living meets the eye or ear,
But well I ween the dead are near,
For though, in feudal strife, a foe
Hath lain Our Lady's chapel low,
Yet still, beneath the hallow d soil,
The peasant rests him from his toil,
And, dving, bids his bones be laid,
Where erst his simple fathers pray'd

(From Introduction to Canto w of Marmon)

Harlaw

As the Antiquary lifted the latch of the hut, he was surprised to hear the shrill tremulous voice of Elspeth chanting forth an old ballad in a wild and doleful recitative—

'The herring loves the merry moonlight,
The mackerel loves the wind,
But the oyster loves the dredging sang,
For they come of a gentle kind'

A diligent collector of these legendary scraps of ancient poetry, his foot refused to cross the threshold when his ear was thus arrested, and his hand instinctively took pencil and memorandum book. From time to time the old woman spoke as if to the children—'Oh ay, hinnies, whish! I whish!' and I'll begin a bonnier ane than that—

'Now hand your tongue, baith wife and carle, And listen, great and sma', And I will sing of Glenalian's Earl That fought on the red Harlaw

'The cronach's cried on Bennachie,
And down the Don and a',
And hieland and lawland may monrifu' be
For the sair field of Harlaw ——

I dinna mind the neist verse wccl--my memory's failed, and there's unco thoughts come ower me-God keep us frae temptation'

Here her voice sink in indistinct muttering

'It's a historical bullad,' said Oldbuck, eagerly, 'a genuine and undoubted fragment of minstrelsy! Percy would admire its simplicity—Ritson could not impugnits authenticity'

'Ay, but it's a sad thing' said Ochiltree, 'to see himan nature sae far owertaen as to be skirling it auld sains on the back of a loss like hers'

'Hush' hush' said the Antiquary—'she has gotten the thread of the story again'—And as he spoke, she sung—

"They saddled a hundred milk white steeds,
They hae bridled a hundred black,
With a chafron of steel on each horse's head,
And a good knight upon his back ——

Chairon!' exclaimed the Antiquary,—'equivalent, perhaps, to cheveren,—the word's worth a dollar,'—and down it went in his red bool

'They hadna ridden a mile, a mile, A mile, but barely ten When Donald came branking down the brae Wi' twenty thousand men

'Their tartans they were waving wide, Their glaves were glaneing elear, Their pibrochs rung frae side to side, Would deafen ye to hear

'The great Earl in his stirrups stood Fliat Highland host to see
Now here a langht that's stout and good
May prove a jeopardie

""What wouldst thou do, my squire so gay,
That rides beside my revne,
Were ye Glenallan's I arl the day,
And I were Roland Cheyne?

"To turn the rein were sin and shaine,
To fight were wondrous peril,
What would be do now Roland Cheyne,
Were be Glenallan's Earl?"

Ye main I en, hinnies, that this koland Cheyne, for as poor and mild as I sit in the chinney neak, was my fore bear, and an awfu' man he was that day in the fight, but specially after the I arl had fa'en for he blamed himsell for the counsel he gave to fight before Mar came up wi' Mearns, and Aberdeen, and Angus'

Her voice rose and became more animated as she recited the warlike counsel of her ancestor—

"Were I Glenallan's I arl thus tide, And ye were Roland Cheyne, The spur should be in my horse's side, And the brulle upon his mane.

"If they has twenty thousand hlades, And we twice ten times ten, I et they has but their tartan plaids, And we are mail elad men.

"" My horse shall ride through ranks sae rude, As through the moorland fern, Then ne'er let the gentle Norman blude Grow cauld for Highland kerne."

'Do you hear that, nephew?' said Oldbuck,—'you observe your Gache ancestors were not held in high repute formerly by the Lowland warriors'

'I hear,' said Heeter, 'a silly old woman sing a silly old song. I am surprised sir, that you, who will not listen to Ossian's songs of Selma, can be pleased with such trash. I vow, I have not seen or heard a worse halfpenny ballad, I don't believe you could match it in any pedlar's pack in the country. I should be asliamed to think that the honour of the Highlands could be affected by such doggrel.'—And, tossing up his head, he snuffed the air indignantly.

Apparently the old woman heard the sound of their voices, for, ceasing her song, she called out, 'Come in, sirs, come in—good will never halted at the door stane'

They entered, and found to their surprise Flspeth alone sitting gliastly on the hearth,' like the personification of Old Age in the Hunter's song of the Owl, 'wrinkled, tattered, vile, dim eyed, discoloured, torpid'

They 're a' out' she said, a they entered that an ye will set a blink, samely is will be in. If ye has busines wi' my guile day, here, or me son, they 'il be in belyes,—I never speak on busines my ell. 'Ou, sir, if the gentlemin like he may play his un spring fire it's a' one to Dandie

'Now, you looby,' said the lawver 'canno you con eave that your business can be no long to Colorel Mannering but that he may not choose to have these great ears of thine regaled with his matter?'

'Aweel, sir, just as you and he like, so ye see to my business,' said Dandie, not a whit disconcerted by the roughness of this reception. 'We're at the huld wark o' the marches again, Jock o' Dawston Cleugh and me Ye see we march on the tap o Touthop rigg after we pas the Poinoragrains, for the Poinoragrains, and Shel enspool and Bloodylaws they come in there, and they belong to the Peel, but after ye pass Pomoragrains at a muckle great saucer headed cutingged state that they en' Charlies Chuckie there Dawston Cleugh and Charlies hope they march. Now, I say, the march rins on the tap o the full where the wind and water shears, but Jock o' Dawston Cleugh again he contrivenes that, and says that it hauds down by the huld drove road that gaes awa by the Knot o' the Gate ower to Keeldar ward -and that makes an nnco difference.'

'And what difference does it make, friend?' said Pleydell. 'How many sheep will it feed?'

'Ou, no mony,' said Dandie, scratching his head, 'it's ying high and exposed—it may feed a hog, or aiblins wa in a good year'

'And for this grazing, which may be worth about five shillings a year, you are willing to throw away a hundred pound or two?

'Na, sir, it's no for the value of the grass,' replied Dinmont, 'it's for justice.'

'My good friend,' said Pleydell, 'justice, like charity, should begin at home. Do you justice to your wife and family, and think no more about the matter?

Dinmont still lingered, twisting his hat in his hand-'It's no for that, sir-bnt I would like ill to be bragged wi' him,—he threeps he'll bring a score o' witnesses and mair-and I'm sure there's as mony will swear for me as for him, folk that lived a' their days npon the Charlies hope, and wadna like to see the land lose its right '

'Zounds, man, if it be a point of honour,' said the lawyer, 'why don't vour landlords take it up?'

_ 'I dinna ken, sir' (scratching his head again), 'there's been nae election-dusts lately, and the lairds are unco neighbourly, and Jock and me cannot get them to yoke thegether about it a' that we can say, but if ye thought we might keep up the rent'-

'No' no' that will never do,' said Pleydell,-'confound you, why don't you take good cudgels and

'Od, sir,' answered the farmer, 'we tried that three times already—that's twice on the land and ance at Lockerby fair But I dinna ken-we're baith gey good at single stick, and it couldna weel be judged?

'Then take broadswords, and be d-d to you, as your fathers did before you,' said the counsel learned

' Aweel, sir, if ye think it wadna be again the law, it's a' ane to Dandie

'Hold hold 1' exclaimed Pleydell, 'we shall have another Lord Soulis' mistake-Pr'ythee, man, compre hend me, I wish you to consider how very trifling and foolish a lawsuit you wish to engage in '

'Ay, sir? said Dandie, in a disappointed tone ye winna take on wi' me, I'm doubting?'

'Me! not I-Go home, go home, take a pint and agree.' Dandie looked but half conteuted, and still remained stationary 'Anything more, my friend?'

'Only, sir, about the succession of this leddy that's dead-auld Miss Margaret Bertram o' Singleside

'Ay, what about her?' said the counsellor, rather surprised

'Ou, we have not connection at a' wi' the Bertrams,' said Dandie-'they were grand folk by the like o' us.-But Jean Liltup, that was auld Singleside's housekeeper, and the mother of these twa young ladies that are gane -the last o' them's dead at a ripe age, I trow-Jean Liltup came ont o' Liddel water, and she was as near our connection as second cousin to my mother's half sister She drew up wi' Singleside, nae doubt when she was his housekeeper, and it was a sair vex and grief to a' her kith and kin. But he acknowledged a marriage, and satisfied the kirk-and now I wad ken frae you if we hae not some claim by law?'

' Not the shadow of a claim '

'Aweel, we're nae pu rer,' said Dandie-'but she may hae thought on us if she was minded to make a testament.-Weel, sir, I've said my say-I'se e'en wish you good night, and '--- putting his hand in his pocket.

'No, no, my friend, I never take fees on Satur day night, or without a memorial-away with you, Dandie.' And Dandie made his reverence, and departed accordingly (From Guy Mannering)

Monkbarns and Saunders Mucklebackit.

The Antiquary, as we informed the reader in the end of the thirty first chapter, had shaken off the company of worthy Mr Blattergowl, although he offered to entertain him with an abstract of the ablest speech he had ever known in the teind court, delivered by the procurator for the church in the remarkable case of the parish of Resisting this temptation, our senior pre ferred a solitary path, which again conducted him to the cottage of Mucklebackit. When he came in front of the fisherman's hut, he observed a man working intently, as if to repair a shattered boat which lay upon the beach, and going up to him was surprised to find it was Muckle backit himself 'I am glad,' he said in a tone of sym pathy-'I am glad, Saunders, that you feel yourself able to make this excrtion?

'And what would ye have me to do,' answered the fisher gruffly, 'unless I wanted to see four children starte, because ane is drowned? It's weel wi' you gentles, that can sit in the house wi' handkerchers at your een when ye lose a friend, but the like o' us maun to our wark again, if our hearts were beating as hard as my hammer '

Without taking more notice of Oldbuck, he proceeded in his labour, and the Antiquary, to whom the display of human nature under the juffuence of agitating passions was never indifferent, stood beside him, in silent atten tion, as if watching the progress of the work observed more than once the man's hard features, as if by the force of association, prepare to accompany the sound of the saw and hammer with his usual sym phony of a rude tune, hummed or whistled,-and as often a slight twitch of convulsive expression showed that ere the sound was uttered, a cause for suppressing it rushed upon his mind. At length, when he had patched a considerable rent, and was beginning to mend another, his feelings appeared altogether to derange the power of attention necessary for his work The piece of wood which he was about to nail on was at first too long, then he sawed it off too short, then chose another equally ill adapted for the purpose. At length, throwing it down in anger, after wiping his dim eye with his quivering hand, he exclaimed, 'There is a curse either on me or on this auld black bitch of a boat, that I have hauled up high and dry, and patched and clouted sae mony years that she might drown my poor Steenie at the end of them, an' be d-d to her 'and he flung his hammer against the boat, as if she had been the intentional cause of his misfortune. Then recollecting himself, he added, 'Yet what needs ane be angry at her, that has neither soul nor sense?-though I am no that muckle better mysell She's bnt a rickle o auld rotten deals nailed thegither, and warped wi' the wind and the sea—and I am a dour carle, battered by foul weather at sea and land till I am maist as senseless as hersell. She main be mended though again the morning tide—that's a thing o' necessity'

Thus speaking, he went to gather together his instruments, and attempt to resume his labour,—but Oldbuck took him kindly by the arm 'Come, come,' he said, 'Saunders, there is no work for you this day I'll send down Shavings the carpeuter to mend the boat, and he may put the day's work into my account—and you had better not come out to morrow, but stay to comfort your family under this dispensation, and the gardener will bring you some vegetables and meal from Monkbarns.'

'I thank ye, Monkbarns,' answered the poor fisher, 'I am a plain spoken man, and hae little to say for mysell, I might hae learned fairer fashions frae my mither lang syne, but I never saw muckle gude they did her, however, I thank ye. Ye were aye kind and neighbourly, whatever folk says o' your being near and close, and I had often said, in that times when they were ganging to raise up the puir folk against the gentles -I liae often said ne'er a man should steer a hair touching to Monkbarns while Steenie and I could wag a finger-and so said Steenie too And, Monkbarns, when ye laid his head in the grave (and mony thanks for the respect), ye saw the mouls laid on an honest lad that lifit you weel, though he made little phrase about it ' (From The Antiquary)

Dour earle stiff rough fellow the moule, the mould, earth.

Cuddie Headrigg and Mause

Cuddie, whose malady, real or pretended, still detained him in bed, lay perdit during all this conference, snugly enseonced within his boarded bedstead, and terrified to death fest Lady Margaret, whom he held in hereditary reverence, should have detected his presence, and be stowed on him personally some of those bitter reproaches with a hich she loaded his mother. But as soon as he thought her ladyship fairly out of bearing, he bounced up in his nest

'The foul fa' ye, that I suld say sae,' he cried out to his mother, 'for a lang tongued clavering wife, as my father, honest man, aye ca'd ye' Couldna ye let the leddy plane wi' your whiggery? And I was e'en as great a gomeral to let ye persuade me to lie up here amang the blankets like a hurcheon, instead o' gaun to the wappenschau like other folk -Od, but I put a trick on ye, for I was out at the window bole when your auld back was turned, and awa' down by to hae a baff at the popingly, and I shot within two on't I cheated the leddy for your clavers, but I wasna gaun to cheat my joe. But she may marry what she lifes now, for I'm clean dung ower This is a waur dirdum than we got frie Mr Gudyill when he garr'd me refuse to eat the plam porridge on Vulc eve, as if it were ony matter to God or man whether a pleughman had suppit on minched pies or sour sowens?

'Oh, whisht, my baim' whisht' replied Mause, 'thou kensna about that things—It was forbidden meat, things dedicated to set days and holidays, which are inhibited to the use of Protestant Christians'

'And now,' continued her son, 'ye hae brought the leddy hersell on our hands! An I could but hae gotten some decent claes in, I wad hae spanged ont o' bed, and tauld her I wad ride where she liked, night or day, no she wad but leave us the free house, and the yaird that grew the best early lale in the haill country, and the cow's grass'

'O wow! my winsome bairn, Cuddie,' continued the old dame, 'murmur not at the dispensation, never grudge suffering in the gude cause.'

'But what I en I if the cause is gude or no, inither,' rejoined Cuddie, 'for a ye bleeze out sae muckle doctrine about it? It's clean beyond my comprehension a'the gither—I see nac sae mucl le difference at ween the twa ways o't as a' the folk pretend. It's very true the curates read aye the same words ower again, and if they be right words, what for no?—a gude tale's no the waur o' being twice taild, I trow, and a body has aye the better chance to understand it. Everybody's no sae gleg at the uptale as ye are yoursell, mither'

'O, my dear Cuddie, this is the sairest distress of a',' said the anxious mother 'O, how aften have I shown ye the difference between a pure exangelical doctrine, and ane that's corrupt wi' human inventions? O, my burn, if no for your ain saul's sake, yet for my grey hairs'—

'Weel, mither,' said Cuddie, interrupting her, 'what need ye mak sae muckle din about it? I hae aye dune whate'er ye bade me, and gaed to lirk whare'er ye likit on the Sundays, and feuded weel for ye in the ilka days besides. And that's what vexes me mair than a' the rest, when I think how I am to feud for ye now in that brickle times. I am no clear if I can pleugh ony place but the Mains and Mucklewhame, at least I never tried ony other grund, and it wadna come natural to me. And nae neighbouring heritors will dair to take us, after being turned aff that bounds for non enormity'

'Non conformity, hinnie,' sighed Mause, 'is the name that thae warldly men gie us '

'Aweel, aweel—we'll hae to gang to a far country, maybe twall or fifteen inles aff I could be a dragoon, nae doubt, for I can ride and play wi' the broadsword a bit, but ye wad be roaring about your blessing and your grey hairs' (Here Mause's exclamations became extreme) 'Weel, weel, I but spoke o't, besides, ye re ower auld to be sitting cocked up on a baggage waggon, wi' Eppie Dumblane, the corporal's wife. Sae what's to come o'us I canna weel see—I doubt I'll hae to take the hills wi' the wild whigs, as they ca' them, and then it will be my lot to be shot down like a mawkin at some dike side, or to be sent to Heaven wi' a Saint Johnstone's tippet about my hause'

'O, my bonny Cuddie,' said the zealous Mause, 'forbear sie carnal, self seeking language, whilk is just a misdoubting o' Providence—I have not seen the son of the righteous begging his bread,—sae says the text, and your father was a donce lionest man, though some what warldly in his dealings, and cumbered about earthly things, e'en lil e yoursell, my jo !'

'Aweel,' said Cuddie, after a little consideration, 'I see but ae gate for 't, and that 's a cauld coal to blaw at, mither Howsomever, mither, ye hae some guess o' a wee lat kindness that 's atween Miss Edith and young Mr Henry Morton, that suld be ca'd young Milnwood, and that I hae whiles carried a bit book, or maybe a lat letter, quietly atween them, and made believe never to ken wha it cam frae, though I ken'd brawly There's whiles convenience in a body looking a wee stupid—and

I have aften seen them walking at e'en on the little path by Dinglewood burn, but naebody ever ken'd a word about it frae Cuddie. I ken I'm gcy tbick in the head, but I'm as bonest as onr auld fore hand ox, puir fallow, that I'll ne'er work ony mair-I hope they'll be as kind to bim that come abint me as I hae been .-- But, as I was saying, ve'll awa' down to Miluwood and tell Mr Harry our distress. They want a pleughman, and the grund's no unlike our ain-I am sure Mr Harry will stand my part, for he's a kind bearted gentleman .-- I'll get but little penny fee, for bis uncle, anld Nippie Milnwood, has as close a grip as the deil himsell. But we'll aye win a bit bread, and a drap kale, and a fire-side, and theeking ower our heads, and that s a' we'll want for a season. - See get up, mither, and sort your things to gang away, for since sae it is that gang we mann, I wad lile ill to wait till Mr Harrison and auld Gudyill cam to pu' us ont by the lug and the horn' (From Old Mortality)

Bailie Nicol Jarvie and Andrew Fairservice

'Keep buck, sir, as best sets ye,' said the Bailie, as An lrew pressed forward to catch the answer to some question I had asked about Campbell,-'ye wad fain ride the fore horse, an ye wist how -That chield's aye for being ont o' the chiese fat he was moulded in -Now, as for your questions, Mr Osbaldistone, now that chield's out of ear shot, I'll just tell you it's free to you to speer, and it's free to me to answer, or no-Gude I canna say muckle o' Rob, puir chield, ill I winna say o' him, for, forby that he's my cousin, we're coming near his ain country, and there may be ane o' his gillies ahint every whin bush, for what I ken—And if ye'll be guided by my advice, the less ye speak about him, or where ve are gaun, or what we are gaun to do, we'll be the mair likely to speed us in our errand. For it's lile we may fa' in 'vi' some o' his nnfreends-there are e'en ower mony o' them about—and his bonnet sits even ou his brow yet for a' that, but I doubt they'll be upsides wi' Rob at the last-air day or late day, the fox's hide finds aye the flaying knife."

'I will certainly,' I replied, 'be entirely guided by your experience.'

'Right, Mr Osbaldistone—right. But I maun speak to this gabbling skyte too, for bairns and fules speal at the Cross what they hear at the ingle side.—D ye hear, you, Andrew—what's your name?—Fairservice!'

Audrew, who at the last rebuff had fallen a good way behind, did not choose to acknowledge the summons.

'Andrew, ye scoundrel' repeated Mr Jarvie, 'here, sir' here!'

'Here is for the dog,' said Andrew, coming up sulkily

'I'll gie yon dog's wages, ye rascal, if ye dinna attend to what I say t'ye—We are gann into the Hielands a bit'——

'I judged as muckle,' said Andrew

'Haud your peace, ye knave, and hear what I have to say till ye—We are gaun a bit into the Hielands'——

'Ye tauld me sae already,' replied the incorrigible Andrew

'I 'Il break your head,' said the Bailie, rising in wrath, 'if ye dinna haud your tongue.'

'A hadden tongue,' replied Andrew, 'makes a slabbered mouth'

It was now necessary I should interfere, which I did by commanding Andrew, with an anthoritative tone, to be silent at his peril.

'I am silent,' said Andrew 'I'se do a' your lawfu' bidding without a nav say My puir mother used aye to tell me,

"Be it better, be it worse, Be ruled by him that bas the purse."

Sae ye may e'en speak as lang as ye like, baith the tane and the tither o' you, for Andrew'

Mr Jarvie took the advantage of his stopping after quoting the above proverb, to give him the requisite instructions.

'Now, sir, it's as muckle as your life's worth—that wad be dear o' little siller, to be sure—but it is as muckle as a' our lives are worth, if ye dinna mind what I say to ye. In this public what it is as not to, and what it is like we may had to stay a' night, men o' a' clans and kindred—Hieland and Lawland—tak up their quarters—And whiles there are mair drawn dirks than open Bibles among them, when the usquebaugh gets uppermost. See ye neither meddle nor mak, nor gie nae offence wi' that clavering tongue o' yonrs, but leep a calm sough, and let ilka cock fight his ain battle.'

'Muckle needs to tell me that,' said Andrew, con temptuously, 'as if I had never seen a Hielandman before, and ken'd nae how to manage them. Nee man alive can cuitle up Donald better than mysell—I hae bought wi' them, sauld wi them, eaten wi' them, drucken wi' them'—

'Did ye ever fight wi' them?' said Mr Jarvie.

'Na, na,' answered Andrew, 'I took care o' that it wad ill hae set me, that am an artist and half a scholar to my trade, to be fighting amang a wheen kilted loons that dinna ken the name o' a single herb or flower in braid Scots, let abee in the Latin tongue.'

'Then,' said Mr Jarvie, 'as ye wad keep either your tongue in your mouth, or your lugs in your head (and your might miss them, for as saucy members as they are), I charge ye to say nae word, gude or bad, that ye can weel get by, to onybody that may be in the Clachan. And ye'll specially understand that ye're no to be bleezing and blasting about your master's name and mine, or saying that this is Mr Bailie Nicol Jarvie o' the Saut Market, son o' the worthy Deacon Nicol Jarvie, that a' body has heard about, and this is Mr Frank Osbaldistone, son of the managing partner of the great house of Osbaldistone and Tresham, in the City'

'Eneuch said,' answered Andrew—'eneuch said What need ye think I wad be speaking about your names for?—I hae mony things o' mair importance to speak about, I trow'

'It's that very things of importance that I am feared for, ye blethering goose, ye maunia speak ony thing, gude or bad, that ye can by any possibility help'

'If we dinna think me fit,' replied Andrew, in a huff, 'to speak like ither folk, gie me my wages and my board wages, and I'se gae back to Glasgow—There's smr' sorrow at our parting, as the auld mear said to the broken cart.'

David Deans and Bartoline Saddletree

'These are little times—kittle times, Mr Deans, when the people take the power of life and death out of the hards of the rightful magistrate into their nin rough grip I am of opinion, and so I believe will Mr Crossmyloof and the Priva Council, that this rising in effeir of war, to take away the life of a reprieved man, will prove little better than perduellion'

'If I hadna that on my mind whilk is ill to bear, Mr Saddletrie,' said Deans, 'I wad make bold to dispute that point we you

'How could you dispate what's plain law, man?' said Saddletree, somewhat contemptionsly, 'there's no a callent that e'er carried a poel wi'a process in'i, but will tell you that perduellion is the warst and maist virulent kind of treason, being an open convocating of the king's he'ge against his authority (mair especially in arms, and by touk of drum to baith whilk necessories my een and lugs bore witness), and muckle warse than lese majesty, or the concealment of a treasonable purpose—It winna bear a di pute, neighbour'

'But it will, though,' retorted Douce Davie Deans,
'I tell ye it will bear a dispute—I never like your cauld, legal, formal doctrines, neighbour Saddletree—I hand unco little by the Parliament House, since the awfu' downfull of the hopes of honest folk that followed the Fevolution'

But what wad ye hae had, Mr Deans?' said Saddle tree impatiently didna ye get banh liberty and consei are made fast, and settled by tailine on you and your beins for ever?'

'Mr Suddictree' retorted Deans, 'I ken ye are one of those that are wise after the minner of this world, and that we haid your part and east in your portion, wi' the lang heads and lang gowns, and keep with the smart with pated las yers of this our land—Weary on the dark and dolefu east that they hae gien this unhappy king dom when their black hands of defection were clasped in the red lands of our sworn nuirtherers when those who had numbered the towers of our Zion, and marked the bilwarks of Reformation, saw their hope turn into a state and their rejoieing into weeping'

I canna anderstand this, neighbour, answered Saddle tree. I am an hone t Presbyterian of the Kirk of Scotland, and stand by her and the General Assembly, and the due a humistration of justice by the fifteen Lords.

o her ion and the five Lords o' Justiciars '

'Out upon ye, Mr Saddletree !' exclaimed David, who in an opportunity of giving his testimony on the · fences and backslidings of the land, forgot for a moment his own domestic calamity-'out upon your General Is embly, and the back o' my hand to your Court o' Section !- What is the tane but a waefu' bunch o' cauld ric profes are and ministers, that sate been and warm when the perse uted remnant were watstling wi' hunger, - leadd and fear of death, and danger of fire and sword, norm vet little sides, post hages and flow mosses, and but ray creep out of their holes, like bluebottle flees in the pt of sunstanc, to take the purputs and places of better follows their that witnessed, and testified and fought, or tendered pet preson house and transportation beyond -1 bonny ble there's o' them -And for your Coat of Coana

Is may so what ye will o' the General Assemble,' a 1 Sable regularity ing him, 'and let them clear them that kens them, but as for the Lords o' Session, forby that they are my next door neighbours, I would have ye ken, for your ain regulation, that to ruise scan dal anent them, whilk is termed to munitur again them, is a crime sui generis,—sui generis, Mr Deans—ken ye what that amounts to?'

'I ken little o' the language of Antichrist,' said Deans, 'and I care less than little what carnal courts may call the speeches of honest men. And as to murinur again them, it's what n' the folk that loses their pleas, and nine tenths o' them that win them, will be gey sure to be guilty in. Sae I wad have ye ken that I haud a' your gleg tongued advocates, that sell their knowledge for pieces of silver—and your worldly wise judges, that will gie three days of hearing in presence to a debate about the peeling of an ingan, and no ae half hour to the gospel testimony—as legalists and formalists, countenancing by sentences, and quirks, and cunning terms of law, the late begun courses of national defections—union, toleration, patronages, and Yerastian prelatic ouths. As for the soul and body killing Court o' Justiciary'——

The habit of considering his life as dedicated to bear testimony in behalf of what he deemed the suffering and deserted cause of true religion, had swept honest David along with it thus far, but with the mention of the criminal court, the recollection of the disastrous condition of his daughter rushed at once on his mind, he stopped short in the midst of his triumphant declamation, pressed his hands against his forehead, and remained silent.

Jeanie Deans and Queen Caroline

The queen seemed to acquiesce, and the duke made a signal for Jeanie to advance from the spot where she had hitherto remained, watching countenances which were too long accustomed to suppress all apparent signs of emotion, to convey to her any interesting intelligence. Her majesty could not help smiling at the awe struck manner in which the quiet, demure figure of the little Scotchwoman advanced towards her, and yet more at the first sound of her broad northern accent. But Jeanie had a voice low and sweetly toned, an admirable thing in woman, and she besought 'her leddyship to have pity on a poor misguided young creature,' in tones so affecting that, like the notes of some of her native songs, provincial vulgarity was lost in pathos

'Stand up, young woman,' said the queen, but in a kind tone, 'and tell me what sort of a barbarous people your country folk are, where child murder is become so common as to require the restraint of laws like yours'

'If your leddyship pleases,' answered Jeanie, 'there are mony places besides Scotland where mothers are unkind to their ain flesh and blood'

It must be observed that the disputes between George II and I rederick, Prince of Wiles, were then at the highest, and that the good natured part of the public laid the blame on the queen. She coloured highly, and darted a glance of the most penetrating character, first at Jeanie, and then nt the duke. Both sustained it unmoved, Jeanie from total unconsciousness of the offence she had given, and the duke from his habitaal composure. But in his heart he thought, 'My unlacky profigire has with this luckless answer shot dead, by a kind of chance medley, her only hope of success'

Lady Suffolk, good humouredly and skilfully, inter posed in this awkward crisis. 'You should tell this lady,' she said to Jeanie, 'the particular causes which render this crime common in your country'

'Some thinks it's the Kirk session—that is—it's the
—it's the cutty stool, if your leddyship pleases,' said
Jeauie, looking down and courtesving

'The what?' said Lady Suffolk, to whom the phrase was new, and who besides was rather deaf

'That's the stool of repentance, madam, if it please your leddyship,' answered Jeanie, 'for light life and conversation, and for breaking the seventh command'. Here she raised her eyes to the duke, saw his hand at his chin, and, totally inconscious of what she had said out of joint, gave double effect to the innuendo by stopping short and looking embarrassed.

As for Lady Suffolk, she retired like a covering party, which, having interposed betwixt their retreating friends and the enemy, have suddenly dra vn ou themselves a fire unexpectedly severe.

The dence take the lass, thought the Dnke of Argyle to himself, there goes another shot, and she has hit with both barrels right and left '

Indeed the duke had himself his share of the cou fusion, for, having acted as master of ceremonies to this innocent offender, he felt much in the circumstances of a country squire, who, having introduced his spaniel into a well appointed drawing room, is doomed to witness the disorder and damage which arises to china and to dress gowns, in consequence of its intimely frolics Jeanie's last chance hit, however, obliterated the ill impression which had arisen from the first, for her majesty had not so lost the feelings of a wife in those of a queen, but that she could enjoy a jest at the expense of 'her good Suffolk.' She turned towards the Duke of Argyle with a smile, which marked that she enjoyed the trinmph, and observed, 'The Scotch are a rigidly moral people ' Then, again applying herself to Jeanie, she asked how she had travelled up from Scotland

'Upon my foot mostly, madam,' was the reply

'What, all that immense way upon foot? How far can you walk in a day?'

'Five and twenty miles and a bittock'

'And a what' said the queen, looking towards the Duke of Argyle

'And about five miles more,' replied the duke.

'I thought I was a good walker,' said the queen, 'but this shames me sadly '

'Max your leddyship never hae sae weary a heart that we cauna be sensible of the weariness of the limbs,' said Jeanie.

That came better off, thought the duke, it's the first thing she has said to the purpose

'And I didna just a'thegither walk the haill way neither, for I had whiles the cast of a cart, and I had the cast of a horse from Ferrybridge—and divers other easements,' said Jeanie, cutting short her story, for she observed the duke made the sign he had fixed upon

'With all these accommodations,' answered the queen, 'you must have had a very fatiguing journey, and, I fear, to little purpose, since, if the king were to pardon your sister, in all probability it would do her little good, for I suppose your people of Edinburgh would hang her out of spite.'

She will stuk herself now outright, thought the dnke. But he was wrong The shoals on which Jeanie had touched in this delicate conversation lay underground, and were unknown to her; this rock was above water, and she avoided it.

'She was confident,' she said, 'that baith town and country wad rejoice to see his majesty taking compassion on a poor unfriended creature.'

'His majesty has not found it so in a late instance,' said the queen, 'but I suppose my lord duke would advise him to be guided by the votes of the ribble themselves, who should be hanged and who spared?'

'No, madam,' said the duke, 'but I would advise his majesty to be guided by his own feelings, and those of his roval consort, and then I am sure punishment will only attach itself to guilt, and even then with cantious reluctance.'

'Well, my lord,' said her majesty, 'all these fine speeches do not convince me of the propriety of so soon showing any mark of favour to your—I suppose I must not say rebellious?—but, at least, your very disaffected and intractable metropolis. Why, the whole nation is in a league to screen the savage and abominable murderers of that unhappy man, otherwise, how is it possible but that, of so many perpetrators, and en gaged in so public an action for such a length of time, one at least must have been recognised? Even this wench, for aught I can tell, may be a depository of the secret.—Hark you, young woman, had you any friends engaged in the Porteons mob?'

'No, madam,' answered Jeanie, happy that the question was so framed that she could, with a good conscience, answer it in the negative

'But I suppose,' continued the queen, 'if you were possessed of such a secret, you would hold it a matter of conscience to keep it to yourself?'

'I would pray to be directed and guided what was the line of duty, madam,' answered Jeanne

'Yes, and take that which suited your own inclinations,' replied her majesty

'If it like you, madam,' said Jeanie, 'I would hac gaen to the end of the earth to save the life of John Porteous, or any other unhappy man in his condition, but I might lawfully doubt how far I am called upon to be the avenger of his blood, though it may become the civil magistrate to do so. He is dead and gaen to his place, and they that have slain him must answer for their ain act. But my sister, my puir sister, Effie, still lives, though her days and hours are numbered ' She still lives, and a word of the king's mouth might restore her to a brolen hearted huld man, that never in his daily and nightly exercise forgot to pray that his majesty might be blessed with a long and prosperous reign, and that his throne, and the throne of his posterity, might be established in righteousness. O madam, if ever ye kend what it was to sorrow for and with a sinning and a suffering creature, whose mind is sae tossed that she can be neither ca'd fit to live or die, have some compassion on our misery '-Save an houest house from dishonour, and an unhappy girl, not eighteen years of age, from an early and dreadful death! Alas 1 it is not when we sleep soft and wake merrily ourselves that we think on other people's sufferings. Our hearts are waxed light within us then, and we are for righting our ain wrongs and fighting our ain battles. But when the honr of trouble comes to the mind or to the bodyand seldom may it visit your leddyship-and when the hour of death comes, that comes to high and low-lang and late may it be yours !--Oh, my leddy, then it isna what we hie dine for ourselves, but what we hae dune for o hers, that we think on must pleasantly thoughts that we had intervened to spare the puir thing's life will be sweeter in that hour, come when it may, than if a vord of yor mouth could hang the haill Porteous mob at the tail of ae tow?

Tear followed tear down Icanie's cheeks, as, her features 4 loring and quivering with emotion, she pleaded her ister's cause with a pathos which was at once simple and solumn.

'This is cloquence,' said her majests to the Duke of Argule - 'Young voman,' she continued, addressing lesself to Jennie, 'I cannot grant a pardon to your si ter-but you shall not want my warm intercession with his majesty. Take this housewife case 'she con tinued, putting a small embroidered needle case into Jeinie's hands, 'do not open it now, but at your lessure-you will find something in it which will remind you that you have had an interview with Queen Catoline

Jeanie, having her suspicions thus confirmed, dropped on her knees, and would have expanded herself in gratuade, but the duke, who was upon thorns lest she should say more or less than just enough, touched his elun once more.

'Our lastness is, I think, ended for the present, my lord duke, said the queen, and I trust, to your satis Hereafter I hope to see your grace more frequently boli at Richmond and St James's -Come, Lady Suffoll, ve must wish his grice good morning '

They exchanged their parting reverences, and the dule, so soon as the ladics had turned their backs, as is ed Jennie to rise from the ground, and conducted her brel through the avenue, which she trod with the feeling of one v ho walks in her sleep

'I have no doubt of that, Mrs Dods,' said the guest, 'and I only wish to know how these new comers were able to establish themselves against a house of such good reputation and old standing as yours?-It was the virtues of the mineral, I dare say, but how came the waters to recover a character all at once, mistress?'

'I dinna ken, sir-they used to be thought good for naething, but here and there for a puir body's bairn, that had gotten the crucils, and could not afford a penniworth of salts. But my Leddy Penelope Penfeather had fa'en ill, it's like, as nac other body had ever fell ill, and sae she was to be cured some gate nachody was ever cured. which was naething mair than was reasonable-and my leddy, ye ken, has wit at wull, and has a' the wise folk out from Edinburgh at her house at Windywa's yonder, which it is her leddyship's will and pleasure to call Air castle-and they have a' their different turns, and some can clink verses, wi' their tale, as weel as Rob Burns or Allan Ramsay-and some rin up hill and down dale, I napping the chucky stanes to pieces wi' hammers, like sae mony road makers run dast—they say it is to see how the warld was made '-and some that play on all manner of ten stringed instruments-and a wheen sketching souls, that ye may see perched like craws on every craig in the country, e'en vorking at your ain trade, Maister Francie, forby men that had been in forcign parts, or said they had been there, whilk is a' ane, ye ken, and maybe two or three draggle tailed misses, that were my Leddy Penelope's follies when she has dune wi' them, as her queans of maids wear her second hand claithes after her leddyship's happy recovery as they ca'd it. down cam the hall tribe of wild geese, and settled by the Well, to dine thereout on the bare grund, like a wheen tinklers, and they had sangs, and tunes, and healths, nae donbt in praise of the fountain, as they ca'd the Well, and of Leddy Penelope Penfeather, and, lastly, they behaved a' to take a solemn bumper of the spring, which, as I am tauld, made unco havoc amang them or they wan hame, and this they ca'd Picknick, and a plague to them! And sae the pg was begun after her leddyship's pipe, and mony a mad measure has been danced sin' syne, for down cam masons and murgeon makers, and preachers and player-folk, and Episcopalians and Metho dists, and fool, and fiddlers, and Papists and pie bakers, and doctors and drugsters, by the shop folk, that sell trash and trumpery at three prices-and so up got the bonny new Well, and down fell the honest auld town of St Ronan's, where blythe decent folk had been heart some enough for mony a day before ony o' them were born, or ony sic vapouring fancies kittled in their cracked (From St Ronan & Well.)

Lockhart's Life of Scott one of the great biographies in the language (1837-38 and ed. 10 vols 1839), has been supplemented by the publication of Scott's Journal (1890) and his Letter's (2 vols 1839). There are also condensed editions of the Life by Lockhart part of the original Life, telling the story of Scott's lat days and death, will be found below at page 252. Peference may also be made to the shorter Lives by George Giffillan (1872). R. H. Hutton (1879). C. D. Yonge (1888), Professor Saintsbury (1897) and W. H. Hudson (1900), to Sir Francis Doyle's essay on Scott (1877). to Robert Chambers's Illustrations of the Author of Warreley (1820), and to Hogg's Domestic Manners and Private Life of Sir Walter Scott (1834). There is a German Life by Elize (1864) and more than one German translation of the novels, of several French translations most are not good. Editions of Scott's works are innumerable. It should be added that Scott's debt was finally cleared off after his death out of the value of the copyrights in the publisher's hands

The following is a list of the dates of the principal works. The Border Mustrelsy, recognised more and more as having contained the germs of much of his best work in prose and verse (first two volumes, 1802) The Law of the Last Minstrel (1805) Marmion (1808) The Lady of the Lake (1810) Rokeby (1812) The Bridal of Triermain (1813) The Life of Swift with an edition of his works (1814), Il averley (begin at Ashestiel laid aside, discovered by accident finished and published in 1814) Introduction to Border Antiquities (1814-17), Lord of the Isles Guy Manuering and The Antiquary (1815) The Elack Dwarf and Old Mortality (1816), Pob Poy and The Heart of Midlothian (1818) The Bride of Lammermoor and The Legend of Montrose (1819) Ivanhoe, The Monastery and The Abbot (1820) Kembuorth (1821) The Pirate, The Fortunes of Nigel and Peveril of the Peak (1822), Quentin Durward (1823), St Ronan & Well and Redgaun'let (1824) The Betrothed and The Talisman (1825) Woodsto k (1826) The Life of Nafoleon Buonaparte (9 vols. 1827) The Two Drovers, The Highland Widou, and The Surgeon's Daughter (1827) Tales of a Grandfather (1828-30), The Fair Vasid of Ferth (1825) Anne of Geterstein (1823), Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft The Deom of Devergerl, and Auchandrane (1830) Count Robert of Paris and Castle Dangerous (1837).

The extent of Scott's infinence on literature, English and foreign, can hardly be calculated. Much of it was transient, and his imitations were often mechanical, especially in England and Germany But in France the example of Scott was followed with more freedom, much as Scott hinself had followed Goethe, the Taree Minkeleers and Notre-Dame de Paris being works of genus, are nearer to Scott than the romances which copied him more closely.

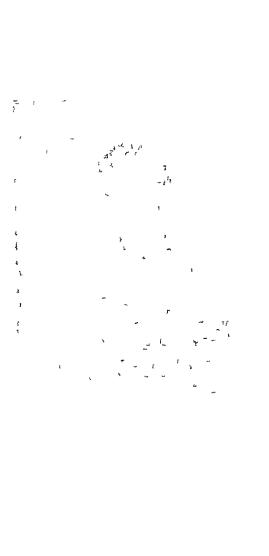

The reader is referred to the sections in this volume or in Vol. II on Lockhart, Taylor (of Norwich), 'Monk Lewis, M Crie Jeffrey, Hogg, Leyden, Maria Edgeworth Joanna Baillie, Wordsworth, and others of Scott's friends and contemporaries was born at Bristol on 12th August 1774, the son of Robert Southey, an unlucky linen-draper, his mother, who likewise came of good old yeoman ancestry, was a bright, sweet-tempered woman, who 'could wbistle like a blackbird.' his lonely childhood was passed with his mother's half-sister, a rich, genteel old maid who liated noise and matrimony, and had a passion for cleanliness and the drama. With ber he saw many plays, read Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, Hoole's Tasso and Artosto, the Faerie Queene, Pope's Homer, and Sidney's Arcadia, and he himself scribbled thousands of verses He had meanwhile had four schoolmasters, and in 1788 was placed by an uncle, the Rev Herbert Hill, at Westminster There Picart's Religious Ceremonies led him 'to conceive a design of rendering every mythology the basis of a narrative poem,' there he formed lifelong friendships, and thence in 1792 he was expelled for writing an article against flogging in a school magazine. Next year he entered Balliol College with a view He went up to Oxford a Repubto taking orders lican, his bead full of Rousseau and 'Werther,' his religious principles shaken by Gibbon, and he left it in 1794 a Unitarian, having learnt a little swim ming and a little boating, and ingrained his very heart with Epictetus At Oxford in June 1794 he had a visit from Coleridge, who infected him with his dream of a 'Pantisocracy' on the banks of the Susquehanna. The Pantisocrats required wives, and wives were forthcoming in three Miss Frickers of Bristol. The eldest, Sara, fell to Colendge, the second, Edith, to Southey, and Mary, the third, to Robert Lovell, who with Southey in 1794 pub lished a booklet of poems, and died two years afterwards penniless The Pantisocrats further more required money, and money was not forthcoming, so, having tried medicine, and been sickened by the dissecting-room, having been turned out of doors by his indignant aunt, having lectured with some success, and having on the 14th November 1795 secretly married his Edith, Southey started the same day on a six months' visit to Lisbon, where his uncle was chaplain to the British factory, and there laid the foundation of his profound knowledge of the literatures and history of the Peninsula. He returned to England to take up law, but reading Coke was to him 'threshing straw,' so after sundry migrations -Westbury near Bristol, Burton near Christchurch, Lisbon again for a twelvemonth (1800-1), and Ireland (a brief secretaryship to its Chancellor of the Exchequer), with intervals of London-in September 1803 he settled at Greta Hall, Keswick, in the Lake Country The Coleridges were there already, and thither came Mrs Lovell households were to rest on Southey's shoulders times, who regarded only one side of the question' The poem is indeed a miserable performance, harmless from its very manity. Full of the same political sentiments and ardour, Southey composed his epic, Joan of Arc, displaying some boldness of imagination, but diffuse in style and in parts incoherent. In imitation of Dante, the young poet conducted his heroine in a dream to the abodes of departed spirits, and dealt very freely with the 'murderers of mankind,' from Nimrod the mighty hunter down to the victor of Agincourt. In the second edition of the poem, published in 1798, the Maid's vision with everything miraculous was omitted.

While in Portugal, Southey finished his second epic, Thalaba, the Destroyer, a pseudo Arabian fiction not without beauty and magnificence. The verse is irregular and unrhymed, but not lacking in power and rhythmical harmony, though in so long a poem the peculiar charm vanishes and the metre, like the redundant descriptions, becomes The metre accords well with the subject, and is, as Southey said, 'the Arabesque ornament of an Arabian tale.' Southey's greatest poem, The Curse of Kehama, has much in common with Thalaba, but is in rhyme. With characteristic egotism, he prefixed to Kehama a declaration that he would not change a syllable or measure for any-Kehama is a Hindu rajah, who like Faust obtains and trifles with supernatural power, and his sufficiently startling adventures give scope for Southey's too generous amplitude of description 'The story is founded,' as Sir Walter Scott put it, 'upon the Hindu mythology, the most gigantic, cumbrous, and extravagant system of idolatry to which temples were ever erected. The scene is alternately laid in the terrestrial paradise—under the sea-in the heaven of heavens-and in hell The principal actors are a man who approaches almost to omnipotence, labouring under a strange and fearful malediction, which exempts him from the ordinary laws of nature, a good genius, a sorceress, and a ghost, with several Hindustan deities of different ranks The only being that retains the usual attributes of humanity is a female, who is gifted with immortality at the close of the piece.' Some of the scenes in this strangely magnificent theatre of horrors are described with unquestionable power, Scott said that the account of the approach of the mortals to Padalon, the Indian Hades, quoted below, was equal in grandeur to any passage he had ever read. Kehama is almost oppressively Hindu, as Hinduism was understood by a laborious student who sought to omit nothing he had read that was characteristic in land or people. But the Orientalism of Southey, Moore, and most of their contemporaries was essentially artificial and factitious Roderick, the Last of the Goths, is a dignified and pathetic poem, though liable also to the charge of redundancy

voked much ridicule at the time, and would have passed into utter oblivion if Byron had not pub lished another Vision of Judgment—a profane but powerful satire that gave the laureate a merciless and witty castigation According to Sir Leslie Stephen, Byron's Vision of Judgment is more reverent as well as more witty than Southey's, in which we have 'the quaintest of all illustrations of the transition of intense respectability into something very like blasphemy' Some of his youthful ballads were extremely popular His Loid William, Mary the Maid of the Inn, The Well of St Keyne, and The Old Woman of Berkeley were the delight of young readers a century ago, and are yet eminently readable. He loved to sport with subjects of diablerie, and one satirical piece of this kind, The Devil's Thoughts, the joint production of Southey and Coleridge, was long believed to be the work of Porson or of other more or less likely authors. The original notion of the piece (not without parallels in Dunbar, Ben Jonson, and others) was Southey's, but the greater part of the most piquant verses were Coleridge's, at least one of them has passed into a proverb

He saw a cottage with a double coach house, A cottage of gentility, And the devil did grin, for his darling sin Is pride that apes humility

Scott read Madoc, and thrice re-read it with, increasing admiration, Charles James Fox read it aloud with joy to an admiring circle, Dean Stanley was an ardent admirer of Southey's, and Cardinal Manning contrasts Samson Agonistes with Thalaba, all to the advantage of the later poet. But there was nobody who believed more confidently in Southey's immortality than Southey himself, who quite agreed with a critic in holding that Madoc was the best English poem since Paradise Lost On the other hand, Macaulay in 1830 expressed a doubt whether 'fifty years hence Mr Southey's poems will be read,' and the doubt has been amply justified, probably no poet so well known by name is so little known by his There are, of course, some short excep tions-the 'Holly Tree,' 'Battle of Blenlieim,' 'Stanzas written in my Library,' the 'Old Woman' named above, and perhaps a dozen more, including 'those in which Southey appears as poetlaureate to the devil' His ballads are better, in Sir Leslie Stephen's opinion, than the Ingoldsby Legends, because they are less vulgar and less elaborately funny, and they are read still the 'Simorg,' the 'Glendoveers,' 'Mohareb'-how many can localise these creations of Southey's Muse? His epics repel, not so much by prolivity or by their irregular, sometimes rhymeless metres, as by the unreality of their fact and fancy remind us of scene-paintings, and a scene-painting even by Roberts will fetch next to nothing in the auction-room With Southey's prose it is otherwise He wrote out of the fullness of knowledge, for something more than the mere sake of writing, and his was that rarest gift of good pure English Yet even here he wrote far too much, and was often unhappy in his choice of subjects book alone by him, the Life of Nelson, belongs to universal literature. It rose into instant and universal favour, and is still considered as one of our standard popular biographies its value is rather literary than historical Pro fessor Laughton thus comments on it celebrated life by Southey, interesting as it always will be as a work of art, has no original value, but is a condensation of Clarke and McArthur's ponderous work, dressed to catch the popular taste, and flavoured, with a very careless hand, from the worthless pages of Harrison, from Miss Williams's Manners and Opinions in the French Republic towards the Close of the Eighteenth Century, 1 123-223, and from Captain Foote's Vindication There is no doubt that Southey's artistic skill gave weight and currency to the falsehoods of Miss Williams, as it did to the trash of Harrison and the wild fancies of Lady Hamilton' But, spite of its jingoism and its unfair abuse of the French, it remains a classic, because no biographer was ever more in sympathy with his hero or wrote more simply and directly

Thackeray summed up 'Southey's politics are obsolete and his poetry dead, but his private letters are worth piles of epics, and are sure to last among us as long as kind hearts like to sympathise with goodness and purity and upright life' Sir Leslie Stephen enjoys the letters, but not for that reason, and in spite of the fact that in them Southey 'goes to the point at once like a good man of business, and cannot give the effect of leisurely and amused reflection,3 Sir Leslie finds Southey and his letters interesting because he is the most complete type of the man fitted by nature for the peculiar function of living by his pen, 'which one must sorrowfully admit not to be the highest,' for 'the man who lives by his pen cannot expect to be on a pedestal beside the great philanthropists and prophets and statesmen' But again, Southey was of another opinion, he never doubted that he 'could combine the professional author with the inspired prophet,' and so could divide his time and his literary production 'with the absolute punctuality of a city clerk.'

The Life of John Wesley, while leaving ample room for later biographers, was justly described as the first book to bring home to Englishmen in general a real sense of Wesley's importance in English religious and social history. Southey also contributed a series of Lives of British Admirals to Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopadia. Landor's tribute to Southey is quoted at page 142. The Doctor contains, as Southey said, something of Tristram Shands, something of Rabelais, more of Montaigne, and a little of old Burton, yet its predominant characteristics are still his own. It is a delightful book, a bedside book, though but a commonplace book in disguise, a collection of curiosities of literature 'with charming interludes when Southey is not tempted into too deliberate facetiousness'. The gem of the Doctor is the story of 'The Three Bears,' and that immortal nursery-story is more likely to secure for Southey literary immortality than Madoc or Roderick

The Hall of Glory

A huge and massy pilc—
Massy it seemed, and yet with every blast
As to its ruin shook There, porter fit,
Remorse for ever his sad vigils kept.
Pale, hollow eyed, emaciate, sleepless wretch,
Inly he groaned, or, starting, wildly shrieked,
Aye as the fabric, tottering from its base,
Threatened its fall—and so, expectant still,
Lived in the dread of danger still delayed

They entered there a large and lofty dome, O'er whose black marble sides a dim drear light Struggled with darkness from the unfrequent lamp Enthroned around, the Murderers of Mankind-Monarchs, the great I the glorious I the august I Each bearing on his brow a crown of fire-Sat stern and silent Nimrod, he was there, First king, the mighty hunter, and that chief Who did belie his mother's fame, that so He might be called young Ammon. In this court Cæsar was crowned-accursed liberticide, And he who murdered Tully, that cold villain Octavius-though the courtly minion's lyre Hath hymned his praise, though Maro sung to him, And when death levelled to original clay The royal carcass, Flattery, fawning low, Fell at his feet, and worshipped the new god Titus was here, the conqueror of the Jews, He, the delight of humankind misnamed, Cæsars and Soldans, emperors and kings, Here were they all, all who for glory fought, Here in the Court of Glory, reaping now The meed they mented

As gazing round,
The Virgin marked the miserable train,
A deep and hollow voice from one went forth
Thou who art come to view our punishment,
Maiden of Orleans! Inther turn thine eyes,
For I am he whose bloody victories
Thy power hath rendered vain Lo 1 I am here,
The hero conqueror of Agincourt,
Henry of England!

(From the Vision of the Maid of Orleans in Joan of Arc.

Night in the Desert.

How beautiful is night!
A dewy freshness fills the silent air,
No mist obscures, nor cloud, nor speck, nor stain, Breaks the serene of heaven
In full orbed glory, yonder moon divine
Rolls through the dark-blue deptils.

Beneath her steady ray
The desert-circle spreads,
Like the round ocean, girdled with the sky
How beautiful is night!

Who, at this untimely hour, Wanders o'er the desert sands? No station is in view, Nor palm grove islanded amid the waste The mother and her child,
The widowed mother and the fatherless boy,
They, at this untimely hour,
Wander o'er the desert sands

Alas! the setting sun
Saw Zemab in her bliss, Hodeirah's wife beloved,
The fruitful mother late,
Whom, when the daughters of Arabia named,
They wished their lot like hers
She wanders o'er the desert sands
A wretched widow now,
The fruitful mother of so fair a race,
With only one preserved,
She wanders o'er the wilderness

No tear relieved the burden of her heart, Stunned with the heavy woe, she felt like one Half wakened from a midnight dream of blood

But sometimes, when the boy
Would wet her hand with tears,
And, looking up to her fixed countenance, Sob out the name of Mother, then did she Utter a feeble groan
At length, collecting, Zeinab turned her eyes
To heaven, exclaiming 'Praised be the Lord'
He gave, he takes away'
The Lord our God is good!'

(From Thalata)

Nearing Padalon.

Far other light than that of day there shone
Upon the travellers, entering Padalon
They, too, in darkness entering on their way,
But far before the car.
A glow, as of a fiery furnace light,
Filled all before them 'Twas a light that made

Darkness itself appear
A thing of comfort, and the sight, dismayed, Shrank inward from the molten atmosphere
Their way was through the adamantine rock
Which girt the world of woe on either side
Its massive walls arose, and overhead
Arched the long passage, onward as they ride,
With stronger glare the light around them spread—

And, lo' the regions dread—
The world of woe before them opening wide,
There rolls the fiery flood,
Girding the realms of Padalon around
A sea of flame, it seemed to be Sea without bound,

For neither mortal nor immortal sight Could pierce across through that intensest light

(From The Curse of Kehama)

Apostrophe to Love

They sin who tell us Love can die.
With life all other passions fly,
All others are but vanity
In heaven Ambition cannot dwell,
Nor Avarice in the vaults of hell,
Earthly these passions of the earth,
They perish where they had their birth
But Love is indestructible
Its holy flame for ever burneth,
From heaven it came, to heaven returneth.

Too oft on earth a troubled guest,
At times deceived, at times oppressed,
It here is tried and purified,
Then hath in heaven its perfect rest
It soweth here with toil and care,
But the harvest-time of Love is there.
Oh ' when a mother meets on high
The babe she lost in infancy,
Hath she not then, for pains and fears,
The day of woe, the watchful night,
For all her sorrows, all her tears,
An over payment of delight?

(From The Curve of Kehama.)

The King's Return.

The sound, the sight Of turban, girdle, robe, and scimitar, And tawny skins awoke contending thoughts Of anger, shame, and anguish in the Goth, The unaccustomed face of humankind Confused him now-and through the streets he went With haggard mien, and countenance like one Crazed or bewildered. All who met him turned, And wondered as he passed One stopped him short, Put alms into his hand, and then desired, In broken Gothic speech, the moon struck man To bless him. With a look of vacancy, Roderick received the alms, his wandering eye Fell on the money, and the fallen king, Seeing his royal impress on the piece, Broke out into a quick convulsive voice, That seemed like laughter first, but ended soon In hollow groau suppressed the Mussulman Shrunk at the ghastly sound, and magnified The name of Allah as he hastened on. A Christian woman, spinning at her door, Beheld him-and with sudden pity touched, She laid her spindle by, and running in, Took bread, and following after, called him back-And, placing in his passive hands the loaf, She said, 'Christ Jesus for his Mother's sake Have mercy on thee!' With a look that seemed Like idiocy, he heard her, and stood still, Staring a while, then bursting into tears, Wept like a child (From Roderick, the Last of the Goths )

Moonlight Scene in Spain.

How calmly, gliding through the dark blue sky, The midnight moon ascends! Her placid beams, Through thinly scattered leaves, and boughs grotesque, Mottle with mazy shades the orchard slope, Here o'er the chestnut's fretted foliage, gray And massy, motionless they spread, here shine Upon the crags, deepening with blacker night Their chasms, and there the glittering argentry Ripples and glances on the confluent streams. A lovelier, purer light than that of day Rests on the hills and oh! how awfully, Into that deep and tranquil firmament, The summits of Auseva rise serene ! The watchman on the battlements partakes The stillness of the solemn hour, he feels The silence of the hour, the endless sound Of flowing water soothes him, and the stars, Which in that brightest moonlight well nigh quenched, Scare visible, as in the utmost depth

With them I take delight in weal, And seek relief in woe, And while I understand and feel How much to them I owe, My cheeks have often been beden'd With tears of thoughtful gratitude

My thoughts are with the Dead, with them I live in long past years, Their virtues love, their faults condemn, Partake their liopes and fears, And from their lessons seek and find Instruction with an liumble mind

My hopes are with the Dead, anon My place with them will be, And I with them shall travel on Through all Futurity Let leaving here a name, I trust, That will not perish in the dust

The Death of Nelson.

It had been part of Nelson's prayer that the British fleet might be distinguished by humanity in the victors which lie expected Setting an example himself, he twice gave orders to cease firing on the Redoubtable, supposing that she had struck, because her guns were silent, for, as she carried no flag, there was no means of instantly ascertaining the fact. From this ship, which he had thus twice spared, he received his death. A ball fired from her mizzen top, which, in the then situation of the two vessels, was not more than fifteen yards from that part of the deck where he was standing, struck the epaulette on his lest shoulder, about a quarter after one, just in the heat of action He fell upon his face, on the spot which was covered with his poor secretary's blood Hardy, who was a few steps from him, turning round, saw three men raising him up. 'They have done for me at last, Hardy,' said he 'I hope not,' cried Hardy 'Yes,' he replied, 'my back bone is shot through' Yet even now, not for a moment losing his presence of mind, he observed, as they were carrying him down the ladder, that the tiller ropes, v hich had been shot away, were not yet replaced, and ordered that nev ones should be rove immediately, then, that he might not be seen by the crew, he took out his handkerchief, and covered his face and his stars. Had he but concealed these badges of honour from the enemy, England perhaps would not have had cause to receive with sorrow the news of the battle of Trafalgar The cockpit was crowded with wounded and dying men, over whose bodies he was with some difficulty conveyed, and laid upon a pallet in the midshipmen's berth. It was soon perceived, upon examination, that the wound was mortal. This ho vever, was concealed from all except Captain Hardy, the chaplain, and the medical attendants. He himself being certain, from the sensation in his back and the gush of blood he felt momently within his breast, that no human care could avail him, invisted that the surgeon should leave him, and attend to those to whom he might be useful, 'for,' said he, 'you can do nothing } for me' All that could be done was to fan him with 1 ton, Hardy - tale care of poor Lady Hamilton paper, and frequently to give him lemonade to allesiste his intense thirst. He was in great pain, and expressed much anxiety for the event of the acion, which now visible expression of joy gleamed in the eyes and marked the countenance of the dying hero. But he became impatient to see Hardy, and as that officer, though often sent for, could not leave the deck, Nelson feared that some fatal cause prevented him, and repeatedly eried 'Will no one bring Hardy to me? He must be killed, he is surely dead?' An hour and ten minutes elapsed from the time when Nelson received his wound before Hardy could come to him. They shook hands in silence, Hard, in vain struggling to suppress the feelings of that most painful and yet sublimest moment 'Well, Hardy,' said Nelson, 'how goes the day with us?' 'Very well,' replied Hardy, 'ten ships have struck, but five of the van have tacked, and show an intention to bear down upon the Victory I have called to o or three of our fresh ships round, and have no doubt of giving them a drubbing ' 'I hope,' said Nelson, 'none of our ships have struck?' Hardy answered, 'There was no fear of that' Then, and not till then, Nelson spoke of himself 'I am a dead man, Hardy,' said he, 'I am going fast it will be all over with me soon Come nearer to me Let my dear Lady Hamilton have my liair, and all o her things belonging to me.' Hardy observed that he hoped Mr Beatty could vet hold out some prospect of life. 'Oh no,' he replied, 'it is impossible. My back is shot through Beatty will tell you so' Hardy then once more shook hands with him, and with a heart almost bursing, linstened upon deck

By this time all feeling below the breast was gone, and Nelson, having made the surgeon ascertum this, said to him 'You know I am gone I know it feel something rising in my breast, putting his hand on his left side, 'which tells me so' And upon Beatty's inquiring whether his pain was very great, he replied, 'So great that he wished he was dead. Jet,' said he in a lower voice, 'one would like to live a little longer too!" And after a few minutes, in the same undertone, he added 'What would become of poor Lady Hamilton if she knew my situation?' Next to his country she occupied his thoughts Captain Hardy, some fifty minutes after he had left the cockpit, returned, and, agun taking the hand of his dying friend and com mander, congratulated hun on having gained a complete How many of the enemy were taken he did not know, as it was impossible to perceive them dis tinctly, but fourteen or fifteen at least 'That's well,' cried Nelson, 'but I bargained for twenty' And then, in a stronger voice, he said "Anchor, Hardy", anchor" Hardy upon this hinted that Admiral Collingwood would take upon himself the direction of affairs. 'Not while I live, Hardy,' said the dying Nelson, meffectually endeavouring to raise himself from the bed 'do you anchor! His previous orders for preparing to anchor had shown how clearly he forestw the necessity of this Presently, calling Hardy back, he said to him, in a low voice, 'Don't throw me overloard,' and he dested that he might be buried by his parents, unless it should please the king to order otherwise. Then reverting to private feeling. Take care of my dear Lady Hamil me, Hardy said he Hardy Ine t down and Lis ed his cheek and Nelson said 'Now I am satisfied Thank God I have done my du's I Hardy stood ner began to declare itself. As often as a ship struck, the I him in silence for a moment or two then keel again crew of the Intern hurraed, and a every hurra a f and kissed his forehead. 'Who is that? said Nelson, will not attempt it any longer, being satisfied with the continual conviction that I save all I can, and give all I can, that is, all I have.'

On the 1st of February 1791 he wrote his last letter to America. It shows how anxious he was that his followers should consider themselves as one united body 'See,' said he, 'that you never give place to one thought of separating from your brethren in Enrope. Lose no opportunity of declaring to all men that the Methodists are one people in all the world, and that it is their full determination so to continue' He expressed, also, a sense that his hour was almost come. 'Those that desire to write,' said he, 'or say anything to me, have no time to lose, for Time has shaken me by the hand, and Death is not far behind 'words which his father had used in one of the last letters that he addressed to his sons at Oxford. On the 17th of that month he took cold after preaching at Lambeth. For some days he struggled against an increasing fever, and continued to preach till the Wednesday following, when he delivered his last sermon From that time he became daily weaker and more lethargic, and on the 2nd of March he died in peace, being in the eighty eighth year of his age, and the sixty-fifth of his ministry

. During his illness he said 'Let me be buried in nothing but what is woollen, and let my corpse be carried in my coffin into the chapel.' Some years before, he had pre pared a vault for himself, and for those itinerant preachers who might die in London In his will he directed that six poor men should have twenty shillings each for carry ing his body to the grave, 'for I particularly desire,' said he, 'there may be no hearse, no coach, no escutcheon, no pomp except the tears of them that loved me, and are following me to Abraham's bosom. I solemnly adjure my executors, in the name of God, punctually to observe this.' At the desire of many of his friends, his body was carried into the chapel the day preceding the in terment, and there lay in a kind of state becoming the person, dressed in his clerical habit, with gown, cassock, and band, the old clerical cap on his head, a Bible in one hand, and a white handkerchief in the other The face was placed, and the expression which death had fixed upon his venerable features was that of a serene and heavenly smile. The crowds who flocked to see him were so great that it was thought prudent, for fear of accidents, to accelerate the funeral, and perform it between five and six in the morning. The intelligence, however, could not be kept entirely secret, and several hundred persons attended at that unusual hour Richardson, who performed the service, had been one of his preachers almost thirty years. When he came to that part of the service, 'Forusmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God to take unto himself the soul of our dear brother,' his voice changed, and he substituted the word father, and the feeling with which he did this was such that the congregation, who were shedding silent tears, burst at once into loud weeping

The second Mrs Southey (Caroline Anne Bowles, 1786-1854), who was the daughter of a retired officer, submitted to Southey a pathetic story in verse, Ellen Fitzarthur, and the laureate encouraged her to publish it. It was followed by The Widow's Tale, with other poems (1822), Solisary Hours, in prose and verse (1826), and by her most popular work, Chapters on Church; ards (1829), prose tales and sketches republished from Blackwood's Magazine So early as 1823 Southey had asked Caroline Bowles to co-operate in writing a poem on Robin Hood, never completed, and her contributions to the scheme were published after Southey's death, with other fragments In 1823 also she produced Tales of the Factories in verse, on the hardships of factory hands, her longest poem was The Birthday (1836) The marriage in 1839 amazed the friends of both Southey was already sinking into mental and physical decay, and in 1843 his death left her a widow for the last nine years of her life. The following is her poem on The Pauper's Death-bed.

Tread softly—bow the head— In reverent silence bow— No passing bell doth toll— Yet an immortal soul Is passing now

Stranger 1 however great,
With lowly reverence bow,
There's one in that poor shed—
One by that paltry bed—
Greater than thou.

Beneath that beggar's roof,
Lo! Death doth keep his state,
Enter—no crowds attend—
Enter—no guards defend
This palace gate.

That pavement damp and cold No smiling courtiers tread, One silent woman stands Lifting with meagre hands A dying head

No mingling voices sound— An infant wail alone, A sob suppressed—again That short deep gasp, and then The parting groan

O change—O wondrous change !—
Burst are the prison bars—
This moment there, so low,
So agonised, and now
Beyond the stars '

O change—stupendous change!
There lies the soulless clod
The sun eternal breaks—
The new immortal wakes—
Wakes with his God

Southey's Life and Correspondence (6 vols. 1849-50) by his younger son, the Rev Cuthbert Southey (1819-89), contains a delightful fragment of antobography A Selection from the letters was edited by his son in-law, Mr Warter (4 vols. 1850), who also issued Southey's Commonflace Book (4 vols. 1849-51) his Correspondence with Caroline Bowles was edited by Professor Dowden (1881) See too the latter's Southey's (Men of Letters, 1880) Deunis's Southey (Boston, 1887), Southey's Journal of a Towr in the Netherlands with introduction by Dr Robertson Nicoll (1902), and Sir Leslie Stephen's delightful essay on 'Southey's Letters in Studies of a Biographer (vol. 1v 1902).

Samuel Taylor Coleridge,

poet, critic, and philosopher, was born at Ottery St Mary, Devon, 21st October 1772 He was the youngest son of the Rev John Coleridge (born 1718), vicar of the parish, chaplain-priest of the Collegiate Church, and master of the grammar-school, and of his second wife Ann, the daughter of an Exmoor farmer named Bowdon John Coleridge, of whose family and origin little or nothing is known, was a self-made man began life as a village schoolmaster, married, and in his thirtieth year matriculated as a sizar of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge (1748) He had kept some five or six terms when the offer of the mastership of an endowed school at South Molton, and a prospect of taking orders, induced him to leave the university without a degree (1749) He moved to Ottery in 1760, and died 4th October 1781 He was a learned man, and published, inter alia, an excursus (Dissertations) on two chapters of the Book of Judges (1768) and a Critical Latin Grammar The anecdotes recorded by De Quincey and Gillman of his eccentricity and simple-minded ness are apocryphal. When he died three of his sons were officers in the army, three were, or had been, at the university, and his widow, though but poorly left, was not penniless. In the autobiographical letters addressed to Thomas Poole in 1797-98 (Letters, &c, 1895, vol 1 pp 3-21) Coleridge describes himself as a 'poetic child,' a devourer of fairy tales, a weaver of day-dreams, at odds with his playmates, but delighting in 'long conversations' with his father was nine years old his father died, and in the following spring (24th April) he was nominated to Christ's Hospital, and entered the 'great school' on 12th September 1782

At first he was forlorn and unhappy, ill-fed and homesick, but as time went on there were mitigations His schoolfellow, Thomas Fanshawe Middleton, afterwards Bishop of Calcutta, noticed and protected him from the first, and after he had taken rank as 'a Grecian' he made friends with and held his own among seniors and contemporaries Chief among those who looked up to him as elder and superior was Charles Lamb He believed—or, perhaps, chose to think—that he owed his faculty as writer and poet to the severities of his fierce though painstaking master, James Boyer, who forced him to use his brains and control his fancies, and who once, he said, flogged him justly when he had been reading Voltaire and 'sported infidel' It was doubtless to the austere discipline of the Blue coat School that Coleridge owed the command over his extraordinary talents, which neither genius nor temperament could 'utterly abolish or destroy' When he was seventeen, on one of the monthly 'leave days' he swam the New River in his clothes, and was punished for his folly by a sharp attack of rheumatic fever He never completely regained his health, and it is probable | that the rheumatic gout, or what not, which attacked him at Keswick, encouraging and confirming, if it did not awaken, the indulgence in opium, may be traced to this fateful escapade. He was in the sick ward-'seas of pain waving through each limb' (see sonnet to Pain)-for several months, and after his recovery his next step was to fall, or rush, into a first love with a schoolfellow's sister named Mary Evans She was a blue eyed maiden, quick-tempered and quick-witted, 'nobly planned' to love and be loved, but, alas I she was not for Coloridge, and, to his loss and sorrow, married and passed out of his life. But whilst he was at school, and for long afterwards, she was a 'phantom of delight,' an influence and an inspiration

Coleridge was entered as a sizar on the books of Jesus College, Cambridge, 5th Tebruary 1791, but did not go into residence till the following October He received from the Hospital a donation of £40, an annual exhibition of £40, a 'Rustat' scholarship for the sons of clergymen of about £25 per annum, and an irregular allowance from his brothers. With prudence this was a bare sufficiency, but from ignorance or indifference he at once plunged into debt thanks to the presence and example of Middleton, he worked hard, and in July 1792 was Browne medallist (see The Poetical Works, 1893, pp 476-In the winter of 1702 he was 'among the select' for the Craven scholarship, but missed success The long vacation of 1793 was spent at Ottery, and towards the close of the Michaelmas term hewent up to London, spent his last guinea, and enlisted (2nd December 1793) in the 15th or King's Regiment of Light Dragoons Debts to his collegetutor and to Cambridge tradesmen prompted this counsel of despair He had wasted his time, histalents, and his brothers' money, and he shrink from the disclosure which was at hand. gests and exploits' of Silas Tomkyn Comberbacke (his nom de guerre), which Cottle and Gillman retail, are more or less mythical A less agreeable but a more probable version of the story is to befound in Charles Lloyd's novel Edmund Oliver, which was published in 1798 Coleridge was an indifferent dragoon, and soon betrayed his own secret His brother, Captain James Coleridge, discovered that 'Sam' was quartered at Reading, wrote to him a letter of forgiveness, and after sometime and trouble bought him out. His dischargeis dated 10th April 1794, and on the following day he went up to Cambridge. The authorities were lement, and he escaped with a nominal punishment.

At the end of the summer term he started for a walking tour in North Wales, taking Oxford on his way. Then it was that he first met Robert Southey, of Balliol College, and, inspired by his sympathy and companionship, talked out a scheme for turning socialist and emigrating with a chosen band to America. Coleridge, who was great at coining words, thought communism or socialism might be rechristened Pantisocracy Early in August, when the tour was over, he rejoined Southey at Bristol, where he met and engaged himself to his future wife, Sarah Fricker She was the eldest of five sisters, of whom the second, Mary, was already married to a young Quaker poet named Robert Lovell, and the third, Edith, was betrothed to Southey Byron maintained that Sarah and Edith were 'milliners of Bath,' and, when brought to poor gave his authority for the statement (Letters and Journals, 1901, vol vi p They cer-113) tainly went out to work in the houses of friends, and it is possible that they had been taught their trade They were, however, of decent stock and parentage, and had been born and brought better up to In Sep things tember Colendge returned, somewhat reluctantly, to Cambridge, and kept one more term, but he passed the time in writing letters to Southey and in preaching pantisocracy In December he quitted the university without taking a degree. His first work, The Fall of Robespierre, an Historic Drama, of which Southey wrote the second and third acts, was published at Cambridge in September 1794. The first act contains the well-known Jines, 'Tell me on what holy ground May domestic peace be found'

For a few weeks he lingered in London, writing sonnets for the Morning Chronicle, and 'sitting late, drinking late' with Charles Lamb at the 'Cat and Salutation' in Newgate Street, but early in February, at Southey's instance or insistence, removed to Bristol. For some months the friends lodged together and endeavoured to make a living by lecturing on politics, history, and theology (for specimens of Coleridge's political lectures, see Conciones ad Populum, printed in pamphlet form at Bristol, November 1795, and republished in Essays on His Own Times, 1850, vol. 1 pp. 1–55), but in the autumn they quarrelled and dissolved partnership. Southey had been the first to realise that pantisocracy was impracticable, and, to his friend's dismay and indignation, determined to pass the winter with his uncle at Lisbon. The result was that Coleridge, relying on the offer of a new friend and patron, Joseph Cottle, a Bristol bookseller, married (4th October 1793) and settled with his wife in a 'myrtle-bound' cottage at Clevedon Here, for a brief while, 'domestic peace' was found, but want of books, friends, and, perhaps, the necessaries of life in less than threemonths led a 'domestication' with his motherin law at Bristol The spring of 1796 was taken up with the publication of the Watchman, a periodical which professed to be the organ of the Whig Club and other patriotic societies The first number appeared on 1st March, and the tenth and last on 13th May 1796 (for Coleridge's articles, see the Essays, &c., 1850, vol 1 pp 99-178) Meanwhile a volume of Poems on Various Subjects (first edition) was issued by Cottle, 16th April 1796 The summer was consumed in devising abortive plans for making a living at Derby and elsewhere. He was away from home 'prospecting' when his eldest son—named, but not christened, David Hartley—was born, 19th September, and two days later he returned, bringing with him as inmate and pupil Charles Lloyd, a bank clerk who preferred poetry to keeping his father's ledgers. On 31st December 1796 the Ode to the Departing Year appeared in the Cambridge Intelligencer, and on 1st January 1797 Coleridge, with his wife and baby, took up their quarters in a cottage at Nether Stowey, a market-village at the foot of the Quantock Hills

He moved for two reasons in the first place, he wished to be within reach of his friend Thomas Poole, a tanner of good means and of good education, whose 'mansion' and tan yard were in the village, and secondly, because he proposed to himself to earn his living as market gardener Here he stayed for twenty months, making his home in the now celebrated 'Coleridge Cottage,' and here he wrote The Ancient Mariner, the first part of Christabel, and almost all his greater poems Here, too, grew and flourished his friendship with William and Dorothy Wordsworth, which led to their settling (July 1797) at the neighbouring manor-house of Alfoyden For the next twelve months the friends were constantly together, and the interchange of sentiments and ideas, or, rather, the influence of a mutual inspiration, formed the 'atmosphere' in which the Lyrical Ballads (Sep tember 1798) were conceived and composed Coleridge had other interests besides poetry Cambridge he had come under the influence of William Frend, a Fellow of Jesus College who had turned Unitarian, and in 1795 at Bristol, and afterwards at Taunton and Bridgwater, he volunteered his services as preacher in Unitarian 'Hire' or remuneration was against his principles, but, failing literature and horticulture, he was ready to accept 'a call' from the Unitarian congregation of Shrewsbury, who had invited him (December 1797) to preach on approval At Shrewsbury, and after he had ob tained the appointment, he received and accepted from the brothers Josiah and Thomas Wedgwood the offer of an annuity for life of £150, and to meet their views, if not to satisfy their requirements, he resigned the ministry and returned to Stowey the long run the Wedgwood annuity proved a donum exitiale, an injurious benevolence, but for a while competence came with healing on its wings. On 15th May a second son-named, but not christened, Berkeley (died 10th February 1799) -was born to him, and on 16th September, in company with the Wordsworths, he left England for Germany After a few days spent at Hamburg, where he visited the 'German Milton,' Klopstock, he parted from his friend and took lodgings (1st October) at Ratzeburg in the house of the pastor Having learnt to read the language with ease and to murder the accent, he left Ratzeburg on 6th February, and matriculated at Göttingen on 12th February 1799 Among the professors whose lectures he attended, and who paid him 'the most flattering attentions,' were the naturalist Blumenbach, and J G Eichhorn, a pioneer of the 'higher criticism' For four months of eager studentship he worked with a will at German literature, laying the foundation, the 'low beginnings,' of his afterwork as critic, theologian, and metaphysician. A journal which he wrote up as letters to his friends at home was published as 'Satyrane's Letters' in The Friend (November-December 1809) and in the Biographia Literaria (1817, vol. 11/pp 183-253) 'A Tour through the Hartz Mountains, &c., which he took in company with young Blumenbach and some English friends, was published in the New Monthly Magazine in 1835 (No xli, pp 211-226) descriptions of scenery and manners in these and other letters are laboured, but precise and vivid He looked upon the world with a poet's eye, and proceeded to put down what he saw with the particularity of an auctioneer or a house agent. In verse he had no need, and in prose no inclination, to learn the art 'to blot' He returned to Stowey in July In September he accompanied Southey, once more his friend, on a walking tour over Dartmoor, and in November, under the guidance of Wordsworth, walked through the whole of the Lake District. During this memorable excursion Wordsworth revived old memories and Coleridge enjoyed a new Henceforth the English lakes and experience. mountains were married to immortal verse. the close of the year Coleridge gave up the cottage at Stowey and moved to London He had already contributed poems to the Morning Post, at that time the property of Daniel Stuart, whose brotherin law, [Sir] James Mackintosh, was the friend and afterwards a connection of the Wedgwoods, but for two or three months (December 1799-March 1800) he was regularly employed as a writer of leaders and, occasionally, as a parliamentary re-These and other newspaper articles (of 1802, 1809, 1811, 1814, and 1817), which not only served the purpose of the moment but have taken rank as literature, were reprinted as Essays, &c (1850, vols 1-111, see, for an appreciation, H D Traill's Coleridge, 1884, pp 79-86) months of successful journalism he bent himself to another task, the translation of the second and third parts of Schiller's Wallenstein to have turned a German poem into a great, some say a greater, English poem in about seven weeks (1st March-21st April 1800)

It was now a question where he should live, and for a while he halted, or seemed to halt, between south and north, the vicinity of Poole or the vicinity of Wordsworth, but the north prevailed On 24th July 1800 he brought his wife and Hartley to Greta Hall, a newly-built and partly-furnished house which stands on 'a small eminence a furlong from Keswick,' and for fifteen months he remained at home At first, before and after the birth (14th September 1800) of his third son, Derwent, he passed his time wandering, note-book in hand, over the hills and exploring the remoter valleys, and in some genial moment wrote the second part of Christabel, but, with the approach of winter, fell into a diseased condition of nerve and limb He contrived to edit some articles of Poole's for the Morning Post, and he assisted the Wordsworths in the transcription of poems for a second edition of the Lyrical Ballads, but attempted nothing original It was in the winter of 1800-1 that, in Charles Lamb's expressive phrase, the 'dark column turned,' and his promising and joyous youth passed into an unrejoicing and un fruitful manhood. Two causes are assigned for this disastrous change-opium and an unhappy marriage, but a third must be added-persistent ill health which provoked, though it did not justify, both stimulants and narcotics. As to the opium, Coleridge knew something of its effects at Cambridge, perhaps had been dosed with it at Christ's Hospital, but it was not till the Lake District climate brought on a complication of gouty and rheumatic ailments that he drugged himself habitually and to excess Except for a long spell of total abstinence in 1832, he took laudinum to the last, but from April 1816 and onwards the habit was regulated, and, by his own efforts, to a great extent overcome. Of his marriage a few words must be said. His wife was a good woman, honest, veracious, and dutiful, but passionate, nervous, and querulous Intellectually she was quick-witted and clear-headed, and above the average in knowledge and acquirements, but out of sympathy with her husband's imaginative temperament and impatient of his theological subtleties, she could neither share his dreams, nor laugh away his fears, nor 'make the cheerless cottage warm' 'Home was no home for him,' and Wordsworth's cottage was both paradise and home. They 'stood apart,' and there was no love to lose between them or to find again 'with tears' It cannot be said that there were faults on both sides-'the faults' were Colendge's-but none the less it was an unlucky as well as an unhappy marriage. Greta Hall witnessed many quarrels and many shortlived reconciliations, but from the end of 1803, though still with occasional meetings and much correspondence, there was a virtual separation

In November 1801 Coleridge went up to London, resumed his connection with Stuart, and visited Poole at Stowey On, perhaps because of, his return to Keswick he wrote Dejection, an Odc (4th April 1802), which has been called the swansong of his Muse In November-December he visited South Wales as the travelling companion of his 'munificent co patron' Tom Wedgwood, and once again in his absence a child, his only daughter, Sara, was born to him (23rd December In the summer Longman published a third edition of his Poems, from which the poems by Lamb and Lloyd were omitted On Sunday, 14th August 1803, lie started with Wordsworth and Dorothy in a 'jaunting-car' on a tour through the Highlands He found the car ill travelling, and, longing to get by himself, he left his friends at Arrochar, near Luss, 29th August, and proceeded on foot and Glencoe to Inverness, and back by Tummel Bridge and Pertli to Edinburgh He walked two hundred and sixty-three miles in eight days, hoping to cure lumself of the gout, to lull the heartache, and to still the nerves - But the remedy increased the disease, and it was at Edinburgh when the walk was over that he wrote The Pains of Sleep A letter from Southey announcing the death of his first born, and offering a visit, recalled him to As it fell out, Southey remained at Greta Hall, first as guest, then as co tenant, and finally as the sole occupier till his death in 1843, while Coleridge, from 1804 to 1810, was but an I infrequent visitor, and after 1812 slept not again under that or other roof-tree of his own sua fata-poetæ / By the end of the year Colendge had resolved to try the effect of a warmer climate, and with means provided by the painter-baronet Sir George Beaumont and Wordsworth, he sailed for Malta on 25th April 1804 On landing at Valetta on 18th May he was received as guest or boarder by Dr (afterwards Sir John) Stoddart and his sister Sarah (afterwards Mrs Hazlitt), but before long (6th July) was offered rooms in the palace of the Civil Commissioner, Sir Alexander Ball Ball, who had been one of Nelson's captains, took a fancy to Coleridge, and percening that though he talked much he talked wisely, employed him as private secretary from the first, and, on the death of the 'Public Secretary of Malta and its Dependencies,' appointed him secretary ad interim (18th January-6th September 1805) At first the climate worked wonders, but in spite of a second change to Sicily (August-November 1804), the effect wore off, and sickness, dejection, and their fateful alleviators He proved a thorough man of remained to stay affairs, and made his mark as secretary, but out of reach of his friends and cut off from his philo sophical pursuits he was a lost man, and felt that he had 'no business there' To make money, to gain credit, to win applause, were as dust in the balance compared with the sympathy of the Words worths or a possible revelation of the mysteries of being He left Malta on 21st September, revisited Syracuse as the guest of his friend G F Leckie, H M Consul, and made a tour through Sicily, visiting Thormina (4th October) and other places of interest. He had reached Naples before 20th November, and thence, after a prolonged stay, arrived at Rome on 11th January 1806, where he passed the spring in the society of Ludwig Tieck, Humboldt, Bunsen, and the American painter Washington Allston He told Gillman and others that Napoleon had given orders for the arrest of the Englishman who had attacked him in the columns of the Morning Post, and that he owed his escape to a warning conveyed to him by an emissary of the Pope. From whatever cause, he left Rome on 18th May, and, after visiting Florence and Pisa, sailed from Leghorn on or about 24th June. He wrote but little whilst he was abroad, but later works betray an intimate acquaintance with Mediterranean politics, a knowledge of Italian literature, and a speaking acquaintance with the 'Fine Arts' (For Sir Alexander Ball, see The Friend, 22nd, 26th, and 27th November 1810, in the 1850 ed, vol. in pp 215-286) He reached I ondon on 17th August, but did not rejoin his family at Greta Hall till the middle of October uinter and early spring (1806-7) were passed at a farmhouse at Coleorton with the Wordsworths, where he listened to the Prelude, which had been completed in his absence, and wrote those pathetic lines with the prosaic title (To a Gentlen ar), in which he bewails his 'sense of past youth and manhood come in vain' The summer was passed at Stowey with his wife and children, and, after their return to Keswick, the late autumn at Bristol, where he formed the close attachment to his friends the Morgans, which in later years served him in such good stead when 'old friends burned dim' and the shadows deepened. In 1808 (January-June) he delivered his first course of 'Lectures on Shakespeare,' &c, at the Royal Institution A few notes, which were taken down at the time (5th February) by H C Robinson (Diary, 1869, vol 1 pp 267-268), and a résumé of two later lectures (Notes and Lectures, &c., 1849, vol 1 pp 323-334), constitute the sole record of More than once he disappointed this course. his patrons by missing a lecture, and on one noted occasion he incurred the censure of the Council by a personal attack on the educationist Joseph Lancaster, who was a persona grafa to the royal family and the public at large (see The Jerningham Letters, 1896, vol 1 p 316), but he attracted notice, and, on the whole, increased his His next venture revealed another reputation side of his character He had given proof of capacity as a journalist, a diplomatist, a public lecturer, and, instead of following up either of these callings, nothing would serve him but to compile and publish at his own cost an abstruse periodical from which 'Personal and Party Politics and the Events of the Day' were deliberately excluded It was 'a vain endeavour!' The Friend, which was written and despatched by post from Gras mere, was printed first by W Pennington of Kendal, and afterwards by J Brown of Penrith The first number appeared on 1st June 1809, and the twentyseventh and last on 15th March 1810 even the literary Unitarian and Quaker public would not buy 'Principles' at a shilling a week. The original issue of The Friend was republished in 1812, and in 1818 Coloridge expanded his weekly essays into three volumes The Friend wants reading as it has always wanted readers, but it rewards the adventurous! For a year and six months (18th September 1808 to April 1810) Coloridge lived with Wordsworth at Grasmere, but on the demise of The Irrend he seems to have returned to what was still his residence, Greta Hall Of this period there is no record, and when the curtain lifts once more he is posting to London with Wordsworth's old friend Basil Montagu, who had offered him rooms in his house. It seems that Wordsworth, acting for the best, had warned Montagu that Coleridge was a troublesome inmate, and that Montagu indiscreetly, if not ill-naturedly, repeated a confidential hint in the form of a message or ultimatum to Coleridge There had been differences in the past, and the return to Greta Hall points to an altered relationship, but then for the first time Colendge heard his sentence passed, and it broke his heart The greater the truth, the greater the libel-most of all when it is spoken by one's 'own familiar friend' The quarrel or alienation was brought to an end in May 1812 through the intervention of H C Robinson, but in the following December fresh offence was given and taken, and it was long before there was a lasting teconciliation As Wordsworth had foreseen, Montagu soon tired of his charge, and Coleridge took refuge with the Morgans, who, with brief intervals, shared their home with him for almost five years -at first at Hammersmith, then in London, and finally at Calne in Wiltshire During the summer months (April-November) of 1811 he was on the staff of the Courier writing leading articles (Essays, &c, 1850, vol 111 pp 733-938), and discharging the duties of sub-editor, and when this arrangement broke down or came to an end, he delivered his second course of lectures (November 1811-January 1812) on Shakespeare and Milton at the Scots' Corporation Hall in Fleet Street (for a reprint of Collier's shorthand notes, see Lectures, &c, edited by T Ashe, 1883) The lectures were well attended Byron, who 'came to scoff,' admits rather reluctantly that the lecturer 'is a sort of rage at present' In February-March 1812 Coleridge paid a brief and final visit to Greta Hall, and on his return rejoined the Morgans, who had moved to No 71 Berners Street He delivered a third course of lectures on 'The Drama'at Willis's Rooms in May-June, and a fourth course on 'Belles Lettres' at the Surrey Institute in October In December he was engaged in attending rehearsals of Remorse (a rewritten version of the once rejected Osorio), which, at Byron's instance, had been accepted by the committee of Drury Lane Theatre For once his star seemed to be in the ascendant, but before the year (1812) closed Josiah Wedgwood, without assigning any reason whatever, withdrew his moiety of the annuity of £150 which had been offered and conferred for life' Wedgwood was an honourable man, but the violation of a solemn pledge was, on the evidence before us, unjustifiable Thenceforward Mrs Coleridge's regular income was less than £70 a year, a sum which, in 1814 and possibly afterwards, was expended on the education of her sons. At a later period she contributed a small annual payment towards the expenses of Southey's household

Remorse was produced for the first time at Drury Lane Theatre on 23rd January 1813, and ran for twenty nights. On the whole the play was a success, and Coleridge received at least £400 for his rights as author. The play was published in pamphlet form and went into a third edition. Like the fair breeze which drove the Ancient Mariner into a silent sea, this gust of fortune blew no good to Coleridge. He lingered in London through the spring and summer, and it was not till October that he started for Bristol, partly to make money by lecturing and partly to transact business for the Morgans. A course of six lectures on Shakespeare and Milton was delivered in October, a second course on the same subject in November, and, yet again, a third course, of four lectures, on Milton in April 1814, when he scandalised his old friend and brother-minister, Dr Estlin, by describing the Satan of Paradise Lost as a 'sceptical Socinian' But then and always, whether the room was full or half-empty, he 'gave satisfaction' to the audience. It was not the matter (which was sometimes hard to follow) but the manner which revealed the native and inextinguishable genius of the orator speak of Shakespeare and Milton was to unlock his soul and to pour out a flood of eloquence as the 'spirit gave him utterance' Eleven months (October 1813-September 1814) were spent at For the greater part of this 'weary time' he was the guest of his old friend and correspondent, Josiah Wade, who placed him under the care of a Bristol physician, Dr Daniel, and provided him But under whatever conditions with an attendant of restraint or freedom, his life was grievous if ever, he was 'wrecked in a mist of opium' Early in the autumn he was back with the Morgans at Ashley, near Box, and in November followed them Thenceforward there was a betterment, to Calne the result of a strenuous though unsuccessful attempt to break through the opium-habit. letters on the Irish question, 'To Mr Justice Fletcher,' were published in the Courser, September-December 1814 (Essays, &c., 1830, vol 111 pp 677-733), and in 1815, though he published no books, delivered no lectures, and was silent in the Courser, he wrote and passed for the press the Biographia Literaria (1817), revised and rewrote his poems—Sibylline Leaves (1817)—and completed three acts of Zapolya (1817) Over and above these measurable entities he laid the foundation of, or at least wrote fragmentary notes for, a magnum opus, to be entitled Logosophia—in Six Treatises Despite these achievements Coleridge was sorely in need of funds, and, as it will, poverty stood between him and his printers and He must have been in dire straits publishers when, in response to some complaint or revelation of his circumstances, Lord Byron sent him a hundred pounds It was a fine and generous action, for the donor had no spare cash at his disposal, and was able and willing to help in other ways without putting his hand in his pocket. On the strength of this loan or gift, and armed with the MS of Christabel, which Byron had already shown to Murray, and with the MS of Zapolya for the managing committee of Drury Lane, he went up to town at the end of March 1816 When or where he forgathered with Byron, who was on the eve of his lifelong exile, is uncertain, but an arrangement was come to with Murray for the publication of Christabel, and, more important still, Coloridge gained a haven and foothold for himself On the recommendation of Dr Joseph Adams, the relative of an old Bristol friend, Mr Matthew Coates, he was received on 25th April as patient and boarder by Mr James Gillman, a Highgate surgeon, who was willing to undertake his case I and could offer him 'retirement and a garden' Here, 'or not far off,' he remained for the rest of his life In April 1816 Coleridge was but halfway through his forty-fourth year, but with the first genial reception of Gillman his wanderings and his story come to an end Highgate was 'a termination' and a last retreat. To what extent Gillman helped Coleridge to 'give up laudanum' is disputed and is insusceptible of proof, but he undoubtedly inspired and encouraged him 'to scotch Byron (who had stood his friend the snake' in 1816), under the impression that his kindness had been abused, reviled him in Don Juan (1819), but his odious personalities were no longer even 'part a truth,' and the calumny fell to the ground Coleridge's frailties and shortcomings were ever before him, and at the last his plea was 'to be forgiven for fame' During the eighteen years of life which remained to him he was not only loved but honoured, not only admired but esteemed and revered The 'dark column' turned once more, and 'at evening there was light.' Christabel (with Kubla Khan, a Vision, and The Pains of Sleep) was published in June, and the Statesman's Manual (first lay sermon) in November 1816 The Edinburgh Review attacked and vilipended both poetry and prose. If the writer of these reviews was not, as Coleridge supposed, William Hazlitt, he was an accomplished plagiarist of the style and quality of Hazlitt's acknowledged compositions Early in 1817 a second Lay Sermon, and, later in the year, the long-delayed Biographia Literaria and Sibylline Leaves, made their appearance In December Zapolya, which to Coleridge's chagrin had been rejected by the committee of Drury Lane Theatre, was published as a 'Christmas Tale.'

In January 1818 an Essay on Method, which had been prepared some months before, was printed as an Introduction to the first volume of the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, and late in the spring the reconstituted Friend was published in three volumes Neither poetry nor prose filled Coleridge's pockets, and both at the beginning and the end of 1818 he was under the 'necessity of appearing as a lecturer' The first course of fourteen lectures on 'Shakespeare' and 'Poetical Literature' was delivered at Flower-de-Luce Court in Fetter Lane, 27th January-26th March 1818, and two other courses, the first on the 'History of Philosophy,' the other on 'Shakespeare,' were delivered concurrently at the Crown and Archer Tavern in the Strand, 14th December 1818-29th March 1819 With this double course lecturing came to an end, and for many years, so far as the public was concerned, both voice and pen were silent. Two misfortunes, differing in kind and in degree, befell him in successive In 1819 he suffered a considerable loss of money through the bankruptcy of his publisher, Rest Fenner, and, in 1820, his son Hartley was deprived of his Oriel fellowship on the score of intemperance. 'Work without hope' was not beyond Coleridge's power of will, but the business of authorship, always distasteful, became more and more intolerable He shrank into himself, devoting his energies to the accumula tion of materials for his magnum opus, and his leisure to the 'grounding, strengthening, and integration' of a class of young men, pupils or disciples, who attended his discourses and formed a kind of miniature 'school' of philosophy His sole publications during this period were a few contributions to Blackwood's Eduiburgh Magazine-for example, 'Letters to Literary Correspondents, in October 1821, and 'The Historie and Gests of Maxilian' (see Miscellanies, &c., 1885, pp 261-285) in January 1822 In 1824 he was elected a Royal Associate of the Royal Society of Literature, a distinction which conveyed an annual pension of one hundred guineas, and by way of doing service for this honorarium he read (18th May 1825) at a meeting of the society a paper on 'The Prometheus of Æschylus' (1btd, pp 55-83) In 1825 he published his Aids to Reflection, a commentary in the form of aphorisms and selected passages from the writings of Archbishop Leighton The Aids, which may be regarded as an eirenicon between faith and reason, and at one time served as a kind of manual of liberal orthodoxy, brought their compiler applause and recognition, and since his death have been frequently republished In 1828 he prepared for the press a collected edition of his poems, which was published in three volumes by William Pickering A second edition, with emendations, was issued in 1829 In June-July 1828 Coleridge accompanied Wordsworth and his daughter Dora on a tour through Belgium and His 'merry' rhymes on Koln on the Rhine. and its 'two and seventy stenches' are a proof that the boisterous high spirits of his youth were not gone for ever His last work was a pamphlet on The Constitution of Church and State, which deals with the question of Catholic Emancipation, and seems to be rather than is a plea for inaction or reaction For the last three years of his life Coleridge was with 'few and brief intervals confined to a sick-room,' but he was often to be seen, and he could almost always talk 'to the satisfaction' if sometimes to the bewilderment of his hearers Once and again he went into company Early in August 1832 he was present at the christening of his grandchild Edith, and drove to the church with his wife, who was living with her daughter and son-in-law at Hampstead. In June 1833 he attended a meeting of the British Association at Cambridge, and though he rose from his bed at Trinity College 'not a man but a bruise,' he seems to have taken all literature 'for his province in a series of monologues to his friends (see Conversations at Cambridge [by C V Le Grice], 1836, pp 1-36) He suffered much towards the close of his life, but retained almost to the last his intellectual subtlety and his discursive eloquence. He died at The Grove, Highgate, 25th July 1834.

Many of Coleridge's best-known works were The Table Talk, which was taken posthumous down almost verbatim from his lips by his sonin-law and nephew, H N Coleridge, was published (2 vols) in 1835, Letters, Conversations, and Recollections of S T Coleridge, by T Allsop (2 vols), in 1836, Literary Remains (4 vols 1836-39), Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit (1840), The Idea of Life (1848), Notes, Theological and Political (1853), Letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge (2 vols 1895), Anima Poetafrom his Unpublished Note-books (1895) greater part of his Marginalia, a work on Logic (2 vols MS), the preliminary chapters of his magnum opus, Notes on the Gospels, &c.; Diaries of Tours, and a multitude of letters, fragmentary papers, notes and memoranda remain unpublished

It is commonly held that Coleridge wrote a few poems, half a-dozen more or less, of supreme excellence, and that he did no more. It is true that Coleridge at his best is immeasurably greater than at his second best, but, if we except his juvenilia, he wrote little or nothing which may be passed over or rejected as worthless. His peculiar quality as a poet lay in his power of visualising scenesof which neither he nor another had any actual experience. These 'fancies from afar' did not flash upon him as memories of the past nor asstrange and disordered dreams, but they assumed the realities and possibilities of a harmonious though supernatural world. The open vision was rare, and it was seldom that the intuition was clear Again, he was a laborious and acor adequate complished metrist, and it was only by repeated experiments and intense mental effort that he could clothe these shapings of his imagination in a becoming and appropriate garb Hence it was that after he had passed his thirtieth year and his mind became preoccupied with metaphysical speculations and theological ideas, as Charles Lamb put it, 'he wrote no more Christabels and Ancient Mariners' But whenever he was minded to express his thoughts in verse, he was a poet at last as well as at first. It is enough to mention such poems as Youth and Age, The Garden of Boccaccio, Love, Hope, and Patience in Education, which were written towards the close of his life. If in some half-dozen pieces Coleridge exceeds himself, in at least thirty or more of lesser excellence he displays imaginative and artistic qualities of the highest order The Christmas Carol (1799), Pains of Sleep (1803), and the undated ballad Alice du Clos may be instanced as great poems not reckoned in the first flight. It is, however, only as a lyrical poet that Coleridge belongs to the immortals He could and did force his extraordinary talent into producing dramatic pieces which have been performed with success and still invite study, but his plots drag and his characters are neither attractive nor rememberable Remorse, a Tragedy (1812), and Zapolya, a Christmas Tale, which was written in 1815, contain beauties, 'purple patches' suitable for quotation, but as dramas they are lifeless and uninteresting. On the other hand, his one translation, Schiller's Wallenstein, rivals if it does not surpass the original As a humourist he attempted little, but that little was first-rate. The wit of The Devil's Thoughts was Southey's wit, but the humour is Coleridge's, and as 'good, simple, savage verse,' as Byron labelled his Dedication to Don Juan, Fire, Fanune, and Slaughter and The Two Round Spaces neither require nor admit of an apology Originally mere jeux d'esprit, doggerel verses in a newspaper, they have won their place in literature

Coleridge maintained that he owed his first inspiration as a poet to Bowles's sonnets and the 'Lewesdon Hill of Mr Crowe.' His first turn for versification was, perhaps, more immediately due to an intimate knowledge of the odes of Gray and Collins, and his first inclination towards sentiment and the poetry of the affections to Bowles and Cowper, and to Macpherson's Ossian The Romantic School was already a power in Germany, and was touching the younger generation in England through translations or the works of such imitators as Horace Walpole, Mrs Radcliffe, 'Monk' Lewis, and William Taylor previous to the inception or publication of the Lyrical Ballads, and it is certain that before he went to Germany, in September 1798, Coleridge had read Voss's Luise in the original and was familiar with translations of Schiller's Robbers and the Ghostseer But however responsive he may have been to 'voices in the air,' he owed the awakening and the consummation of his genius to the example and companionship of Wordsworth and of Wordsworth's sister Dorothy We have only to compare his Ode to the Departing Year (December 1796) with the great Stowey poems, beginning with This Lime tree Bower my Prison (May 1797), to understand in what degree and in what sense Wordsworth was 'the master-light of all his seeing'! There is, indeed, little or no resemblance between Coleridge's great poems and Wordsworth's great poems The magic and the melody of Coleridge's verse are all his own, and the spirit and direction of his poetry are other and different from the spirit and direction of Wordsworth's As a poet Coleridge 'taught us little,' and as a poet Wordsworth was essentially a teacher, but it was Wordsworth who helped Coleridge to find himself, and, as Dykes Campbell has finely expressed it, 'put a new song in his mouth'

But art for art's sake did not satisfy Coloridge. The desire of his soul was to teach and to preach, and in order to deliver his message he expended—some would say scattered—his intellectual activities in various directions. He was a journalist, a critic, a lecturer, a philosopher, and a divine. He regarded it as his mission to found a new school, or at any rate to elaborate a new system, of philosophy, and at the same time to propound an eirenicon between faith and reason. It is held by those most competent to judge that as a philosopher he interpreted and carried on the speculations of others-of Kant and Maass, of Fighte and Schelling-but failed to formulate or work out a system of his own Of the vast preparations which he made for a work to comprehend all knowledge and all philosophy, a portion sufficient to form an introductory volume was dictated to his disciple and amanuensis, Joseph Henry Green, and remains unpublished His influence on the religious thought and opinion of his own age and of the last sixty years is of a less questionable nature The Aids to Reflection (1825) and the posthumous Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit (1840) have been largely instrumental in deepening and widening religious thought within and without the pale of the Churches Their direct and immediate influence belongs to the past, but the leaven is still at work. Finally, in his critical notes on Shakespeare's plays, originally delivered as lectures, and in his masterly dissertation on the 'Tenets peculiar to Mr Wordsworth' which concludes the Biographia Literaria, he speaks not as the inspirer of others, but as a potent if not a final authority. A word which he borrowed from the Greek and applied to Shakespeare describes him best. He was 'myriadminded'

From 'The Ancient Mariner'

'The Sun now rose upon the right Out of the sea came he, Still hid in mist, and on the left Went down into the sea

And the good south wind still blew behind, But no sweet bird did follow, Nor any day for food or play Came to the mariners' hollo!

And I had done a hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe
For all averred, I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow
Ah wretch! said they, the bird to slay,
That made the breeze to blow!

Nor dim nor red, like God's own head, The glorious Sun uprist Then all averred, I had killed the bird That brought the fog and mist 'Twas right, said they, such birds to slay, That bring the fog and mist

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew, The furrow followed free, We were the first that ever burst Into that silent sea.

Down dropt the breeze, the sails dropt down, 'Twis sad as sad could be, And we did speak only to break The silence of the sea!

All in a hot and copper sk), The bloody Sun, at noon, Right up above the mast did stand, No bigger than the Moon.

Day after day, day after day, We stuck, nor breath nor motion, As idle as a painted ship Upon a painted ocean

Water, water, every where, And all the boards did shrink, Water, water, every where, Nor any drop to drink.

The very deep did rot O Christ!
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea.

About, about, in reel and rout The death fires danced at night, The water, like a witch soils, Burnt green, and blue and white.

And some in dreams assured were Of the spirit that plagued us so Nine fathom deep he had followed us From the land of mist and snow

And every tongue, through utter drought, Was withered at the root, We could not speak, no more than if We had been choked with soot.

Ah! well a-day! what evil looks Had I from old and young! Instead of the cross, the Albatross About my neck was hung

There passed a weary time. Each throat Was parched, and glazed each eye.

A usury time 'a neary time!

How glazed each neary eye,

When looking westward, I beheld

A something in the sky

At first it seemed a little speck, And then it seemed a mist, It moved and moved, and took at last A certain shape, I wist.

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist !
And still it neared and neared
As if it dodged a water-sprite,
It plunged and tacked and veered

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked, We could nor laugh not wail, Through utter drought all dumb we stood!
I bit my arm, I sucked the blood,
And cried, A sail! a sail!

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked, Agaposthey heard me call Gramercy, they for joy did grin, And all at once their breath drew in, As they were drinking all.

See! see! (I cried) she tacks no more! Hither to work us weal, Without a breeze, without a tide, She steadies with upright keel!

The western wave was all a flume.
The day was well nigh done!
Almost upon the western wave
Rested the broad bright Sun,
When that strange shape drove suddenly Betwint us and the Sun

And straight the Sun was flecked with bars, (Heaven's Mother send us grace!)
As if through a dungeon grate he peered,
With broad and burning face.

Alas! (thought I, and my heart beat loud) How fast she nears and nears! Are those her sails that glance in the Sun, Like restless gossameres!

Are those her ribs through which the Sun Did peer, as through a grate?
And is that Woman all her crew?
Is that a DEATH? and are there two?
Is DEATH that Woman's mate?

Her has were red, her looks were free, Her locks were yellow as gold Her skin was as white as leprosy, The Night-Mare LIFE IN-DEATH was she, Who thicks man's blood with cold

The naked hulk alongside came,
And the twain were casting dice,
"The game is done! I've won! I've won!",
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.

The Sun's rim dips, the stars rush out At one stride comes the dark, With far heard whisper, o'er the sea, Off shot the spectre bark.

We listened and looked sideways up!

Fear at my heart, as at a cup,

My life blood seemed to sip!

The stars were dim, and thick the night,

The steersman's face by his lamp gleamed white

From the sails the dew did drip—

Till clomb above the eastern bar

The horned Moon, with one bright star

Within the nether tip

One after one, by the star dogged Moon, Too quick for groan or sigh, Each turned his face with a ghastly pang,
And cursed me with his eye.

Four times fifty living men,
(And I heard nor sigh nor groan)
With heavy thuyon, a lifeless lump,
They dropped hown one by one.

The souls did from their bodies fly,:
They fled to bliss or woe! **
And every soul," it passed me by,
Like the whize of my cross bow!

O Wedding Guest' this soul both been Alone on a wide wide sea So lonely 'twas, that God himself Scarce seemed there to be

O sweeter than the marriage feast, Tis sweeter far to me,
To walk together to the kirk
With a goodly company !—

To wilk together to the kirk, And all together pray, While each to his great Father bends, Old men, and babes, and loving friends, And youths and maidens gay

Farewell, farewell ' but this I tell To thee, thou Wedding Guest ' He prayeth well, who loveth well Both man and bird and beast

He prayeth best, who loveth best All things both great and small For the dear God who loveth us, He made and loveth all?

The Mariner, whose eye is bright, Whose beard with age is hoar, -Is gone and now the Wedding Guest Turned from the bridegroom's door

He went like one that hath been stunned,
And is of sense forlorn
A sadder and a wiser man,
He rose the morrow morn
(1797-08)

From 'Christabel'

'Is the middle of night by the eastle clock,
And the owls have awakened the crowing cock!
Tu-whit!—Tu-whoo!
And hark, again! the crowing cock,
How drowsily it crew

Sir Leoline, the Baron rich, Hath a toothless mastiff, which
From her kennel beneath the rock
Maketh answer to the clock,
Fonr for the quarters, and twelve for the hour,
Ever and aye, by shine and shower
Sixteen short howls, not over loud
Some say, she sees my lady's shroud

Is the night chilly and dark? The night is chilly, but not dark. The thin gray cloud is spread on high, It covers but not hides the sky. The moon is behind, and at the full, And yet she looks both small and dull. The night is chill, the cloud is gray. This a month before the month of May, And the Spring comes slowly up this way.

The lovely Indy, Christabel, Whom her father loves so and What makes her in the won so late,
A furlong from the castle gate?
She had dreams all vesteringht
Of her own betrothed knight
And she in the midnight wood will priv
For the weal of her lover that s far away

She stole along, she nothing spoke, The sighs she herved were soft and low, And naught was green upon the oak But moss and rarest inteletoe She kneels beneath the huge oak tree, And in silence prayeth she

The lady sprang up suddenly,
The lovely lady, Christabel!
It mouned as near, as near can be,
But what it is, she cannot tell—
On the other side it seems to be,
Of the huge, broad breasted, old oak tree

The night is chill, the forest bare,
Is it the wind that moaneth bleak?
There is not wind enough in the air to move away the ringlet curl
From the lovely lady's check—
There is not wind enough to twirl
The one red leaf, the last of its clan,
That dances as often as dance it can,
Hanging so light, and hanging so ligh,
On the topmost twig that looks up at the sky

Hush, beating heart of Christabel!

Jesu, Varia, shield her well!

She folded her arms beneath her cloak,
And stole to the other side of the oak

What sees she there?

There she sees a damsel bright,
Drest in a silken robe of white,
That shadowy in the moonlight shone
The neck that made that white robe wan,
Her stately neck, and arms were bare
Her blue veined feet unsandal d were,
And wildly glittered here and there
The gems entangled in her han
I guess, 'twas frightful there to see
A lady so richly elad as she—Beautiful exceedingly 1

They crossed the moat, and Christabel
Took the key that fitted well,
A little door she opened straight,
All in the middle of the gate,
The gate that was ironed within and without,
Where an army in buttle array had marched out.
The lady sank, belike through pain,
And Christabel with might and main Lifted her up, a weary weight,
Over the threshold of the gate
Then the lady rose again,
And inoved, as she were not in pain

So free from danger, free from fear
They cro sed the court—right glid they were
And Christibal devoith cried
To the lidy by her side,
Praise we the Virgin all divine
Who hith rescined thee from thy distress!
Alas, alas! said Geraldine
I cannot speak for weariness
So free from danger free from fear
They crossed the court—right glid they were

They presed the hall that echoes will Pass as lightly as you will?

A light, a glory, a fair luminous cloud

Enveloping the Earth-

And from the soul itself must there be sent A sweet and potent voice, of its own birth, Of all sweet sounds the life and element l

O pure of heart ' thou need'st not ask of me What this strong music in the soul may be 1 What, and wherein it doth exist, This light, this glory, this fur huminous mist, This beautiful and beauty making power

Joy, virtuous Lady! Joy that ne'er was given, Save to the pure, and in their purest hour, Life, and Life's effluence, cloud at once and shower, Joy, Lady 1 is the spirit and the power,

Which wedding Nature to us gives in dower, A new Farth and new Heaven,

Undreunt of by the sensual and the proud-Toy is the sweet voice, Joy the luminous cloud-

We in ourselves rejoice! And thence flows all that charms or car or sight, All melodies the echoes of that voice, All colours a suffusion from that light

There was a time when, though my path was rough, This joy within me dillied with distress. And all misfortunes were but as the stuff

Whence Taney made me dreams of happiness Tor hope grew round me, like the twining vine, And fruits, and foliage, not my own, seemed mine But now afflictions bow me down to earth Nor evre I that they rob me of my mirth,

But oh ' each visitation Suspends what nature gave me at my birth, My shaping spirit of Imagination For not to think of what I needs must feel, But to be still and patient, all I can, And haply by abstruse research to steal

From my own nature all the natural man-This was my sole resource, my only plan Till that which suits a part infects the whole, And now is almost grown the liabit of my soul

Youth and Age

Verse, a Breeze 'mid blossoms straying, Where Hope elung feeding, like a bee-Both were mine! Life went a maying With Nature, Hope, and Poesy, When I was young I

When I was young?-Ah, woeful when ' Ah for the Change twirt Now and Then! This breating House not built with hands, This body that does me grievous wrong, O'er nery Cliffs and glittering Sands, How lightly then it flashed along -Like those trim skiffs, unknown of yore, On winding Lakes and Kivers wide, That ask no aid of Sail or Oar, That fear no spite of Wind or Tide! Nought cared this Body for wind or weather When Youth and I lived in't together

Flowers are lovely. I ove is flower like Friendship is a sheltering tree, O the Jovs, that came down shower like, Of Friendship, Love and Liberty, Erc I was old I

(1807)

Lre I was old? Ah woeful Lre, Which tells me, Youth's no longer here I O Youth f for years so many and sweet, 'I is known that Thou and I were one, I'll think it but a fond conceit-It cannot be, that Thou art gone ! Thy Vesper bell hath not yet tolled -And thou wert aye a Masker bold I What strange disguise liast now put on, To mak believe, that thou art gone? I see these locks in silvery slips. This drooping gait, this altered size But Springtide blossoms on thy lips, And tears take sunshine from thine eyes! Life is but Thought so think I will That Youth and I are House mates still

Dew drops are the gems of Morning, But the tears of mournful Lve! Where no hope is, Life's a warning That only serves to make us greve, When we are old

That only serves to make us gricie With oft and tedious taking leave, Like some poor nigh related guest, That may not rudely be dismist, Yet hath outstry'd his welcome while, And tells the jest without the smile

On the Present War

It is recorded in the shuddering hearts of Christians every Bishop but one voted for the continu ance of the war [with France] They deemed the face of their Religion to be involved in the contest I-Not the Religion of Peace, my Brethren, not the Religion of the meek and lowly Jesus, which forbids to his Disciples all alliance with the powers of this Worldbut the Religion of Mitres and Mysteries, the Religion of Pluralities and Persecution, the Lighteen I housand Pound a Year Religion of Lpiscopics room would there be for Bishops or for Priests in a Religion where Duity is the only object of Reverence, and our Immortality the only article of l'aith-Immortality made probable to us by the Light of Nature, and proved to us by the Kesurrection of Jesus Ilim the High Priests crucified, but he has left us a Religion, which shall prove fatal to every High Pracet-a Religion, of which every true Christian is the Priest his own Heart the Altar, the Universe its Temple, and Litrors and Vices its only Sacrifices. Ride on, mighty Iesus I because of thy words of Iruth of Iove, and Fquality! The age of Priesthood will soon be no more—that of Philosophiers and Christians will succeed, and the torch of Superstition be extinguished for ever of spring, and sow their fields in confident faith of the ripening summer and the rewarding harvest tide 1 But the loss is confined to the unenlightened and the preju diced-say rather, to the weak and prejudiced of a single generation The prejudices of one age are condemned even by the prejudiced of the succeeding ages, for end less are the modes of folly, and the fool joins with the wise in passing sentence on all modes but his own. Who cried out with greater horror against the murderers of the Prophets than those who likewise cried out, Crucify him! Crucify him!-Prophet and Saviour, and Lord of life, Crucify lum! -The truth haters of every future generation will call the truth haters of the preceding age by their true names for even these the stream of time carries onward In fine, truth considered in itself, and in the effects natural to it, may be conceived as a gentle spring or water source, warm from the genial earth, and breathing up into the snow drift that is piled over and around its outlet. It turns the obstacle into its own form and character, and is it makes its way increases its stream. And should it be arrested in its course by a chilling season, it suffers delay, not loss, and writs only for a change in the wind to awaken and again roll onwards

Ariel and Caliban.

If a doubt could ever be entertained whether Shake speare was a great poet, acting upon laws arising out of his own nature, and not without law, as has sometimes been idly asserted, that doubt must be removed by the character of Ariel The very first words uttered by this being introduce the spirit, not as an augel, above man, not a gnome, or a fiend, below man, but while the poet gives him the faculties and the advantages of reason, he divests him of all mortal character, not positively, it is true, but negatively In air he lives, from air lie derives his being, in air he acts, and all his colours and properties secm to have been obtained from the rainbow and the There is nothing about Ariel that cannot be con ceived to exist either at sunrise or at sunset hence all that belongs to Ariel belongs to the delight the mind is capable of receiving from the most lovely external appearances His answers to Prospero are directly to the question, and nothing beyond, or where he expitintes, which is not unfrequently, it is to himself and upon his own delights, or upon the unnatural situation in which he is placed, though under a kindly power and to good ends.

Is there anything in nature from which Shakespeare caught the idea of this delicate and delightful being, with such child like simplicity, yet with such preter natural powers? He is neither born of heaven, nor of earth, but, as it were, between both, like a May blossom kept suspended in air by the fanning breeze, which prevents it from falling to the ground, and only finally, and by compulsion, touching earth. This reluctance of the Sylph to be under the command even of Prospero is kept up through the whole play, and in the exercise of his admirable judgment Shakespeare has availed lumself of it, in order to give Ariel an interest in the event, looking forward to that moment when he was to gain his last and only reward—simple and eternal liberty.

Another instance of admirable judgment and excellent preparation is to be found in the creature contrasted with Ariel—Caliban, who is described in such a manner by Prospero as to lead us to expect the appearance of a foul, unnatural monster. He is not seen at once his voice is heard, this is the preparation he was too offensive to be seen first in all his deformity, and in nature we do not receive so much disgust from sound as from sight. After we have heard Caliban's voice he does not enter, until Ariel has entered like a water nymph. All the strength of contrast is thus acquired without any of the shock of abruptness, or of that un pleasant sensation which we experience when the object presented is in any way hateful to our vision.

The character of Caliban is wonderfully conceived he is a sort of creature of the earth, as Ariel is a sort of creature of the ur lle partakes of the qualities of the brute, but is distinguished from brutes in two ways -by having mere understanding without inoral reason, and by not possessing the instincts which pertrin to absolute animals. Still, Caliban is in some respects a noble being the poet has raised him far above con tempt he is a man in the sense of the imagination all the images he uses are drawn from nature, and are highly poetical, they fit in with the images of Ariel Caliban gives us images from the earth, Ariel images from the air Caliban talks of the difficulty of finding fresh water, of the situation of morasses, and of other circumstances which even brute instinct, without reason could comprehend. No mean figure is employed, no mean pression displayed, beyond animal pression and repugnance to command

Hamlet

The seeming inconsistencies in the conduct and char acter of Hamlet have long exercised the conjectural ingenuity of critics, and, as we are always loth to sup pose that the cause of defective apprehension is in our selves, the mystery has been too commonly explained by the very easy process of setting it down as in fact inexplicable, and by resolving the phenomenon into a misgrowth or lusus of the capricious and irregular genius of Shakespeare The shallow and stupid arro gance of these vulgar and indolent decisions I would fain do my best to expose. I believe the character of Hamlet may be traced to Shakespeare's deep and accu rate science in mental philosophy. Indeed, that this character must have some connection with the common fundamental laws of our nature may be assumed from the fact that Hamlet has been the darling of every country in which the literature of England has been In order to understand him, it is essential that we should reflect on the constitution of our own minds. Man is distinguished from the brute animals in proportion as thought prevails over sense but in the licalthy processes of the mind, a balance is constantly maintained between the impressions from outward objects and the inward operations of the intellect,for if there be an overbalance in the contemplative faculty, man thereby becomes the creature of mere meditation and loses his natural power of action Now one of Shakespeare's modes of creating characters is, to conceive any one intellectual or moral faculty in morbid excess, and then to place himself, Shake-peare, thus mutilated or diseased, under given circumstances,

In Hamlet he seems to have wished to exemplify the moral necessity of a due balance between our attention to the objects of our senses and our medita tion on the worlings of our minds-an equilibrium bets een the real and the imaginary worlds. In Hamlet this balance is disturbed his thoughts, and the images of his faney, are far more vivid than his netual per ceptions, and his very perceptions, instantly passing through the medium of his contemplations, acquire, as they pass, a form and a colour not naturally their own Hence we see a great, an almost enormous, in tellectual activity, and a proportionate aversion to real action consequent upon it, with all its symptoms and This character Shakespeare accompanying qualities places in circumstances under which it is obliged to act on the spur of the moment -Hamlet is brave and carcless of death, but he vaciliates from sensibility, and procrastinates from thought, and loses the power of action in the energy of resolve Thus it is that this tragedy presents a direct contrast to that of Mach th, the one proceeds with the utmost slowness, the other with a crowded and breathless rapidity

The Defects of Wordsworth's Poetry

The first characteristic, though only occasional defect, which I appear to myself to find in these poems is the inconstance of the style. Under this name I refer to the sudden and unprepared transitions from lines or sentences of peculiar felicity—(at all events striking and original)—to a style not only unimpassioned but undistinguished. He sinks too often and too abruptly to that style which I should place in the second division of language, dividing it into the three species first, that which is peculiar to poetry, second, that which is only proper in prose, and third, the neutral or common to both

The second defect I can generalise with tolerable recurrey, if the reader will pardon an uncouth and new coined word. There is, I should say, not seldom a matter of-factness in certain poems. This may be divided into, first, a laborious minuteness and fidelity in the representation of objects, and their positions, as they appeared to the poet himself, secondly, the insertion of accidental eincunstances, in order to the full explanation of his living characters, their dispositions and actions, which circumstances might be necessary to establish the probability of a statement in real life, where nothing is taken for granted by the hearer, but appear superfluous in poetry, where the reader is willing to believe for his own sale.

Third, an undue predilection for the dramatic form in certain poems, from which one or other of two evils results. Lither the thoughts and diction are different from that of the poet, and then there arises an incongruit of style, or they are the same and indistinguishable, and then it presents a species of centriloquism, where two are represented as talking, while in truth one man only speaks.

The fourth class of defects is closely connected with the former but yet are such as arise likewise from an intensity of feeling disproportionate to such knowledge and value of the objects described, as can be fairly anticipated of men in general, even of the most cultivated classes, and with which therefore few only, and those few particularly circumstanced, can be supposed to sympathise. In this class I comprise occasional prolivity, repetition, and an eddying, instead of progression of thought

Tifth and last, thoughts and images too great for the subject. This is an approximation to what might be called mental bombast, as distinguished from verbal, for, as in the latter there is a disproportion of the expressions to the thoughts, so in this there is a disproportion of thought to the circumstance and occasion. This, by the bye, is a fault of which none but a man of genius is capable. It is the awkwardness and strength of Hercules with the distaff of Omphale.

(From the Liegraphia Literaria, Chap ix.)

The Excellences of Wordsworth's Poetry

First, an austere purity of language both grammatically and logically, in short a perfect appropriateness of the words to the meaning

The second characteristic excellence of Mr Words vorth's works is a correspondent weight and sanity of the Thoughts and Sentiments, won, not from books, but from the poet's own meditative observation. They are fresh, and have the den upon them. His muse, at least when in her strength of wing, and when she hovers aloft in her proper element,

'Makes audible a linked lay of truth,
Of truth profound a sweet continuous lay,
Not learnt, but native, her own natural notes!'

Even throughout his smaller poems there is scarcely one which is not rendered valuable by some just and original reflection

Third, the sinewy strength and originality of single lines and paragraphs a frequent curiosa fehiclas of his diction, of which I need not here give specimens. This beauty, and as eminently characteristic of Words worth's poetry, his rudest assailants have felt themselves compelled to acknowledge and admire

Fourth, the perfect truth of nature in his images and descriptions as taken immediately from nature, and proving a long and genial intimacy with the very spirit which gives the physiognomic expression to all the works of nature. Like a green field reflected in a calm and perfectly transparent lake, the image is distinguished from the reality only by its greater softness and lustre. Like the moisture or the polish on a pebble, genius neither distorts nor false colours its objects, but on the contrary brings out many a vein and many a tint which escape the eye of common observation, thus raising to the rank of gems what had been often kicked away by the hurrying foot of the traveller on the dusty high road of custom

Fifth, a meditative pathos, a union of deep and subtle thought with sensibility—a sympathy with man as man, the sympathy indeed of a contemplator rather than a fellow sufferer or co mate (Speciator, hand farticeps), but of a contemplator from whose view no difference of rank concerls the sameness of the nature, no injuries of wind or weather, of toil, or even of ignorance, wholly disguise the human face divine—The superscription and the image of the Creator still remain legible to him under the dark lines, with which guilt or calamity had cancelled or cross barred it—Here the man and the poet lose and find themselves in each other, the one as glorified, the latter as substantiated—In this mild and philosophic pathos, Wordsworth appears to me without a compeer Such as he is so he corrites

(From the Biographia Literaria, Chap. ix.)

The Inspiration of the Scriptures

'Tell me first, why it [plenary inspiration] should not be received! Why should I not believe the Scriptures throughout dictated, in word and thought, by an infallible Intelligence?'

I admit the fairness of the retort, and eagerly and carnestly do I answer For every reason that makes me prize and revere these Scriptures, -prize them, love them, revere them, beyond all other books! Why should I not? Because the Doctrine in question petri fies at once the whole body of Holy Writ with all its harmonies and symmetrical gradations,—the flexile and the rigid,—the supporting hard and the clothing soft,—the blood which is the life,—the intelligeneing nerves, and the rudely woven, but soft and springy, cellular substance, in which all are embedded and lightly bound together. This breathing organism, this glorious panharmonicon, which I had seen stand on its feet as a man, and with a man's voice given to it, the Doctrine in question turns at once into a colossal Memnon's head, a hollow passage for a voice, a voice that mocks the voices of many men, and speaks in their names, and yet is but one voice, and the same,and no man uttered it, and never in a human heart was IVhy should I not? Because the Doctrine evacuates of all sense and efficacy the sure and constant tradition, that all the several books bound up together in our precious family Bibles were composed in different and widely distant ages, under the greatest diversity of circumstances, and degrees of light and information, and yet that the composers, whether as uttering or as recording what was uttered and what was done, were all actuated by a pure and holy Spirit, one and the same Spirit working diversely, now awakening strength, and now glorifying itself in weakness, now giving power and direction to knowledge, and now taking away the sting from error !

Curse je Meroz, said the angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof-sang Deborali Was it that she called to mind any personal wrongs-rapine or insult-that she or the house of Lapidoth had received from Jabin or Siscra? No, she had dwelt under her palm tree in the depth of the mountain. But she was a mother in Israel, and with a mother's heart, and with the vehemency of a mother's and a patriot's love, she had shot the light of love from her eyes, and poured the blessings of love from her hips, on the people that had jeoparded their lives unto the death against the oppressors, and the bitterness, awakened and borne aloft by the same love, she precipitated in curses on the selfish and coward recreants who came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord, against the mighty As long as I have the unage of Deborah before my eyes, and while I throw myself back into the age, country, circumstances, of this Hebrew Bonduca in the not yet tamed chaos of the spiritual creation, -us long as I contemplate the impas sioned, high souled, heroic woman in all the prominence and individuality of will and character,-I feel as if I were among the first ferments of the great affections—the proplistic waves of the microcosmic chaos, swelling up against-and vet towards-the outspread wings of the dove that hes brooding on the troubled waters. So long all is well,-all replete with instruction and example In the fierce and inordinate I am made to know and be grateful for the clearer and purer radiance which shines on a Christian's paths, neither blunted by the preparators veil, nor crimsoned in its struggle through the all-enwrap ping mists of the world's ignorance whilst in the selfoblivion of these heroes of the Old Testament, their elevation above all low and individual interests,-above all, in the entire and rehement devotion of their total being to the service of their divine Master, I find a lesson of humility, a ground of humiliation, and a shaning, yet rousing, example of faith and fealty But let mc once be persuaded that all these heart awakening utterances of human hearts—of men of like faculties and passions with myself, mourning, rejoicing, suffering, triumphingare but as a Divina Commedia of a superhuman-O bear with mc, if I say-Ventriloquist, -that the royal Harper, to whom I have so often submitted myself as n many stringed instrument for his fire tipt fingers to traverse, while every several nerve of emotion, passion, thought, that thrids the flesh and blood of our com mon humanity, responded to the touch, -that this sveet Psalmist of Israel was himself as mere an in strument as his harp, an automaton poet, mourner, and supplicant,-all is gone,-all sympathy, at least, and all example. I listen in awe and fear, but likewise in perplexity and confusion of spirit

Taste, an Ethical Quality

Modern poetry is characterised by the poets' anxiety to be always striking. There is the same march in the Greek and Latin poets. Claudian, who had powers to have been anything—observe in him this anxious, craving vanity! Every line, nay, every word, stops, looks full in your face, and asks and begr for praise! As in a Chinese painting, there are no distances, no perspective, but all is in the foreground, and this is nothing but vanity. I am pleased to think that, when a mere stripling, I had formed the opinlon that true taste was virtue, and that bad writing was bad feeling.

The Night is at Hand. (1828)

The sweet prattle of the chimes—counsellors plending in the court of Love—then the clock, the solemn sentence of the mighty judge—long panse between each pregnant, inappellable word, too deeply weighed to be reversed in the High Justice Court of Time and Fate. A more richly solemn sound than this eleven o'clock at Antwerp I never heard—dead enough to be opaque as central gold, yet clear enough to be the mountain air

ERNEST HARTIFY COLERIDGE.

Hartley Coleridge (1796-1849), eldest son of the preceding, was born at Bristol and educated by the Rev John Dawes at Ambleside and at Vierton College, Oxford He obtained a secondclass in the final schools, was elected probationary Fellow of Oricl, but at the end of the first year was rejected on the score of intemperance (1820) spent the next two years in London writing for the London Magazine, &c, attempted school keeping at Ambleside, retired to Grasmere, and in 1831 removed to Leeds, where he wrote a series of lives of the Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire, republished (1833) as Biographia Borialis The first of two projected volumes of Poems was also published at Leeds (1833) of his life was spent at Grasmere and (1840-49) at the Nab Cottage, Rydal His last work was a Life of Massinger prefixed to an edition of Massinger and Ford His days were spent in fitful study, lonely reverse, and wanderings over the Lake Country His intemperance notwithstanding, 'Li'le Hartley' (he was very short) was admired and loved by all who knew him 'Untimely old,' he retained to the last the warmth and the simplicity of boylood His Poems (e.g. Lionard and Susan) and a dramatic fragment, Prometheus, were published with a Memoir by his brother Derwent (1800-83, first Principal of St Mark's College, Chelsen in 1851 (2 vols) Essays and Marginalia (2 vols) were also published in 1851 His poetry is never without a certain tender grace, but it is in the sonnet that he reached eminence The following is one of two famous sonnets on 'Prayer'

There is an awful quiet in the air,
And the sad carth, with moist imploring eve,
Looks wide and wakeful at the pondering sky,
I ike Patience slow subsiding to Despair but see, the blue smoke as a voiceless prayer, Sole witness of a secret sacrifice,
Unfolds its tardy wreaths, and multiplies
Its soft chameloon breathings in the rare
Capacious ether,—so it fades away,
And nought is seen beneath the pendent blue,
The undistinguishable waste of day
So have I dream d '—Oh, may the dream be true I—
That praying souls are purged from mortal hue,
And grow as pure as He to whom they pray

Sara Coleridge (1802-52), sister of the preceding, was brought up in Southey's house. In 1822 she translated Dobrizhoffer's Latin Account of the 1bipones, and in 1825 the 'Loyal Servant's' Che valuer Bayard. She married her cousin, Henry Velson Coleridge (1829). Her original works were Pretty Lessons for Good Children (1834) and Phan tasmion, a fairy-tale (1837), but her intellectual powers are best shown in her essay on Rationalism appended to her father's Aids to Reflection in 1843, and her 'Introduction' to the Biographia Literaria 1847. Her Memoirs and Letters were published by her daughter in 1873.

Charles Lamb

was born on the 10th of February 1775, in Crown Office Row, in the Temple, London, where his father was clerk and confidential servant to Samuel Salt, a wealthy bencher of the Inner Temple To John Lamb and his wife there were born in the Temple seven children, of whom three only survived their early childhood-Charles, his sister Mary, ten years older than himself, and a yet older brother, John Charles received his first schooling at a humble academy out of Fetter Lane, but at seven years of age he obtained through his father's patron a presentation to Christ's Hospital, where he remained for the next seven years His school experiences and the friendships he formed, notably that with Samuel Taylor Coleridge, three years his senior, are familiar to all readers of the Essays of Elia the age of fourteen he left school with a fair amount of scholarship and an intensified love of reading. He might have stayed and become a 'Grecian,' and so proceeded to the university But the exhibitions were given on the understanding that the holder was to take holy orders, and Lamb's unsurmountable stammer barred him from that profession

Lamb left Christ's Hospital in November 1789 At that time his brother John held a post in the South Sea House, of which Salt was a deputygovernor, and Charles was soon presented through the kind offices of this friend to a humble situation in the same company, but early in 1792 he obtained promotion in the shape of a clerkship in the ac countant's office of the India House, where he remained for more than thirty years. In this same year Salt died The occupation of his old clerk and servant was at an end, and with his legacies from his employer, Charles's salary, and whatever Mary Lamb could earn by needlework, in which she was proficient, the family of four (for the brother John was living a comfortable bachelor life elsewhere) retired to humble lodgings 1796 we find them in Little Queen Street, Holborn, and it was there that the terrible disaster occurred, destined to mould the career and char acter of Charles Lamb for the whole of his future There was a strain of inherited insanity The father, who had married in the children lite in life, was growing old and childish, the mother was an invalid, and the stress and anxiety of the many duties devolving on Mary Lamb began to tell upon her reason In an attack of mania, induced by a slight altercation with a little apprentice girl at work in the room, Mary Lamb snatched up a knife from the dinner-table, and stabbed her mother, who had interposed in the girl's behalf Charles was himself present, and wrested the knife from his sister's hand, and with him the whole direction of affairs for the sister's future remained After the inquest Mary would in the natural course have been transferred for life to a public asylum, but, by the intervention of friends, the brother's guardianship was accepted by the authorities as an alternative. To carry out this trust Charles Lamb from that moment devoted his life, sacrificing to it all other ties and ambitions, and never flagging in duty and tenderness for thirty-eight years Charles removed with his old father to Pentonville, where at successive lodgings they remained until the father's death Lamb remained subject to attacks of temporary aberration for the rest of her life, the attacks being usually foreseen, and at such seasons she was removed to some suitable asylum. The length and frequency of these periods of absence increased, until the closing years of her brother's life, when she was exiled from him during the greater part In the meantime Charles Lamb of each year had fallen in love, but renounced all hope of niarrage when the duty of tending his otherwise homeless sister had appeared to him paramount The history of his brief attachment, to which there is frequent pathetic allusion in his writings, is obscure. Anne Simmons, who appears in his earliest sonnets as Anna, and in his essays as Alice W, lived with her mother in the village of Widford in Hertfordshire—the scene of Limb's early romance of Rosamund Gray, and Lamb made her acquaintance during his frequent visits to his grandmother, Mrs Tield, housekeeper at Blakesware (immortalised in one of the loveliest of his essays as 'Blakesmoor, in Hertfordshire') Arne, who afterwards married Mr Bartram, a London silversmith, is refeired to under that name in the essay 'Dream-Children'

Lamb's earliest poems, written in 1795, were prompted by this deep attachment. Two sonnets on this theme, with two others on different topics, were included in S T Coleridge's earliest volume of poems, issued at Bristol in 1796 Next year a second edition of Coleridge's poems appeared, 'to which are now added poems by Charles Lamb and Charles Lloyd,' Lloyd being a young man of kindred poetic tastes, whose acquaintance Lamb Here, as before, had made through Coleridge the poetic influence under which Lamb wrote was the same that had so strangely moved Coleridge while still at Christ's Hospital-the graceful and pensive sonnets of W L Bowles In the following year Lamb and Lloyd made a second venture in a slight volume of their own (Blank Verse, by Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb, 1798), and here for the first time Lamb's individuality made itself felt in the touching and now famous verses on the 'Old Familiar Faces'-like so many of his memorable utterances in prose and verse, full of autobiographical allusion, and yet gaining rather than losing in permanence of charm through the circumstance It was, however, in prose, not in verse, that he was to find his true strength In the same year as Blank Verse he published his little prose romance, The Tale of Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret, and four years later his John Woodwil—the fruit of that study of the drimatic poetry of the Elizabethan period, in the revived study of which he was to bear so large a part. Lamb had little or no dramatic faculty. The play was crude and valueless as a drama, but with detached passages reflecting much of the music and quaintness of Fletcher and Jonson

Meantime Lamb and his sister were wandering from lodging to lodging, too often forced to leave through the rumour of Mary Lamb's malady which followed them wherever they went. They had have at more than one house in Pentonville—they were in Southampton Buildings in 1800 and 1801—and then removed to Lamb's old familiar neighbourhood, where they continued for sixteen years. The early years of their residence in the Temple were among the hardest and saddest of their lives They were very poor, Charles's experiments in literature had as yet brought him neither money nor reputation, and the gradual accession of new friends that might have brightened their path had the drawback of bringing Charles face to face with social temptations which he could not resist very moderate indulgence in wine or spirits seems to have speedily affected him, and his shyness and his impediment of speech made him engerly resort to what for the moment made him forget 'We are very poor,' writes Mary Lamb in 1804, and again in 1805, 'It has been sad and heavy times with us lately' In Lamb's anyety to raise a few pounds, rather than from any confidence in his dramatic faculty, he began to write a farce, which the proprietors of Drury Lane accepted, and produced in December 1806

It was the now famous farce Mr H-famous, however, not for its success, but for its failure. His love for things dramatic soon found a more profitable outlet in a commission from William Godwin to contribute to his 'Juvenile Library,' then in course of publication. For this series Charles and Mary wrote in 1807 their wellknown Tales from Shakespeare - Viry Limb maling the version of the comedies, Charles that This was Lamb's first success of the tragedies It brought him sixty guineas, and, what was more valuable, hope for the future, and the increased confidence and recognition of his growing circle As one consequence of the success, the brother and sister composed jointly two other children's books-Mis Leicester's School (1807) and the Poetry for Children (1809) Charles also told for children the story of the Ody ssey, under the title of The Adventures of Uly ises Another more important consequence was a commission from the Longmans to edit a volume of selections from the Elizabethan dramatists. The volume at once exhibited Lamb, to those who had eves to see, as one of the most profound, subtle, and original of Lnglish poetical critics Three years later 1 conviction of the same fact would be deepened in those who knew that the unsigned articles in Leigh Hunts Reflictor, on Hogarth and the trayedies of Shakespeare, were from the same hand, and that a prose writer of new and unique quality was showing above the dull level of the conventional essignst.

In 1817 Lamb and his sister left the Temple for rooms in Great Russell Street, Covent Garden Next year an enterprising young publisher induced him to collect his scattered verse and prose in two next volumes, as the Works of Charles Lamb, and this publication naturally paved the way for his being invited to join the staff_of the London Magazine, then newly started Lamb was required to contribute light prose essays, and was wisely allowed a free hand. His first essay appeared in August 1820, 'Recollections of the old South Sea House,' the public office in which his first small salary was earned, and where his elder brother had remained a high placed and prosperous clerk. Lamb signed his first paper Elia, borrowing for a joke the name of a foreigner who had been fellow clerk with him in the office. The signature was continued through Lamb's successive contributions to the magazine, and as he placed it on the title page (without his own) of the first collected edition of the essays in 1823, it became indissolubly connected with the work The series came to an end as far as the London Magazine was concerned, in 1825 The Last Essays of Llia s ere collected in a second volume in 1833.

In August 1823 Charles and Mary quitted their rooms over the brazier's in Russell Street, and made their first experiment as householders in a courge in Colebroole Row, Islington, with the New River (into which George Dyer walked in broad daylight) flowing within a few feet of their front door. Moreover, they were now on the eve of making a pleasant addition to their liousehold in the form of a young friend, the orphan daughter of an Italian teacher of languages at Cambridge. Charles and Mary Lamb virtually adopted Emma Isola, and she was treated as a member of their family until her marriage with Edward Moxon the publisher, in 1833

Early in 1825 Lamb, who had been for some time failing in health, was allowed to resign his post in the India House, the directors liberally granting him as pension two thirds of his then Having now no tie to any particular neighbourhood, the brother and sister were free to They took lodgings-and subsequently a house-at Enfield, but Mary Lamb's health becoming gradually worse and requiring constant supervision, they parted with their furniture and gave up housekeeping. They finally removed to the neighbouring village of Edmonton, where, in a small cottage hard by the church, they spent their last year together. It was a melancholy Limb's own health was suffering had lost their young friend Emma Isola. sence of settled occupation had not brought Lamb all the comfort he had looked for the separation from his London friends, and now the almost continuous mental alienation of his sister, left him companionless, and with the death of Coleridge in the summer of 1834 the chief attractions of his life were gone. In December of the same year, while taking one day his usual walk on the London Road, he stumbled and fell slightly injuring his face. The wound was in itself trifling, but ervsipelas ensued, under which he rapidly sank, and he passed quietly away, without pain, on the 29th of December He was buried in Edmonton churchyard His sister survived him nearly thirteen years, and was buried by his side in May 1847

Lamb's place in literature is unique and unchallengeable. As a personality he is more intimately known to us than any other figure in literature. unless it be Samuel Johnson He is familiar to us? through his works, which throughout are composed in the form of personal confidences, through his many friends who have loved to make known his every mood and trait, and through his letters, the most fascinating body of correspondence in our language. It is a dangerous thing to say, but it may be doubted whether, outside a necessarily limited circle, his works are read so much for their own sakes as for the light they throw upon the character of their author. It is the harmonious concord of dissonances in Lamb that is the secret of his attraction The profound and imaginative character of his criticism, which at its best is uncrring, and with it the reckless humour of the Bohemian and the farçeur, the presence of one lamentable weakness serving to throw into stronger relief the patient strength of his life struggle, his loyalty and generosity to his friends, even when they abused it most, and all this flowing from one of the most beautiful acts of devotion in the records of self sacrifice—the wild fun of Trinculo and Stephano, alternating with the tenderness of Miranda and Ferdinand, or the profound philosophic musings of Prospero—and all these, like Ariel, now 'flaming distinctly,' now 'meeting and joining'—it is this wondrous blending of opposites that has made Lamb, save to the 'sourcomplexioned' and matter-of-fact, one of the most dearly loved among English men of letters, and with every sign that this love is one which no changes of taste are likely to diminish

To Hester

When maidens such as Hester die, Their place ye may not well supply, Though ye among a thousand try, With van endeavour

A month or more both she been dead, Yet cannot I by force be led To think upon the worm, bed, And her together

A spring, motion in her gait,
A rising step, did indicate
Of pride and joy no common rate,
That flush'd her spirit

I know not by what name beside
I shall it call —if 'twas not pride,
It was a joy to that alhed,
She did inherit

Her parents held the Quaker rule, Which doth the human feeling cool, But she was train'd in Nature's school, Nature had blest her

A waking eye, a prying mind,
A heart that stirs, is hard to bind,
A hawk's keen sight ye cannot blind,
Ye could not Hester

My sprightly neighbour, gone before To that unknown and silent shore, Shall we not meet, as heretofore, Some summer morning,

When from thy cheerful eves a ray Hath struck a bliss upon the day, A bliss that would not go away,

A sweet forewarning?

The Old Familiar Faces.

I have had playmates, I have had companions, In my days of childhood, in my joyful school days.—All, all are gone, the old familiar faces

I have been laughing, I have been carousing, Drinking late, sitting late, with my bosom cromes— All, all are gone, the old familiar faces

I loved a love once, furest among women Closed are her doors on me I must not see her— All, all are gone, the old familiar face

I have a friend, a kinder friend has no man I ike an ingrate, I left my friend abruptly Left him, to inuse on the old familiar faces Ghost like I paced round the hunts of my childhood Larth seemed a desert I was bound to traverse, Seeking to find the old familiar faces

Friend of my bosom, thou more than a brother, Why wert not thou born in my father's dwelling? So might we talk of the old familiar faces—

How some they have died, and some they have left me, And some are taken from me, all are departed, All, all are gone, the old familiar faces

Sonnet on 'Innocence'

We were two pretty babes, the youngest she,
The youngest, and the loveliest far, I ween,
And INNOCENCE her name The time has been,
We two did love each other's company,
Time was, we two had wept to have been apart.
But when by show of seeming good beguil'd,
I left the garb and manners of a child,
And my first love for man's society,
Defiling with the world my virgin heart—
My loved companion dropped a tear, and fled,
And hid in deepest shades her awful head
Beloved, who shall tell me where thou art—
In what delicious Eden to be found—
That I may seek thee the wide world around?

Lines in my own Album

Fresh elad from heaven in robes of white, A young probationer of light, Thou wert, my soul, an Album bright

A spotless leaf, but thought and care, And friend and foe, in foul or fair, Have 'written strange defeatures' there,

And I me with heaviest hand of all, Like that herec writing on the wall, Hath stamp d sad dates, he can't recall,

And error, gilding worst designs—
I she speckled snake that strays and shines—
Betrays his path by crooked lines,

And vice both left his ngly blot, And good resolves, a moment hot, Fairly began—but finish'd not,

And fruitless, late remorse doth trace— Like Hebren lore, a backward pace— Her arrecoverable race

Disjointed numbers, sense unknit, Huge reams of folly, shreds of wit, Compose the mingled mass of it

My scalded eves no longer brook Upon this ink blurr'd thing to look— Go, shut the leaves, and class the book

On an Infant Dying as soon as Born.

I saw where in the shroud did lurk
A curious frame of Nature's work
A flow'ret crushed in the luid,
A nameless piece of Babyhood,
Was in her cradle coffin lying,
Extinct with scarce the sense of dying
So soon to exchange the imprisoning womb
For darker closets of the tomb!
She did but ope an eve, and put A clear beam forth, then scrught up shut

Dream Children a Reverie

Children love to listen to stories about their elders, when they were children, to stretch their imagination to the conception of a traditionary great uncle, or grandame, whom they never saw. It was in this spirit that my little ones crept about me the other evening to hear about their great-grandmother Field, who lived in a great bouse in Norfolk (a hundred times bigger than that in which they and papa lived) which had been the scene—so at least it was generally believed in that part of the country—of the tragic incidents which they had lately become familiar with from the hallad of the 'Children in the Wood' Certain it is that the whole story of the children and their cruel uncle was to be seen fairly carved out in wood upon the chimney piece of the great hall, the whole story down to the Robin Redbreasts, till a foolish rich person pulled it down to set up a marble one of modern invention in its stead, with no story upon Here Alice put out one of her dear mother's looks, too tender to be called upbraiding. Then I went on to say, how religious and how good their great grandmother Field was, how beloved and respected by everylody, though she was not indeed the mistress of this great house, but had only the charge of it (and yet in some respects she might be said to be the mistress of it too) committed to her by the owner, who preferred living in a newer and more fashionable mansion which he had purchased somewhere in the adjoining county, but still she lived in it in a manner as if it had been her own, and kept up the dignity of the great house in a sort while she lived, which afterwards came to decay, and was nearly pulled down, and all its old ornaments stripped and carned away to the owner's other house, where they were set up, and looked as awkward as if some one were to carry away the old tombs they had seen lately at the Abbey, and stick them up in Lady C's tawdry gilt drawing room. Here John smiled, as much as to say, 'That would be foolish indeed' And then I told how, when she came to die, her funeral was attended by a concourse of all the poor, and some of the gentry too, of the neighbourhood for many miles round, to show their respect for her memory, because she had been such a good and religious woman, so good indeed that she knew all the Psaltery by heart-av, and a great part of the Testament besides. Here little Alice spread Then I told what a tall, upright, graceful person their great grandmother Field once was, and how in her youth she was esteemed the best dancerhere Alice's little right foot played an involuntary move ment, till, upon my looking grave, it desisted-the best dancer, I was saying, in the county, till a cruel disease, called a cancer, came, and bowed her down with pain, but it could never bend her good spirits, or make them stoop, but they were still upright, because she was so good and religious Theu I told how she was used to sleep by herself in a lone chamber of the great lone house and how she believed that an apparition of two infants was to be seen at midnight gliding up and down the great staircase near where she slept, but she said 'those innocents would do her no harm,' and how frightened I used to be, though in those days I had my maid to sleep with me, because I was never half so good or religious as she-and yet I never saw the infants. Here John expanded all his eyebrows and tried to look courageous Then I told how good she was to all her grand children, having us to the great house in the holidays, where I in particular used to spend many hours by myself in gazing upon the old busts of the Twelve Cresars, that had been Emperors of Kome, till the old marble heads would seem to live again, or I to be turned into marble with them, how I never could be tired with roaming about that huge mansion, with its vast empty rooms, with their worn out hangings, flutter ing tapestry, and carved oaken panels, with the gilding almost rubbed out-sometimes in the spacious old fashioned gardens, which I had almost to myself, nnless when now and then a solitary gardening man would cross me-and how the nectarines and peaches hung upon the walls, without my ever offering to pluck them, because they were forbidden fruit, unless now and then, -and because I had more pleasure in strolling about among the old melancholy looking yew trees, or the firs, and picking up the red berries, and the fir apples, which were good for nothing but to look at-or in lying about upon the fresh grass, with all the fine garden smells around me-or bashing in the orangery, till I could almost funcy myself ripening too along with the oranges and the limes in that grateful warmth-or in watching the dace that durted to and fro in the fish pond, at the bottom of the garden, with here and there a great sulky pike hanging midway down the water in silent state, as if it mocked at their impertment friskings,-I had more pleasure in these busy idle diversions than in all the sweet flavours of peaches, nectarines, oranges, and such like common buts of children Here John slyly de posited back upon the plate a bunch of grapes, which, not unobserved by Alice, he had meditated dividing with her, and both seemed willing to relinquish them for the present as irrelevant. Then, in somewhat a more heightened tone, I told how, though their great grand mother Field loved will her grand eluldren, yet in an especial manner she might be said to love their uncle. John L-, because he was so handsome and spirited a youth, and a king to the rest of us, and, instead of moping about in solitary corners, like some of us, he would mount the most mettlesome horse he could get, when but an imp no bigger than themselves, and make it carry him half over the county in a morning and join the hunters when there were any out—and yet he loved the old great house and gardens too, but had too much spirit to be always pent up within their boundaries-and how their uncle grew up to man's estate as brave as he was handsome, to the admiration of everybody, but of their great grandmother Field most especially, and how he used to carry me upon his back when I was a lame footed boy-for he was a good bit older than me-many a mile when I could not walk for prin, -- and how in after life he became lame footed too, and I did not always (I fear) make allownness enough for hun when he was impatient and in pain, nor remember sufficiently how considerate he had been to me when I was lame footed, and how when he died, though he had not been dead an hour, it seemed as if he had died a great while ago, such a distance there is betweet life and death, and how I bore his death as I thought pretty well at first, but afterwards it haunted and haunted me, and though I did not ery or take it to heart as some do, and as I think he would have done if I had died, yet I missed him all day long, and knew not till then how much I had loved him I missed his kindness, and I missed his crossness, and wished him to be alive again, to be quarrelling with him (for we quarrelled sometimes), rather than not have him again, and was as uneasy with out him as he their poor uncle must have been when the doctor took off his limb Here the children fell a erving, and asked if their little mourning which they had on was not for uncle John, and they looked up, and prived me not to go on about their unele, but to tell them some stories about their pretty dead mother I told how for seven long years, in hope sometimes, some times in despair, yet persisting ever, I courted the fair Alice W-n, and, as much as children could understand, I explained to them what covness, and difficulty, and denial meant in mindens - when suddenly, turning to Alice, the soul of the first Alice looked out at her eves with such a reality of representment that I became in doubt which of them stood there before me, or whose that bright hair was, and while I stood gazing, both the children gradually grew fainter to my view, receding, and still receding till nothing it last but two mournful features were seen in the uttermost distance, which without speech, strangely impressed upon me the effects of speech 'We are not of Alice, nor of thee, nor nic we eluldren at all The children of Alice call Bartrain father We are nothing, less than nothing, and dreams We are only what might have been, and must wait upon the tedious shores of Lethe millions of nges before we have existence, and a name '--- and immediately awak ing, I found myself quietly seated in my bachelor arm ehair, where I had fallen asleep, with the faithful Bridget unchanged by my side-but John L. (or James Eha) was gone for ever (From Essays of Elia.)

'Mackery End.'

Bridget Llin has been my housekeeper for many a long year I have obligations to Bridget, extending beyond the period of memory. We house together, old bachelor and maid, in, a sort of double singleness with such tolerable comfort, upon the whole, that I, for one, find in myself no sort of disposition to go out upon the mountains, with the rash king's offspring, to bewail my We agree pretty well in our tastes and habits eelibaev -yet so as 'with a difference' We are generally in harmony, with occasional hickerings-as it should be among near relations. Our sympathies are rather under stood than expressed, and once, upon my dissembling a tone in my voice more kind than ordinary, my cousin burst into tears, and complained that I was altered are both great readers in different directions ain hanging over (for the thousandth time) some passage in old Burton, or one of his strange contemporaries, she is abstracted in some modern tale, or indventure, whereof our common reading table is daily fed with assiduously fresh supplies Narrative teases me I have little con eern in the progress of events She must have a storywell, ill, or indifferently told-so there be life stirring in it, and plenty of good or evil accidents. The fluctuations of fortune in fiction-and almost in real life-have eersed to interest, or operate but dully upon me Out of the way humours and opinions-heads with some diverting twist in them—the oddities of authorship please nic My consin has a native disrelish of anything that sounds odd or bizarre. Nothing goes down with her that is quaint, irregular, or out of the road of common She 'holds Nature more elever' I can sympathy pardon her blindness to the beautiful obliquities of the Religio Medici, but she must apologise to me for certain disrespectful insinuations, which she has been pleased to throw out latterly, touching the intellectuals of a dear favourite of mine, of the last century but one-the thrice noble, chaste, and virtuous, but again somewhat fantas tical and original brain'd, generous Margaret Newcastle

It has been the lot of my cousin, oftener perhaps than I could have wished, to have had for her associates and mine free thinkers—leaders, and disciples, of novel philosophies and systems, but she neither wrangles with nor accepts their opinions. That which was good and venerable to her when a child, returns its authority over her mind still. She never juggles or plays tricks with her understanding.

We are both of us inclined to be a little too positive, and I have observed the result of our disputes to be almost uniformly this—that in matters of fact, dates, and circumstances, it turns out that I was in the right, and my cousin in the wrong. But where we have differed upon moral points—upon something proper to be done or let alone—whatever heat of opposition or steadiness of conviction I set out with, I am sure always in the long run to be brought over to her way of thinking

I must touch upon the foibles of my kinswoman with a gentle hand, for Bridget does not like to be told of her faults. She hath an awkward trick (to say no worse of it) of reading in company at which times she will ansverges or no to a question without fully understanding its purport—which is provoking, and derogatory in the highest degree to the dignity of the putter of the said question. Her presence of mind is equal to the most pressing trials of life, but will sometimes desert her upon trifling occasions. When the purpose requires it, and is a thing of moment, she can speak to it greatly, but in matters which are not stuff of the conscience, she hath been known sometimes to let ship a word less seasonably.

Her education in youth was not much attended to, and she happily missed all that train of female garmiture which passeth by the name of accomplishments. She was tumbled early, by accident or design, into a spacious closet of good old English reading, without much selection or prohibition, and browsed at will upon that fair and wholesome pasturage. Had I twenty girls, they should be brought up exactly in this fashion. I know not whether their chance in wedlock might not be diminished by it, but I can answer for it that it makes (if the worst come to the worst) most meomparable old maids.

In a season of distress she is the truest comforter, but in the teasing accidents and minor perplexities, which do not call out the will to meet them, she sometimes maketh inatters worse by an excess of participation. If she does not always divide your trouble, upon the pleasanter occasions of life she is sure always to treble your satisfaction. She is excellent to be at a play with, or upon a visit, but best when she goes a journey with you

We made an exeursion together a few summers since, into Hertfordshire, to beat up the quarters of some of our less known relations in that fine eorn country

The oldest thing I remember is Mackery End, or Mackarel End, as it is spelt, perhaps more properly, in some old maps of Hertfordshire, a farm house, delight fully situated within a gentle walk from Wheathampstead I can just remember having been there, on a visit to n great aunt, when I was a child, under the care of Bridget, who, as I have said, is older than myself by some ten years I wish that I could throw into a heap the remainder of our joint existences, that we might share them in equal division. But that is impossible The house was at that time in the occupation of a substantial yeoman, who had married my grandmother's sister. His name was Gladman. My grandmother was a bruton, married to a Field. The Gladmans and the Protons are still flourishing in that part of the county, but the Fields are almost extinct. More than forty vers had elapsed since the visit I speak of and, for the greater portion of that period, we had lost sight of the other two branches also. Who or what sort of persons inherited Mackery End—kindred or strange folk—we were afraid almost to conjecture, but determined some day to explore

By somewhat a circuitous route, taking the noble park at Luton in our way from Saint Albans, we arrived at the spot of our anxious curiosity about noon. The sight of the old farm house, though every trace of it was effaced from my recollection, affected me with a pleasure which I had not experienced for many a year. For though I had forgotten it, no had never forgotten being there together, and we had been talking about Mackery End all our lives, till memory on my part became mocked with a phantom of itself, and I thought I knew the aspect of a place, which, when present, O how unlike it was to that which I had conjured up so many times instead of it!

Still, the air breathed balmily about it, the season was in the 'heart of June,' and I could say with the poet,

'But thou, that didst appear so fair
To fond imagination,
Dost rival in the light of day
Her delicate creation!'

Bridget's was more a waking bliss than mine, for she easily remembered her old acquaintance again—some altered features, of course, a little grudged at. At first, indeed, she was ready to disbelieve for joy, but the scene soon reconfirmed itself in her affections, and she traversed every outpost of the old mansion, to the wood house, the orehard, the place where the pigeon house had stood (house and birds were alike flown), with a breathless impatience of recognition, which was more pardonable perhaps than decorous at the age of fifty odd. But Bridget in some things is behind her years

The only thing left was to get into the house-and that was a difficulty which to me singly would have been insurmountable, for I am terribly shy in making myself known to strangers and out of date kinsfolk Love, stronger than scruple, winged my cousin in without mc, but she soon returned with a creature that might have sat to a sculptor for the image of Welcome. It was the youngest of the Gladmans, who, by marriage with a Bruton, had become mistress of the old mansion comely brood are the Brutons Six of them, females, were noted as the handsomest young women in the But this adopted Bruton, in my mind, was better than they all-more comely She was born too late to have remembered me. She just recollected in early life to have had her cousin Bridget once pointed out to her, elimbing a stile. But the name of kindred, and of consinship, was enough. Those slender ties, that prove slight as gossamer in the rending atmosphere of a metropolis, bind faster, as we found it, in hearty, homely, loving Hertfordshire In five minutes we were as thoroughly requainted as if we had been born and bred up together, were familiar, even to the calling each other hy our Christian names. So Christians should call one another To have seen Bridget, and her-it was like the meeting of the two scriptural cousins !* There was a grace and dignity, an amplitude of form and stature, answering to her mind, in this farmer's wife, which would have shined in a palace—or so we thought We were made welcome by husband and wife equally-we, and our friend that was with us -I had almost forgotten him-but B F will not so soon forget that meeting, if peradventure he shall read this on the far-distant shores where the Langaroo haunts. The fatted calf was made ready, or rather was already so, as if in anticipation of our coming, and, after an appropriate glass of native wine, never let me forget with what lionest pride this hospitable cousin made us proceed to Whenthampstead, to introduce us (as some new found rarity) to her mother and sister Gladinans, who did indeed know something more of us, at a time when she almost knew nothing -With what corresponding kind ness we were received by them also-how Bridget's memory, evalted by the occasion, warmed into a thou sand half obliterated recollections of things and persons, to my utter astonishment and her own, and to the astoundment of B F, who sat by, almost the only thing that was not a cousin there, -old effaced images of more than half forgotten names and circumstances still erowd ing back upon her, as words written in lemon come out upon exposure to a friendly warmth-when I forget all this, then may my country cousins forget me, and Bridget no more reinember that in the days of weakling infancy I was her tender charge—as I have been her care in foolish manhood since-in those pretty pastoral walks, long ago, about Mackery End, in Hertfordshire

Lear

So to see Lear acted,-to see an old man tottering about the stage with a walking stick, turned out of doors by his daughters in a rainy night, has nothing in it but what is painful and disgusting. We want to take him into shelter and relieve him. That is all the feeling which the acting of Lear ever produced in me Lear of Shakspeare cannot be acted The contemptible machinery by which they mimie the storm which he goes out in, is not more inadequate to represent the horrors of the real elements than any actor can be to represent Lear they might more easily propose to per sonate the Satan of Milton upon a stage, or one of Michael Angelo's terrible figures. The greatness of Lear is not in corporal dimension, but in intellectual the explosions of his passion are terrible as a volcano they are storms turning up and disclosing to the bottom that sea, his mind, with all its vast riches mind which is laid hare. This case of flesh and blood sceins too insignificant to be thought on, even as lie lumself neglects it. On the stage we see nothing but corporal infirmities and weakness, the impotence of rage, while we read it, we see not Lear, but we are Lear,we are in his mind, we are sustained by a grandeur which baffles the malice of daughters and storms, in the aberrations of his reason we discover a mighty irregular power of reasoning, immethodised from the ordinary purposes of life, but exerting its powers, as the wind blows where it listeth, at will upon the corruptions and abuses of mankind What have looks or tones to do with that sublime identification of his age with that of the hear ens themselves, when, in his reproaches to them for conniving at the injustice of his children, he reminds them that 'they themselves are old'? What gesture shall we appropriate to this? What has the voice or the eye to do with such things? But the play is beyond all art, as the tamperings with it show it is too hard and stony, it must have love scenes, and a happy ending It is not enough that Cordelia is a danghter, she must slune as a lover too Tate has put his hook in the nostrils of this Leviathan for Garrick and his followers, the showmen of the scene, to draw the mighty beast about more easily. A happy ending '—as if the living martyrdom that Lear had gone through, the flaying of his feelings alive, did not make a fair dismissal from the stage of life the only decorous thing for him. If he is to live and be happy after, if he could sustain this world's burden after, why all this pudder and preparation,—why torment us with all this unnecessary sympathy? As if the children pleasure of getting his gilt robes and sceptre again could tempt him to act over again his misused station,—as if at his years, and with his experience, any thing was left but to die '

Our cluef nuthorities for Lamb are his own writings, and the Life and Letters and Final Memorials, by Mr Justice Talfourd Later editions of these works have appeared enlarged by Percy Fitzgerald and W C Hazlitt. There is a quite separate Memoir of Lamb, of considerable interest, by B W Procter (Barry Cornwall'). Another Memoir, and a complete edition of Lambs works and correspondence by the writer of the present article, were published by Messrs Macmillan (6 vols. 1883-88). A new and enlarged edition of Lambs letters by the same editor was in pre paration in 1903. Lambs Essays are the best commentary on his life, his father is the Lovel of the essay on the 'Old Benchers of the Middle Temple, see also E. V. Lucass Lamb and the I loyds (1898). The present article has been revised and reprinted from that originally written for Chambers's Encyclope tha (new edition, vol. vi, 1890).

ALFRED AINGER.

William Hazlitt,

born at Maidstone on 10th April 1778, came of a family of Hazlitts who had settled in County Antrim at the Revolution Shortly after Hazlitt's birth his father, who was a Unitarian minister, removed to Bandon near Cork, and in 1783 emigrated to America, but he returned with his family a few years later and settled in 1787 at Wem in Shiopshire At his father's desire Hazlitt studied in 1793 at the Unitarian College at Hackney, but even then his tastes by rather in philosophy and politics. It was not till his meeting with Coleridge in 1798, which he has himself described in the essay 'My First Acquaintance with Poets,' that his interest in literature was fully awakened, though in this matter he has also recorded his debt to the friendship of Joseph Fawcett (see his essay 'On Criticism') Following the example of his brother John, he first chose for himself the profession of artist, and in October 1802 went to Paris, where for four months he worked at the Louvre (see his essay 'On the Pleasure of Painting') On his return he set up as a portrait-painter, and numbered Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Lumb among his sitters, but he could never satisfy himself, though judges such as Northcote believed in His first publication, In Essay on the his ability Principles of Human Action, appeared in 1805, and was followed in 1806 by Free Thoughts on Public Affairs, or Advice to a Patriot, in 1807 by An Abridgment of the Light of Nature Pursued by A Tucker, and a Reply to the Essay on Population by the Rev T R Mallhus, in 1808 by The Eloquence of the Brilish Senate (a selection with biographical and critical notes), and in 1810 by A New and Improved Grammar of the English Tongue, for the Use of Schools He was engaged chiefly to the Lordon and New Monthly, he brought out another collection of his essays in 1821, en titled Table Talk, or Original Lissays, a second volume with the same title following in 1822. In 1823 appeared his Characteristics, in the Manner of La Rock foucauld's Maxims, while to 1824 belong his Sketches of the Principal Picture Galleries in England, his Scleet British Poets (suppressed, and published in 1825 under the title Select Poets of Great Britain), and his article on the 'Fine Arts' in the Encyclopadia Britannica Before this Hazhtt had won for himself an ugly notoriety by his Liber Amoris, or the New Pygmalion (1823), recording his infituation for a girl named Sarah Walker, the daughter of his landlady, and 'the only woman that ever made me think she loved me' His marriage had proved unhappy, and in June 1822 he was divorced at Edinburgh, but he was soon after distillusioned of the heroine of the Tiber Amoria In 1824 he married Mrs Bridg water, a widow with some money This marriage was likewise unhappy, he travelled for some months with his wife in France, Switzerland, and Italy but in 1825 he returned to London alone, and his wife refused to rejoin him While on this tour he contributed to the Morning Chronicle a series of letters, collected in 1826 under the title Notes of a Journey in France and Italy At the same time there appeared in the  $\Lambda c \omega$ Monthly the series of articles which went to form the Spirit of the Azi, or Contemporary Portraits (1825) The last collection of miscellaneous ess is which he limself edited, The Plain Speaker, Opinions on Lools, Men, and Things (2 vols), was published in 1826 I rom this time onwards he devoted lumself chiefly to the Life of Napoleon Buonaparte Recognising the occusional nature of his earlier work, he now hoped to found his fime on a monumental biography of his life's hero, and he accordingly squandered the energies of his closing verrs on a work which could not but arouse ammosity and for which he was hardly suited either by charicter or training The first and second volumes appeared in 1828, and the third and fourth in 1830. The literary merits of the bool are now, is at its appearance, too often ignored in hostility to its motive. Unfortunately Hight was embarrassed financially by the fulure of his publisher He had to resort again to magazine articles, he brought out the Conversa tions of James Northcole, Esq., RA (1830), 1 collection of articles contributed in 1826-27 under the title 'Boswell Redninus,' to the New Monthly, and he collaborated with Northcote on the Life of Fitian (1830). But in this struggle he had no longer health on his side. He died at I ondon on 1eth September 1830. Three other collections of his essays were published posthumously by his son-Itterary Remains (2 vols 1836), Sketches and Lesays (1839), and Winterslov Lesays and Claraters verittin there (1850) Harlit's political views prejudiced his reputation as a critic and essayist to a wider public than that of the Quarterly and Blackwood he was best known as a wild Republic in Even his idiosyncrisies tended to make him unpopular Unhappy in his married life, he was unhappy also in his friendships, for he guarrelled unaccountably with all his associates—even with Lamb, though he was afterwards reconciled. Tactless, but of downright honests, though brilliant in conversation yet devoid of social instinct, he seemed to his friends to live in dread of hearing some remark with which The sumulating acuteness he could not agree and fine enthusiasm of his lectures did not conceal the fact that there was little sympathy between him and his audience It his worth is better I nown now than it was in his own day, it is because his writings have lived down the personal prejudice which he too readily aroused

With Coloridge and Lamb, Hazlitt marks the close of the short interregnum in criticism when the classical code of the eighteenth century had been replaced by the more whom of the Edinburgh or Quarterly teviewer. Like Coleridge, he believed that the first requisite of a critic is intelligent sympathy, and that his duty is not so much to report on a work is to interpret it Let lie can hardly be claimed as a member of the romanue school, for, though true to their principles, he had not their limitations, he laughed away their tenet that Pope was not a poet, and he would not be blinded to the nicrits of I rench literature by the new German cult and the erusade against the classical In certain respects he preserves the eighteenth eentury attitude, as in his indifference to the Middle Ages and his appreciation of the clegant in literature, while he had not the enthusiasm of the new school for their own work Personal and political considerations tended to warp his judgment on his contemporaries Though cloquent in his praise of Scott, lie discovers an objectionable political motive in the 'Scotch novels, his dishke of Byron is based on the 'noble author's' peerage, Coleradge, to whom he owed so much, he came to despise for changing his political views, even his whole hearted appre cirtions of Wordsworth are dashed with unfriendly references to the poet's foibles. But these prejudices vere vented merely on the living political bias, for instance, could dull his enthusiasm for Burke He himself confesses that his enticism of the living is in a different category from his appreciations of the older authors. 'I have more confidence in the dead than the hving,' he says, 'contemporary writers may generally be divided into two classes, one's friends and one's foes' But it may be claimed for him that his prejudices, unlike those of the romanticists, were not literary He was one of the first to recognise the impos sibility of reconciling different tastes agreement between French and English taste, he points out, is bound to remain till the French become English or the English French, and he adds, with special reference to Slinkespeare and Racine, that when we see nothing but grossness and barbarism or insipidity and verbiage in a writer that is the god of a nation's idolatry, it is we and not they who want true taste and feeling. Hazlitt's appreciations are more free from the distinguishing marks of a particular school than those of any of the great English critics before him.

Hazlitt characterised his own work when he said that 'a genuine criticism should reflect the colours, the light and shade, the soul and body of a work? Whether he deals with painting or with literature, he pass little attention to matters of form or tech nique and he dways ignores the eircumstances under which the works were produced 'If,' he says, 'a man leaves behind him in work which is a model of its kind we have no right to ask whether he could do mything else, or how he did it, or how long he was about it. Uninterested in the development and interaction of liter itures, he is indifferent even to the growth of the art of an individual author He may tell us that in the Fempest Shakespeare has shown all the variety of his powers, and that I orus Labour's I ost is the play with which he would most readily part, but he never limits that the one was written at the end of Shakespeares career and the other at the beginning difference to such matters explains his maccuracy in points of firet. I ew of his many quotations are given correctly, his references are vague, and he knew nothing of the worries of accurate chron-What alone interests him is the complete work in itself. He lind not, and expressly diselamed, a wide knowledge of literature, and latterly he would rather read the same book for the twentieth time than read a new one. His favourite authors, and Shakespeare in particular, he knew so well that he could hardly write without alluding to them, or quoting from them, or employing their phraseology And this intense knowledge makes him as guiltless of a second hand is of an off hand opinion, though he is occasionally under some debt to the conversation of his friends from whom he horrows most is himself, for he indulges largely in the questionable liabit of repeating, often in the same words, what he has said elsewhere But this only points to that 'pertinacity of opinion' on which he prided himself, in literature as in politics. In no case would be revise his judgments, he would only repeat them and emphasise them

He has spoken of his early difficulties in writing, but latterly he could say that he had merely to 'unfold the book and volume of the brain' and transcribe the characters he saw there as mechanically as any one might copy the letters in a sampler It was fitting that a critic who was indifferent, to technique should himself have no ambitions to be known by his style, and should expressly avoid formal method. What he desired above all was 'life, and spirit, and truth,' and whether he writes on Cavanagh the Fives Player, or the fight of

That years in the history of the person represented which perhaps more than anything clse distinguishes the dramatic productions of Shake-speare from all others is this wonderful truth and individuality of conception Each of his characters is as much itself, and as absolutely independent of the rest, as well as of the author, as if they were living persons, not fictions of the mind poet may be said, for the time, to identify himself with the character he wishes to represent, and to pass from one to mother, like the same soul successively animating different bodies. By an art lil e that of the ventraloquist, he throws his imagination out of himself, and makes every word appear to proceed from the mouth of the person in ho c name it is given. His plays alone are properly expressions of the passions, not descriptions of them His characters are real beings of flesh and blood, they speak like men, not like authors. One might suppose that he had stood by at the time, and overheard what As in our dreams we hold conversations with ourselves, make remarks, or communicate intelligence, and have no idea of the answer which we shall receive, and which we ourselves make, till we hear it—so the dialogues in Shakespeare are earned on without any consciousness of what is to follow, without any appearance of preparation or premeditation The gusts of passion come and go like sounds of music borne on the wind Nothing is made out by formal inference and analogy, by clumax and antithesis all comes, or seems to come, Lach object and eircumstance inimediately from nature exists in his mind, as it would have existed in reality, each several train of thought and feeling goes on of itself, without confusion or effort. In the world of his imagination, everything has a life, a place, and being of its own !

Changer's characters are sufficiently distinct from one another, but they are too little varied in themselves, too much like identical propositions. They are consistent, but uniform, we get no new idea of them from first to last, they are not placed in different lights, nor are their subordinate traits brought out in new situations, they are like portruts or physiognomical studies, with the distinguishing features marked with inconceivable truth and precision, but that preserve the same unaltered air and attitude Shake-peare's are historical figures, equally true and correct, but put into action, where every nerve and mulele is displayed in the struggle with others, with all the eff et of collision and contrast, with every variety of light and shade. Chaneer's characters are narrative, Shakespeare's drainatie, Milton's epic. That is, Chaucer told only as much of his story as he pleated, as y as required for a particular purpose. He answered for his characters hunself. In Slinke-speare, they are introduced upon the stage, are liable to be asked all sorts of ques tions, and are forced to answer for themselves Chaacer we perceive a fixed essence of character Shake peare there is a continual composition and decommission of its elements, a fermentation of every particle in the whole mass, by its alternate affinity or antipals to other principles which are brought in contret with it Till the experiment is tried, we do not I not be reall the turn which the character will take in is new circumstances. Milton tool only a few son, to principles of character, and raised them to the conceivable gran leur, and refined them from e er, base alloy Hi languartion, 'night sphered in Heaven,' clanned kindred only with what he can from that height, and could ruse to the same clevation with itself. He sat retired and kept his state alone, 'playing with wisdom,' while Shakespeare mingled with the crowd, and played the host, 'to make society the sweeter welcome.'

Pope

The question whether Pope was a poet has hardly yet been settled, and is hardly worth settling, for if he was not a great poet, he must have been a great prose writer-that is, he was a great writer of some sort was a man of exquisite faculties, and of the most re fined taste, and as he chose verse (the most obvious dis tinction of poetry) as the vehicle to express his ideas, he has generally passed for a poet, and a good one. If, indeed, by a great poet we mean one who gives the utmost grandeur to our conceptions of nature, or the utmost force to the passions of the heart, Pope was not in this sense a great poct for the bent, the charac teristic power of his mind, lay the clean contrary way, namely, in representing things as they appear to the in different observer, stripped of prejudice and passion, as in his Critical Essays, or in representing them in the most contemptible and insignificant point of view, as in his Satires, or in clothing the little with mock-dignity, as in his poems of l'iney, or in adorning the trivial incidents and familiar relations of life with the iitmost elegance of expression and all the flattering illusions of friendship or self love, as in his Upistles He was not, then, distinguished as a poet of lofty enthusiasm, of strong iniagination, with a pressionate sense of the beauties of nature, or a deep insight into the norkings of the heart, but he was a wit and a critic, a man of sense, of observa tion, and the world, with a keen relish for the elegances of art, or of nature when embellished by art, a quick tact for propriety of thought and manners as established by the forms and eustoms of society, a refined sympathy with the sentiments and habitudes of human life, as he felt them within the little circle of his family and friends. He was, in a word, the poet, not of nature, but of art, and the distinction between the two, as well as I can make it out, is this-The poet of nature is one who, from the elements of beauty, of power, and of passion in his own breast, sympathises with whitever is benutiful and grand and impassioned in nature, in its simple majesty, in its immediate appeal to the senses, to the thoughts and hearts of all men, so that the poet of nature, by the truth and depth and harmony of his mind, may be said to hold communion with the very soul of nature, to be identified with and to foreknow and to record the feelings of all nich at all times and places, as they are liable to the same impressions, and to exert the same power over the minds of his renders that nature does He sees things in their eternal beauty, for he sees them as they are, he feels them in their universal interest, for he feels them as they affect the first principles of his and our common nature Such was Homer, such was Shakespeare, whose works will list as long as nature, because they are a copy of the in destructible forms and everlasting impulses of nature, welling out from the bosom as from a perennial spring, or stamped upon the senses by the hand of their minker The power of the imagination in them is the representa tive power of all nature. It has its centre in the human soul, and makes the circuit of the universe.

Pope was not assuredly a poet of this class, or in the first rank of it. He saw nature only dressed by art, he judged of beauty by fashion, he sought for truth in the opinions of the world, he judged of the feelings of others by his own The expresous soul of Shakespeare had an intuitive and mighty sympathy with whatever could enter into the heart of man in all possible circumstances Pope had an exact knowledge of all that he himself loved or hated, wished or wanted Milton has winged his daring flight from heaven to earth, through Chaos and old Pope's Muse never wandered with safety but from his library to his grotto, or from his grotto into his library back again. His mind dwelt with greater pleasure on his own garden than on the garden of Eden, he could describe the faultless whole length mirror that reflected his own person, better than the smooth surface of the lake that reflects the face of heaven-a piece of cut glass or a pair of paste buckles with more brilliance and effect than a thousand den drops glittering in the sun He would be more delighted with a patent lamp than with 'the pale reflex of Cynthia's brow,' that fills the skies with its soft silent lustre, that trembles through the cottage window, and cheers the watchful mariner on the lonely wave. In short, he was the poet of personality and of polished life. That which was nearest to him was the greatest, the fashion of the day bore suay in his mind over the immutable laws of nature ferred the artificial to the natural in external objects. because he had a stronger fellow feeling with the self love of the maker or proprictor of a gengaw than admiration of that which was interesting to all mankind He preferred the artificial to the natural in passion because the involuntary and uncalculating impulses of the one hurried him away with a force and vehemence with which he could not grapple, while he could trifle with the conventional and superficial modifications of mere sentument at will, laugh at or admire, put them on or off like a masquerade dress, make much or little of them, indulge them for a longer or a shorter time, as he pleased, and because, while they amused his fancy and excreised his ingenuity, they never once disturbed his vanity, his levity, or indifference. His mind was the antithesis of strength and grandeur, its power was the power of indifference He had none of the enthusiasm of poetry, he was in poetry what the sceptic is in religion (From Lectures on the English Poets )

Scott and Shakespeare

No one admires or delights in the Scotch Novels more than I do, but at the same time when I hear it asserted that his mind is of the same class with Shakespeare's, or that he imitates nature in the same way, I confess I cannot assent to it. No two things appear to me more different Sir Walter is an imitator of nature and nothing more, but I think Shakespeare is infinitely more than The creative principle is everywhere restless and redundant in Shakespeare, both as it relates to the invention of feeling and imagery, in the author of IVaverley it hes for the most part dormant, sluggish, and unused Sir Walter's mind is full of information, but the 'o'er inform ing power' is not there Shakespeare's spirit, like fire. shines through him Sir Walter's, like a stream, reflects surrounding objects It is true, he has shifted the scene from Scotland into England and France, and the manners and characters are strikingly English and Trench, but this does not prove that they are not local, and that they are not borrowed, as well as the scenery and costume, attempting to dazzle superficial people with them, or smiling, delighted, at my own want of success?

In matters of taste and feeling, one proof that my conclusions have not been quite shallow or hasty is the circumstance of their having been lasting. I have the same favourite books, pictures, passages, that I ever had I may therefore presume that they will last me my lifenay, I may indulge a hope that my thoughts will survive me This continuity of impression is the only thing on which I pride myself Even Lainb, whose relish of certain things is as keen and carnest as possible, takes a surfeit of admiration, and I should be afruid to ask about his select authors or particular friends after a lapse of ten years As to myself, any one knows where to have me. What I have once made np my mind to, I abide by to the end of the chapter. One cause of my independence of opinion is, I believe, the liberty I give to others, or the very diffidence and distrust of making converts. I should be an excellent man on a jury I might say little, but should starve 'the other eleven obstinate fellows? out

On Judging of Pictures

I deny in toto and at once the exclusive right and power of painters to judge of pictures What is a picture made for? To convey certain ideas to the mind of a painter—that is, of one man in ten thousand? No, but to make them apparent to the eye and mind of all a picture be admired by none but printers, I think it is a strong presumption that the picture is bad is no more a judge, I suppose, than another man of how people feel and look under certain passions and events Everybody sees as well as he whether certain figures on the canvas are like such a man, or like a cow, a tree, a bridge, or a windmill All that the painter can do more than the las spectator is to tell ruhs and how the ments and defects of a picture are produced. I see that such a figure is ungraceful, and out of nature—he shows me that the drawing is faulty, or the foreshortening in correct He then points out to me whence the blemish arises, but he is not a bit more aware of the existence of the blemish than I am In Hogarth's 'Frontispiece' I see that the whole husiness is absurd, for a man on a full two miles off could not light his pipe at a candle held out of a window close to me, he tells me that is from a want of perspective—that is, of certain rules by which certain effects are obtained. He shows me why the picture is bad, but I am just as well capable of saving 'the picture is bad' as he is To take a coarse illustra tion, but one most exactly apposite. I can tell whether a made dish be good or bad-whether its taste be pleasant or disagreeable, it is dressed for the palate of uninitiated people, and not alone for the disciples of Dr Kitchener and Mr Ude But it needs a cook to tell one why it is bad, that there is a grain too much of this, or a drop too much of t'other, that it has been boiled rather too much, or stewed rather too little. These things, the wherefores, as Squire Western would say, I require an artist to tell me, but the point in debate-the worth or the bad quality of the painting or pottage-I am as well able to decide upon as any who ever brandished a pallet or a pan, a brush or a skimming ladle

To go into the higher branches of the art—the poetrs of painting—I deny still more peremptorily the exclusive ness of the initiated — It might as well be said that none but those who could write a play have any right to sit on the third row in the pit, on the first night of a new tragedy, may, there is more plausibility in the one than the other No man can judge of poetry without possess ing in some measure a poetical mind, it need not be of that degree necessary to create, but it must be equal to taste and to analyse Now, in painting there is a directly mechanical power required to render those imaginations, to the judging of which the mind may be perfectly competent. I may I now what is a just or a beautiful representation of love, anger, madness, despuir, without being able to draw a straight line, and I do not see how that faculty adds to the capability of so indging A very great proportion of painting is mechanical. The higher kinds of painting need first a poets mind to conceive, very well, but then they need a draughtsman's hand to execute. Now, he who possesses the mind alone is fully able to judge of what is produced, even though he is by no means endowed with the mechanical power of pro ducing it himself. I am far from saying that any one is capable of duly judging pictures of the higher class It requires a mind capable of estimating the noble or touching, or terrible, or sublime subjects which they present, but there is no sort of necessity that we should be able to put them upon the canvas ourselves

D. NICHOL SMITTI

Francis Jeffrey, son of George Jeffrey, a depute-clerk in the Court of Session, was born at Edmburgh on 23rd October 1773 There he lived almost continuously from his earliest school days 'in the abyss of Bailie Fyfe's Close' to his latter years as a Lord of Session and 'Duke of Cruigcrook' At the age of fourteen he passed from the High School of Edinburgh to the University of Glasgon, where he remained till 1789 During the next two years, which he spent in his native city and at an uncle's place in Stirlingshire, he appears to have devoted himself to the composition of letters and essays on various critical and ethical subjects, as well as a Sketch of My Own Character That he wrote no less than thirty one papers between November 1789 and March 1790 is a fact of some interest in the biography of the liter Yet they are of indifferent promise, and history will prefer to signalise these aimless years by the occasion on which he assisted in carrying to bed the greatest of biographers in a state of the greatest intoxication He proceeded to Oxford in September 1791, but he found the life there so uncongenial that he returned in July of the next The men at Queen's were 'pedants, cox combs, and strangers ' so ill at ease was he that he could say, 'This place has no latent charms,' and extent, as in the later Causeries du Lunds and other analogous examples, the outcome of journalistic necessity. In Jeffrey's case this manner was probably helped by a habit, acquired in youth, of making extensive notes and prices of books and lectures, and of interpolating paragraphs of approval or dissent. The method made 'criticism' easy to those who were in a hurry to write, or in a hurry to read, and it undoubtedly did much, in the earlier stages at least, to stimulate literary taste. Jeffrey, however, never sank the critical in the descriptive (the Edinburgh Review was also, as its title-page claimed, a Critical Journal), and, far more than his successors, made his reviewing an excuse for the iteration of a definite critical doctrine.

There are but few pages of Jeffrey's writings-at least in the ample selection which he reprintedwhich are lacking in literary interest either in point of view or in style. Despite the miscellaneous character of his work, the manner is uniformly 'correct' in the best sense, his English is not merely good, but always clear, and often lively When he is dull or commonplace, as lie is on occasion, it is nearly always because he has looked at the subject too carefully and from both sides, and has declined to give a bias to the indolent reader The sincerity which he showed in his analysis and judgment has its counterpart in the sincerity of his style, it was a necessary corollary to the exact rule which guided his approach to a subject that he should spare no effort to make his familiarity clear to his readers. In the more intimate passages of his juvenilia he vows himself to a strenuous discipline, guided by the best models, in the preparation of a careful prose style. His more obvious faults of manner are traceable to a certain priggishness, which appears in the exercises of his earliest college days, reappears at times in the censorious Review, and is transformed in the correspondence of later life into that condescension from which a Scottish judge of that day could hardly escape. There can be no doubt that it was this profession of superiority, apart from political and personal antipathies, which irritated his more sensitive contemporaries, but it must be conceded that Jeffrey, if at times indiscreet, had good reason to believe in his more thorough mastery of the problem in hand. His legal cast of mind, strengthened by his experience at the Bar, undoubtedly stimulated this habit, for in his writings, and in the later rather than in the earlier, he shows the ingenuity of the cross examiner in coaving from himself effective evidence of his own learning and judgment.

Later criticism has inclined to discredit Jeffrey's literary acumen and to blame him for his Corinthian manner of disagreement—even for setting a bad example to the essayists of the next generation Yet Jeffrey's obtuseness is but apparent Opinions like his 'This will never do,' wrenched from their context and brought face to free with modern taste, may well put the best of Jeffrey's apologists out of countenance, but it must be remembered, in his behalf, that he had the difficult problem of dealing with the work of contemporaries, and of passing judgments which his renders wished to receive as final, and, moreover, that the issues before him were not exactly the issues which concern us has his prejudices, but they are never wanton His most extravagant utterances about the Lake School, even his unfortunate gibe at 'dancing daffodils,' for which he is still in the critics' purgatory, are less the expression of mere dislike than the logical outcome of a carefully adopted theory He took ill to the Wordsworthian dogmas, to German transcendentalism and vulgarity, in a general way to the 'new things' of the Romantic Spirit, primarily because the indifference or opposition of these views to artistic method, as expressed in the catch phrase 'Poetic Diction,' struck rudely at his lifelong purpose to establish an analogical rule or habit in the domain of criticism And after all, in his most inconsiderate (not unconsidered) judgments he never went so far astray as Wordsworth did in his description of the eighteenth century To the historical student it is an easier task to justify Jeffrey from his point of view than it is to be convinced of Wordsworth's perspective, however strongh Wordsworthin the reader's sympathies may be Moreover, Jeffrey's fine instinct for the best passages in contemporary literature, even in those authors which were not after his heart, is a qualification for the critical Areopagus which his greatest errors of judgment cannot destroy pages of extract which fill the earlier numbers of the Edinburgh form, if taken by themselves, an anthology of no small permanent value charge of undue severity or unfairness in his criticism the readiest retort is to invite a comparison with Gifford or Lockhart, who dragooned heresy and ineptitude as Jeffrey never did or could have His generous appreciation of Burns and Keats, and his amende honorable in his postscripts on Scott and Wordsworth, are unmatched in those who gloried in resting on one side of the ques-Jeffrey has gained the obloquy of the tion ' pioneer, but the rereading of his 'insensate rage' at the distance of a century will adjust the balance. His breadth of view saved him from the minor and persistent asperities He was for that reason more prone to annoy his victim by a suspension of judgment, by hopping round and round him, than by knocking him down with a blow active indecision, if we may so call it, while it was more merciful to the author, sometimes undid or damaged the reputation of the critic.

Men of Letters and Society

The last distinction between good French and good English society arises from the different position which was occupied in each by the men of letters. In France, certainly, they mingled much more extensively with the polite world—incalculably to the benefit both of that much counter to the general character of the nation to be very much followed, and undoubtedly the greater and better part of their writers turned rather to us for hints and lessons to guide them in their ambitious career There was a greater original affinity in the temper and genius of the two nations, and, in addition to that consideration, our great authors were indisputably at once more original and less classical than those of France Lugland, hon ever, we are sorry to say, could furnish abundance of bad as well as of good models, and even the best were peril ous enough for rash mutators. As it happened, however, the worst were most generally selected, and the worst parts of the good. Shakespeare was admired, but more for his flights of fancy, his daring improprieties, his tres passes on the borders of absurdity, than for the infinite sagacity and rectifying good sense by which he redeemed those extravagances, or even the profound tenderness and simple pathos which alternated with the lofty sour ing or dazzling imagery of his style Altogether, how ever, Shakespeare was beyond their rivalry, and although Schiller has dared, and not ingloriously to cinulate his miraeles, it was plainly to other ments and other rival ries that the body of his ingenious countrymen aspired The ostentations absurdity, the affected oddity, the pert familiarity, the broken style and exaggerated scutiment of Fristram Shandy, the mankish morality, dandling details, and interminable agonies of leichardson, the vulgar adventures and homely, though at the same time fantastical, speculations of John Buncle and others of his forgotion class, found far more favour in their eyes They were original, startling, unclassical, and puzzling They excited curiosity his not being altogether intelligible, effectually excluded inonotons by the rapidity and violence of their transitions, and promised to rouse the most torpid sensibility by the violence and perseverance with v high they thundered at the heart. They were the very things, in short, which the German originals were in search of, and they were not slow, therefore, in adopting and improving on them In order to make them thoroughly their own, they had only to exaggerate their peculiarities, to mix up with them a certain allow ance of their old visionary philosophy, musty metaphysics, and superstitious visions, and to introduce a few erray sententious theorists, to sprinkle over the whole a season ing of rash speculation on morality and the fine arts

Burns and Wordsworth.

Our other remark is of a more limited application, and is addressed eliiefly to the followers and patrons of that new school of poetry, against which we have thought it our duty to neglect no opportunity of testifying gentlemen are outrageous for simplicity, and we beg leave to recommend to them the simplicity of Burns has copied the spoken language of passion and affection, with infinitely more fidelity than they have ever done, on all occasions which properly admitted of such adaptation, but he has not rejected the helps of elevated language and habitual associations, nor debased his composition by an affectation of babyish interjections, and all the puling expletives of an old nursery maid's vocabulary may look long enough among his nervous and manly lines before they find any 'Good Incks 1'-'Dear hearts 1' -or 'As a body may says,' in them, or any stuff about duncing daffodils and sister Emmelines Let them think with what infinite contempt the powerful mind of Burns would have perused the story of Alice Fell and her duffle cloak, of Andrew Jones and the half crown, or of Little Dan without breeches, and his thievish grandfather. Let them contrast their own fantastical personages of hysterical schoolmasters and sententious leech gatherers with the authentic rustics of Burns's Cotter's Saturday Night, and his inimitable songs, and reflect on the different reception which those personifications have met with from the public. Though they will not be reclaimed from their puny affectations by the example of their learned predecessors, they may, perhaps, submit to be admonished by a self taught and illiterate poet, who drew from Nature far more directly than they can do, and produced some thing so much liker the admired copies of the masters whom they have abjured

Scott's Poetic Genius

In the choice of his subjects, for example, he does not attempt to interest merely by fine observation or pathetic sentiment, but takes the assistance of a story, and enlists the render's enriosity among his motives for attention Then his characters are all selected from the most common diamatis fersona of poetry-kings, warriors, knights, outlaws, nuns, minstrels, secluded damsels wizards, and true lovers He never ventures to carry us into the cottage of the modern peasant, like Crabbe or Cowper, nor into the bosom of doinestic privacy, like Campbell, nor among creatures of the imagination, like Snutley or Darwin Such personnges, we readily admit, are not in themselves so interesting or striking as those to whom Mr Scott has devoted himself, but they are far less familiar in poetry, and are therefore more likely, perhaps, to engage the attention of those to whom poetry is familiar In the management of the passions, again, Mr Scott appears to have pursued the same popular and compara tively easy course. He has rused all the most familiar and poetical emotions, by the most obvious aggregations and in the most compendious and judicious ways has dazzled the reader with the splendour, and even warmed him with the transient heat of various affections. but he has nowhere fairly kindled him with enthusiasm or melted hun into tenderness. Writing for the world at large, he has wisely abstained from attempting to raise any pression to a height to which worldly people could not be transported, and contented himself with giving his reader the chance of feeling as a brave, kind, and affectionate gentleman must often feel in the ordinary course of his existence, without trying to hreathe into him either that lofty enthusiasm which disdains the ordi nary business and amusements of life, or that quict and deep sensibility which unfits for most of its pursuits With regard to diction and imagery, too, it is quite obvious that Mr Scott has not aimed at writing either in a very pure or a very consistent style. He seems to have been anxious only to strike, and to be easily and univer sally understood, and, for this purpose, to have called the most glutering and conspicuous expressions of the most popular authors, and to have interwoven them in splendid confusion with his own nervous diction and irregular versification. Indifferent whether he coins or borrows and draying with equal freedom on his memory and his imagination, he goes boldly forward, in full reliance on a never failing abundance, and dazzles, with his richness and variety, even those who are most apt to be offended with his glare and irregularity. There is nothing in Mr Scott of the severe and majestic style of Milton, or of the terse and fine composition of Pope, or whither he was going, till he lind covered his pages with an interminable arabesque of connected and incongruous figures, that multiplied as they extended, and were only harmonised by the brightness of their tints and the graces of their forms. In this rish and headlong career he has, of course, many lapses and failures. There is no work, accordingly, from which a malicious critic could cull more matter for ridicule, or select more obscure, un natural, or absurd passages. But we do not take that to be our office, and must beg leave on the contrary to say that any one who on this account would represent the whole poem as despicable must either have no notion of poetry or no regard to truth

(From the Fdinbrigh Review, August 1820.)

Wordsworth,

I have spoken in many places rather too bitterly and confidently of the faults of Mr Wordsworth's poetry, and forgetting that, even on my own view of them, they were but faults of taste or venial self-partiality, have sometimes visited them, I fear, with an asperity which should be reserved for objects of moral reprobation I were now to deal with the whole question of his poetical ments, though my judgment might not be substantially different, I hope I should repress the greater part of these vir acites of expression. And indeed so strong his been my feeling in this way, that, considering how much I have always loved many of the nttributes of his Genius, and how entirely I respect his Character, it did at first occur to me whether it was quite fitting that, in my old age and his, I should include in this publication any of those critiques which may have formerly given pain or offence to him or his admirers. But when I reflected that the mischief, if there really ever was any, was long ago done, and that I still retain, in substance, the opinions which I should now like to have seen more gently ex pre sed, I felt that to omit all notice of them on the present occasion might be held to import a retraction which I am as far as possible from intending, or even be represented as a very shabby way of backing out of sentiments which should either be manfully persisted in or openly renounced and nbandoned as untenable

I finally resolved, therefore, to reprint my review of The Execursion, which contains a pretty full view of my griefs and charges against Mr Wordsworth set forth too, I believe, in a more temperate strain than most of my other inculpations—and of which I think I may now venture to say further, that if the faults are unsparingly noted, the beauties are not penuriously or grudgingly allowed, but commended to the admiration of the reader with at least as much heartiness and good will

But I have also reprinted a short paper on the same author's White Doe of Ry Istone—in which there certainly is no praise or notice of beauties to set against the very unqualified censures of which it is wholly made up. I have done this, however, not merely because I adhere to these censures, but chiefly because it seemed necessary to bring me fairly to issue with those who may not concur in them. I can easily understand that many whose admiration of the Excursion or the Lineal Ballads rests substantially on the passages which I too should join in admiring may view with greater indulgence than I can do the tedious and flat passages with which they are interspersed, and may consequently think my censure of these works a great deal too harsh and uncharitable Between such persons and me, therefore, there may be no radical difference of opinion or contrariety as to prin ciples of judgment. But if there be any who actually admire this White Doe of Ry Istone, or Peter Bell [, or] The Waggoner, or the Lamentations of Martha Rae, or the Sonnels [up]on the Punishment of Death, there can be no such ambiguity or means of reconcilement. Now I have been assured not only that there are such person, but that almost all those who seek to exalt Mr Wordsworth as the founder of a new school of poetry consider these as by far his best and most characteristic productions, and would at once reject from their com mumon any one who did not acknowledge in them the traces of a high inspiration Now I wish it to be under stood that when I speak with general intolerance or impatience of the school of Mr Wordsworth, it is to the school holding these tenets and applying these tests that I refer and I really do not see how I could better explain the grounds of my dissent from their doctrines than by republishing my remarks on this White Doc

> (Note to review of The Excursion November 1814 Contributions, vol. 11, ed. 1846 pp. 504-5.)

This [The White Doc], we think, has the ment of being the very worst poem we ever saw imprinted in a quarto volume, and though it was scareely to be expected, we confess, that Mr Wordsworth, with all his ambition, should so soon have attained to that distinction, the wonder may perhaps be diminished when we state that it seems to us to consist of a liappy union of all the faults, without any of the beau ties, which belong to his school of poetry It is just such a work, in short, as some wicked enemy of that school might be supposed to have devised on purpose to make it ridiculous, and when we first took it up, we could not help suspecting that some ill natured critic had actually taken this harsh method of instructing Mr Wordsworth, by example, in the nature of those errors, nguist which our precepts had been so often directed in We had not gone far, however, till we felt in tuitively that nothing in the nature of a joke could be so insupportably dull, and that this must be the work of one who carnestly believed it to be a pattern of pathetic simplicity, and gave it out as such to the admiration of nll intelligent readers. In this point of view, the work may be regarded as currous at least, if not in some degree interesting, and at all events it must be instructive to be made aware of the excesses into which superior under standings may be betrayed by long self indulgence, and the strange extravagances into which they may run when under the influence of that intoxication which is produced by nnrestrained admiration of themselves This poetical intoxication, indeed, to pursue the figure a little farther, seems capable of assuming as many forms as the vulgar one which arises from wine, and it appears to require as delicate a management to make a man a good poet by the help of the one as to make him a good companion by means of the other. In both cases, a little mistake as to the dose or the quality of the inspiring fluid may make him absolutely outrageous, or hill him over into the most profound stupidity, instead of brightening up the hidden stores of his genius and truly we are concerned to say that Mr Wordsworth seems hitherto to have been unlucky in the choice of his hquor-or of his bottle holder some of his odes and ethic exhortations he was exposed to the public in a state of incoherent rapture and glorious delirium to which we think we have seen a parallel

The Sacred Danger

Gibbon has left us a description, not very powerful, of a case which is all powerful of itself, and needs no expansion—the case of a state criminal vainly attempting to escape or to hide himself from Caesar—from the arm wrapped in clouds, and stretching over kingdoms alike, or oceans, that arrested and drew back the wretch to judgment—from the inevitable eye that slept not nor slumbered, and from which neither Alps interposing, nor immeasurable deserts, nor trackless seas, nor a four months' flight, nor perfect innocence, could screen him The world, the world of civilisation, was Cresar's and he who fled from the wrath of Cæsar sud to himself, of necessity, 'If I go down to the sea, there is Casar on the shore, if I go into the sands of Bilidulgerid, there is Cresar waiting for me in the desert, if I take the wings of the morning, and go to the utmost recesses of wild beasts, there is Cosar before me' All this makes the condition of a criminal under the Western Empire terrific, and the condition even of a subject perilous. But how stringe it is, or would be so had Gibbon been a man of more sensibility, that he should have overlooked the converse of the case-viz, the terrific condition of Casar, annulst the terror which he caused to others. In fact, both conditions were full of despair. But Cresar's was the worst, by a great pre emmence, for the state criminal could not be made such without his own concurrence, for one moment, at least, it lind been within his choice to be no criminal at all, and then for him the thunderbolts of Casar slept. But Casar had rarely any choice as to his own election, and for him, therefore, the dagger of the assassin never could sleep men's houses, other men's bedchambers, were generally asylunis, but for Casar, his own palace had not the privileges of a home. His own armies were no guards. his own pavilion, rising in the very centre of his armies sleeping around him, was no sanctuary. In all these places had Cresar many times been murdered these pledges and sanctities-his household gods, the majests of the empire, the sacramentum nulitare-all had given way, all had yawned beneath his feet

The imagination of man can frame nothing so awful -the experience of man has witnessed nothing so awful, as the situation and tenure of the Western Casar The danger which threatened lum was like the pestilence which walketh in darkness, but which also walketh in the noon day. Morning and evening, summer and winter, brought no change or shadow of turning to this particular evil. In that respect it enjoyed the immuni ties of God at was the same yesterday, to day, and for After three centuries it had lost nothing of its virulence, it was growing worse continually the heart of man ached under the evil, and the necessity of the evil Can any man incasure the siclening fear which must have possessed the hearts of the ladies and the children composing the imperial family? To them the mere terror, entailed like an inheritance of leprosy upon their family above all others, must have made it a woe like one of the evils in the Revelations-such in its infliction, such in its inevitability. It was what Pagan language denominated 'a sacred danger,' a danger charmed and conscerated against human alleviation

Prose

Those people are, therefore, mistaken who imagine that prose is either a natural or a possible form of composition in early states of society. It is such truth only as ascends from the earth, not such as descends from heaven, which can ever assume an unmetrical form Now, in the earliest states of society, all truth that has any interest or importance for man will connect itself with heaven. If it does not originally come forward in that sacred character, if it does not borrow its importance from its sanctity, then, by an inverse order, it will good number of Latin phrases. Latin '-Oh, but that was charming, and in one so young! The grave Don owned the soft imperennent, relented at onec, and clasped the hopeful young gentleman in the Wellington tronsers to his uncular and rather angular breast. In this house the yarn of life was of a mingled quality table was good, but that was exactly what Kate cared least about. On the other hand, the amusement was of the worst kind. It consisted chiefly in conjugating Latin verbs, especially such as were obstinately irregular show him a withered frost bitten verb, that wanted its pretente, wanted its gerunds, wanted its supines, wanted, in fact, everything in this world, fruits or blossoms, that make a verb desirable, was to earn the Don's gratitude All day long he was, as you many say, marching and countermarching his favourite brigades of verbsverbs frequentative, verbs inceptive, verbs desiderative -horse, foot, and artillery, changing front, advancing from the rear, throwing out skirmishing parties, until Kate not given to frint, must have thought of such a resource, as once in her life she had thought so season ably of a vesper headache. This was really worse than St Sebastian's It reminds one of a French gaiety in Thiebault, who describes a rustic party, under equal despair, as employing themselves in conjugating the verb senniver-Je m'ennine, tu t'ennines, il sennint, nous nous ennuyous, etc., thence to the imperfect-Je m'ennujois, tu tennujois, etc., thence to the imperative -Qual s'ennige, etc., and so on, through the whole dolorous conjugation Now, you know, when the time comes that nous nous ennugous, the best course is to Kate saw that, and she walked off from the Don's (of whose amorous passion for defective verbs one would have wished to know the catastrophe), taking from his mantelpiece rather more silver than she had levied on her aunt. But then, observe, the Don also was a relative, and really he owed her a small cheque on his banker for turning out on his field days A man, if he is a kinsman, has no unlimited privilege of boring one an uncle has a qualified right to hore his nephews, even when they happen to be meees, but he has no right to bore either nephew or niece gratis

The Mail-Coach.

The modern modes of travelling cannot compare with the old mail coach system in grandeur and power. They boast of more velocity, not, however, as a consciousness, but as a fact of our lifeless knowledge, resting upon alien evidence, as, for instance, because somebody says that we have gone fifty miles in the hour, though we are far from feeling it as a personal experience, or upon the evidence of a result, as that actually we find ourselves in York four hours after leaving London Apart from such an assertion or such a result, I myself am little aware of the pace. But, seated on the old mul couch, we needed no evidence out of ourselves to indicate the velocity. On this system the word was, Non magna loaumur, as upon rulways, but winnus Yes, 'magna animus,' we do not make verbal ostentation of our grandeurs, we realise our grandeurs in act, and in the very experience of life The vital experience of the glad animal sensibilities made doubts impossible on the question of our speed, we heard our speed, we saw it, we felt it as a thrilling, and this speed was not the product of blind insensite agencies, that had no sympathy to give, but was mear nated in the fiery evelvalls of the noblest amongst brutes, in his dilated nostril, spasmodic muscles, and thunder beating hoofs. The sensibility of the horse, uttering itself in the maniac light of his eye, might be the last vibration of such a movement, the glory of Salamanea might be the first. But the intervening links that connected them that spread the earthquake of battle into the eyeball of the horse, were the heart of man and its electric thrillings—kindling in the rapture of the tiery strife, and then propagating its own tumults by contagious shouts and gestures to the heart of his servant the horse

But now, on the new system of travelling, iron tubes and boilers have disconnected man's heart from the ministers of his locomotion. Nile nor Trafalgar has power to raise an extra bubble in a steam kettle. The galvanie cycle is broken up for ever, man's imperial nature no longer sends itself forward through the electric sensibility of the hor e, the interagencies are gone in the mode of communication between the horse and his master, out of which grew so many aspects of sublimity under accidents of mists that hid, or sudden blizes that reverled, of mobs that agitated, or miding ht solitudes that awed Lidings, fitted to convulse all nations, must henceforwards trivel by culinary process and the trumpet that once announced from afar the laurelled mail, heart shaking when heard screaming on the wind and proclaiming itself through the darkness to every village or solitary house on its route, has now given way for ever to the pot wallopings of the boiler

Thus have perished multiform openings for public expressions of interest, scenical yet natural, in great national tidings, for revelations of faces and groups that could not offer themselves amongst the fluctuating mobs of a rulway station. The gatherings of gazers about a laurelled mail had one centre, and acknowledged one sole interest. But the crowds attending at a rulway station have as little unity as running water and own as many centres as there are separate carriages in the train.

Our Ladies of Sorrow

These sisters—by what name shall we call them? If I say simply, 'The Sorrows,' there will be a chance of mistaking the term, it might be understood of individual sorrow—separate cases of sorrow, whereas I want a term expressing the inighty abstractions that incarnate themselves in all individual sufferings of man's heart, and I wish to have these abstractions presented as impersonations—that is, as clothed with human attributes of life, and with functions pointing to flesh—I et us call them, therefore, Our Ladies of Serrow

I know them thoroughly, and have walked in all their kingdoms. Three sisters they are, of one mysterious household, and their paths are wide apart, but of their dominion there is no end. Them I saw often conversing with I evana, and sometimes about myself. Do they talk, then? Oh no! Mighty phan toms like these disdain the infirmities of language. They may utter voices through the organs of man when they dwell in human hearts, but amongst them selves is no voice nor sound, eternal silence reigns in their kingdoms. They spoke not, as they talked with Levana, they whispered not, they sang not though oftentimes methought they might have sang for I upon earth had heard their mysteries oftentimes deciphered by oungest sister moves with incalculable motions, bound g, and with a tiger's leaps. She carries no key, for, ough coming rarely amongst men, she storms all doors which she is permitted to enter at all. And her name Mater Tenebrarum—Our Lady of Darkness.

De Quincey is his own hiographer but a more compact account, all additional matter, will be found in H. A. Page's Thomas de mincey his Life and Writings (2 vols., and ed., London, 1879), and in a handier form in Masson's De Quincey in the series of English Men of Letters. The first collective edition of the orks ran to fourteen volumes (Edinburgh, 1853-60), a fifteenth as added in 1863, and a sixteenth in 1871. The American edition, buch was begun in 1851, before the author's Edinburgh edition, and was extended to twenty two volumes, is fuller and the later inverside Press edition, in twelve thick volumes is even more implete. Masson's 'New and Enlarged Edition of The Collected Tritings of Thomas de Quincey (14 vols. Edinburgh, 1839-90) con ins all the known remains regrouped according to subject.

G GREGORY SMITH

John Keats.

Of the greater poets who were writing in the rst quarter of the nineteenth century, Keats 1795-1821) was born latest and was the first to ie. The eldest child of a London stable keeper of west country origin, he had lost both his parents then, at the age of fifteen, he left school and was pprenticed to a surgeon at Edmonton ie went into lodgings in London, and began to valk the hospitals. But his passion for poetry, timulated by intimacy with Leigh Hunt, Haydon, and others, developed into an ardent ambition, ind after a time he abandoned his profession, and, iving on his small inheritance, devoted himself o literature. Early in 1817 he published a small olume of Poems, which, together with verses of no merit or promise, contained the famous sonnet, On first looking into Chapman's Homer,' and everal pieces less completely successful but equally characteristic. This volume also shows he influences which had so far most affected that of Spenser and other Elizabethans, hat of Leigh Hunt, and that of Classical Mythplogy, as gathered chiefly from books like Lemoriere's Dictionary After its publication, which has hardly noticed outside the circle of his riends, he began to write his first long poem, Endymion, the composition of which occupied um till near the end of 1817, and which was published in the spring of 1818. His mind was growing fast at this time He was dissatisfied with his work before he had finished it, in the Preface he ascribes to it 'every error denoting a feverish attempt rather than a deed accomplished, and he was little affected by the contempt with which Blackwood's Magazine and the Quarterly greeted an author known to the Tory writers as a friend of the Radical Hunt Indeed, before Endymion appeared Keats had passed out of the stage of apprenticeship Early in 1818, when he was a few months over twenty-two, he was writing Isabella, and by the autumn of 1819 he had produced almost all the work on which his fame rests—Isabella, Hyperion, The Eric of St Agnis, Lamia, the poems in seven-syllable couplets, the Odes, most of the Sonnets, La Belle Dame sans Merci, and the fragment of The Eve of St Mark, an achievement not merely remarkable but quite unparalleled in the history of English poetry

But even during its accomplishment the turningpoint in Keats's life arrived His mother had died of consumption In December 1818 his brother Tom, tenderly nursed by him, succumbed to the same disease. His own health, after a walkingtour in Scotland in the summer of that year, was And about the time of his never satisfactory brother's death he met Fanny Braune, and the passion which fevered the last two years of his life fastened on him In February 1820 his lungs were attacked He slowly recovered, but in June another attack occurred, and in July, just when his new poems appeared, he was described as 'under sentence of death' In the early autumn he left England for Italy with the painter Joseph Severn, who remained with him until, after much suffering, he died in Rome on 23rd February 1821 Since that wonderful period of twenty months he had written little of great value, though the revision of Hyperion is extremely interesting for its ideas and for the comparative seventy of the style is not strange that in the last year of his life he should sometimes have spoken and written with a bitterness quite foreign to his nature in health, or should now have felt the brutal injustice of the attacks which, he thought, had deprived him

The accounts of Kents left by his friends, like his own letters, which are invaluable, present the picture of a very attractive and, on the whole, a fine character eager, enthusiastic and sensitive, but humorous, and remarkably reasonable, quite free from pettiness, vanity, and affectation, resolute and, at bottom, dceply serious The passion of love seems to have affected him violently without engaging his whole nature, and there is something unpleasant in many of his references to this subject, but he was a good brother and a good friend, sweet tempered and full of helpfulness and tact Being about a quarter of a century younger than Wordsworth and Coleradge, he had not to experience their political disillusionment, and, like his contemporaries Byron and Shelley, he was a Liberal in politics and quite unorthodox in religion. These subjects are referred to only in his earlier poems, and they never engrossed his attention, but he neither was nor thought that he ought to be absorbed in poetry to the exclusion of In spite of much despondency all other interests the consciousness of genius was strong in him, but it was accompanied by a winning modesty and an unusual degree of self-knowledge was aware of a certain contention in his nature To the beauty which speaks primarily to the senses, and brings unmingled pleasure, he was exquisitely sensitive, and it is no defect but a great merit in his poetry that it expresses so keenly this poetic joy. But he believed that a higher and more intense beauty is to be found elsewhere—for instance, in the strike of hum in hearts?—and that it cannot be found except through a sympathy and a thought or knowledge which bring pain. In this 'thought' he felt himself wanting, and he felt also that in him it disturbed that simpler enjoyment of hearity which he some times called 'sensation' or 'luxing'. But for this reason held lumself to be unfit is vet for poetry of the highest kinds and he was deter mined to go for The cry, ward. O for a life of sensitions rather than of thoughts? is characteristic of Keats, and, how ever long he had lived, he would never have been content with inv thought that fuled to take an unil inative form and so to excite sen sation, but not less characteristic of him are words these find there is no worthy pursuit hut the idea of doing some good for the world Same do it with their society -some with their wit - some with their benevolence.

From the Pottrait by W. Hilton, & V., in the National Pettrait Gallery.

There is but one way for me. The road hes through application, study, and thought?

Of Keats's longer poems the two on mythological subjects were fir the most ambitious in design Endymion is a romance in four books, Hyperion was to be an epic in ten, and it seems evident that in both poems something which may be called an 'inner meaning' was to be shadowed forth by the story The adventures of Endynnon are also the experiences of the poetic soul in its search for union with the absolute Beauty The hero may almost be compared with the hero of the Prelude, the heroine is more like Shelley's Intellectual Beauty than Lempriere's Diana That the absolute Beauty in its diverse manifestations-moonlight and sunlight, earth and sea, friendship and love, heroic enterprise and heroic death—is still one, that the poet can attain its final fruition only by traversing the dark places of life, and find at only when he thinks he has arrendered it sides life these were to be embodied in the lose tale of the shepherd and the goddes. But the result to a series of adventures to the detail of which it is impossible to issign a distinct symbolic dimension, and which, talen more ample, has eithe medical ence of a broken dream. And yet the fedure reveals more of leasters mind than any of his later completed yorks, though full of fuller it a decompleted yorks, though full of fuller it a decompleted.

pain and waste, like the conflict of two forms of civilisation or two religions. Act in reality since both are manifestations of one and the same principle, the defeat of the less perfect is also the fulfilment of its own being. If such ideas were to govern the conduct of the poem, it must have been intended to close, if not in rapture, yet in harmony. Perhaps here, as in Lingmin, the fusion of inner meaning and outward events would have been imperfect, and the events, taken more simply, would have fuled to satisfy superiority of the fragment to I raymion is in both respects so great that this is far from certain, and in any case Hyperton which first opened the eyes of Byron and others to the genius of Keats, gives the fullest idea of his capibilities. It has the inspiration, the 'natural magic,' the 'fascinating felicity of diction, the richness and variety of music, the pictorial power, which have so often been praised. It has also the visionary touch which appears from the first in his poetry, and it has the largeness and even the sublimity of effect at which elsewhere he hardly aimed

Isabella, the poem which succeeded Endymion, is a tale of unhappy love. It is not equal to the works that followed it, and in narrative art is not strong. But in several passages it shows imagination of a penetrating quality, and it is beside the mark to criticise it on the ground that it fails to move profoundly. Even if this were quite true, Keats was following not only his nature but his poetic creed when he transformed the matter of the story, even while he retained its most painful incidents, into a 'thing of beauty,' and left his readers musing rather on the loveliness of love than on the cruelty of fate.

The theme of The Eve of St Agnes, however, suited him still better, the Spenserian stanza, a finer one than ottava rima, was also more congenial to his style, and this lovely poem is the happiest of his narratives. The contrast on which it is built, between the cold, the storm, the old age, the empty pleasure and noisy enmity, of the world outside Madeline's chamber, and the glow, the hush, the rich and dreamy bliss within it, is exquisitely imagined and conveyed, and issues from one of Keats's deepest feelings—the same that inspired several of his odes.

In Lamia, the latest of the poems in the volume of 1820, Keats returned, after a study of Dryden, to the metre of Endymion, which is now handled in a less Elizabethan manner and with much greater firmness and skill There is a similar advance in narrative power. This poem is ex tremely vivid, and undoubtedly has the merit which Keats claimed for it when he wrote 'I am certain there is that sort of fire in it that must take hold of people some way. It shows, too, that in writing it he had 'made use of his judgment more deliberately' than in any previous work. Lamia is not, on the whole, so successful as the Eve of St Agnes It lacks in places that inspiration which is one of the enchantments of Keats's poetry, and one or two of its descriptions have almost an artificial air. It is also inferior to the Lve in regard to unity of impression Keats was feeling at the time both the fascination and the slavery of his passion, and perhaps also the resistance offered to it by what he called thought or philosophy These feelings give intensity to the poem, but they produce also an oscillation which is never brought to rest, and which communicates itself to the reader, who sometimes feels that the love of Lycius is based on a passing and ruinous illusion, and sometimes that not only his love for Lamia but also Lamia's love for him is a beautiful thing, and its destruction by the philosopher no less needless than disastrous ballad of La Belle Dame saus Merci, in some ways the most wonderful of all Keats's poems, deals with a somewhat similar theme, and has not this defect

A selection which aimed at showing Keats at his best, without illustrating at the same time the variety of his powers, would include nearly all the Odes, and certainly could not omit the 'Grecian Urn' The 'Autumn' has been preferred here as an example of his peculiar happiness in describing Nature in a serene and reposeful Though apparently so impersonal, this mood description is steeped in feeling, and this is more obviously true of the other Odes, which are full of characteristic experience. The 'Nightingale' and the 'Grecian Urn,' for example, though quite unlike in colour, express one and the same contrast-that between the unrest, decay, and transitoriness of life, and the perfection and eternity of beauty and joy as realised in imagination The land where the nightingale would sing to men who, like it, know naught of the 'weariness, the fever, and the fiet,' can be reached only 'on the viewless wings of poesy,' the love that never cloys and the music that cannot die are felt and heard only in that land of the 'spirit,' here too, 'in some untrodden region of the mind,' Psyche, unworshipped on earth, may still find her temple. The feeling of this contrast hounted Keats, it inspires the ode 'To Melancholy' and the verses, written in a lighter mood, called 'Fancy' Keats does not appear to have recognised the extraordinary merit of his Odes far from unsubstantial, they are among the most purely poetic of all poems, and, like the best passages in his other works, they are triumphs of expression Indeed, except by Shakespeare, the English language has scarcely been used else where in a manner at once so spontaneously perfect and so wholly English

The best of Keats's sonnets reach a very high level, but he left no songs of at all the same excellence, and for 'dancing measures,' and again for the soaring or rushing movement of the most passionate lyrics, he shows little gift or inclination. It is therefore uncritical to describe him in general terms as a great lyrical poet. His ambition in the last years of his life was to compose dramas, but in Otho the Great he merely versified materials supplied by his friend Brown, and his much superior fragment of King Stephen, which holds out high promise in regard to style, does not, of course, suffice to show whether he possessed, or was likely to develop, the powers of dramatic conception and construction

Among the contemporaries of Keats, Leigh Hunt was the poet whose influence on him is most obvious, but it was never very deep, and it passed away as he grew to maturity. He had a profound admiration for Wordsworth, whose Excursion appeared when Keats was feeling his first passion for poetry. One of his most interesting letters is concerned with the 'Lines written near Tintern Abbey,' and there are echoes in his poems of phrases in the 'Immortality Ode,' the sonnet 'The world is too much with us,' and the Lacursion He objected, however, to that obtrusion of a purpose which injures some of Wordsworth's writing. In his boyhood he wrote a feeble sonnet on Byron, but ifterwards rated lum low knew Shelley, but apparently met his friendliness with some reserve and never fully recognised his genus Kents's own influence on his successors appeared at once in the cirly works of Hood and Lennyson, and has been considerable ever since, it may be traced in the tendencies to choose subjects from Greek mythology, to describe n iture imaginatively but without much of the Words worthan spirituality, to saturate language with colour, and to aim at felicity of phrase. It is also visible both in paintings and poems of the Pre-Rossetti admired Keits raphaelite movement (and particularly his Belle Dame) almost as much as Coloridge, the Irc of St Mark is the forerunner of some of Morris's best descriptions, and in speaking of Irabella Mr Bridges has trulobserved 'The lovers who 'could not in the self same mansion dwell without sone malady," the "sick longing" of Isabella, the "pa sion boili meck and wild,' the "little sweet among much bitterness," and the consciousness of something too horrible to speal of behind the scene all the passionate funtness of the personages of the romance in whom as in a fided tapestry the brilliance of the dresses has outlasted the flesh colour, have a lileness to the creations of this school so remarkable, that Keats may be safely credited with a chief share of the parentage

In the following selection at his unfortunately been necessary to mutilate the so called 'song' from Endymon. One of Keats's letters has been included. It is comparatively early, and shows some mannerisms from which the later letters are free, but it is highly characteristic, and contains one of his most beautiful fragments of verse. In this letter some of his peculiarities in punctuation and the use of capitals have been removed.

From the Song of the Indian Maid

Beneath my palm trees, by the river side, I sat a weeping—in the whole world wide There was no one to ask me why I vept—And so I kept

Brimming the water hily cups with tears

Cold as my fears

Beneath my paim trees, by the river side, I sat a weeping—what enamour'd bride, Cheated by shadows wooer from the clouds,
But hides and shrouds
Beneath dark palm-trees by a river side?

And as I sat, over the light blue hills. There came a noise of revellers—the rills. Into the wide stream came of purple hue—Twas Brechus and his crew!

The earnest trumpet spake, and liver thrills

Sonnet-On first looking into Chapman's Homer

Much have I travell'd in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and I ingdoms seen, Round many western islands have I been Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold

Oft of one wide expanse had I been told,
That deep brow'd Homer rul'd as his demesne
Yet did I never breathe its pure serenc
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken,
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He star'd at the Pacific—and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien

Sonnet

When I have fears that I may cease to be Before my pen has glean'd my teeming brain,
Before high piled books, in charact'ry,
Hold like rich garners the full ripen'd grain,
When I behold, upon the night's starr'd face,
Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance,
And think that I may never live to trace
Their shadows, with the magic hand of chance,
And when I feel, fair creature of an hour,
That I shall never look upon thee more,
Never have relish in the facry power
Of unreflecting love,—then on the shore
Of the wide world I stand alone, and think,
Till Love and Fame to nothingness do sink

Saturn and Thea

Deep in the shally sadness of a vale

Far sunken from the healthy breath of niorn,

Far from the fiery noon, and eve's one star,

Sat gray hair'd Saturn, quiet as a stone,

Still as the silence round about his lair,

Forest on forest hung about his head

Like cloud on cloud No stir of air was there,

Not so much life as on a summer's day

Robs not one light seed from the feather'd grass,

But where the dead leaf fell, there did it rest

A stream went voiceless by, still deaden'd more

By reason of his fallen divinity

Spreading a shade the Naird 'mid her reeds

Press d her cold finger closer to her hips

Along the margin sand large foot marks went, No further than to where his feet had stray'd, And slept there since—Upon the sodden ground His old right hand lay nerveless, listless, dead, Unsceptred, and his realmless eyes were closed, While his bow'd head seem'd hist'ning to the Earth, His ancient mother, for some comfort yet

It seem'd no force could wake him from his place But there came one, who with a kindred hand Touch'd his wide shoulders, after bending low With reverence, though to one who knew it not She was a Goddess of the infant world, By her in stature the tall Amazon Had stood a pigmy's height—she would have ta'en Achilles by the hair and bent his neek, Or with a finger stay'd Ixion's wheel Her free was large as that of Memphian sphine, Pedestal'd haply in a palace court, When sages look'd to I gypt for their lore But oh! how unlike marble was that free How beautiful, if sorrow had not made Sorrow more benutiful than Beauty's self There was a listening fear in her regard, As if calamity lind but begun,

As if the vanward clouds of evil days
Had spent their milice, and the sullen rear
Was with its stored thunder labouring up
One hand she press'd upon that aching spot
Where beats the himan heart, as if just there,
Though an immortal, she felt ernel prin
The other upon Saturn's bended neek
She laid, and to the level of his ear
Leaning with parted hips, some words she spal e
In solemn tenour and deep organ tone
Some mourning words, which in our feeble tongue
Would come in these like accents, O how fruil
To that large utterance of the early Gods!

Fancy

Ever let the Fancy roam, Pleasure never is at home At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth, Like to bubbles when rain pelteth, Then let winged Paney wander Through the thought still spread beyond her Open wide the mind's eage door, She'll dart forth, and cloudward soar O sweet Fancy ! let her loose, Summer's joys are spoilt by use, And the enjoying of the Spring Fades as does its blossoming. Autumn's red lipp'd fruitage too, Bhishing through the mist and dew, Cloys with tasting What do then? Sit thee by the ingle, when The sear faggot blazes bright, Spirit of a winter's night, When the soundless earth is muffled, And the caked snow is slinfled From the ploughboy's heavy shoon, When the Night doth meet the Noon In a dark conspiracy To banish Even from her sky Sit thee there, and send abroad, With a mind self-overaw d. Fancy, high commission'd - send her l She has vassals to attend her She will bring, in spite of frost, Beauties that the earth hath lost, She will bring thee, all together, All delights of summer weather, All the buds and bells of May, From deny sward or thorny spray, All the heaped Autumn's wealth, With a still, mysterious stealth She will mix these pleasures up Like three fit wines in a cup, And thou shalt quaff it -thou shalt hear Distant harvest carols clear, Rustle of the resped corn, Sweet birds antheming the morn and, in the same moment-hark ! 'Tis the carly April larl, Or the rooks, with busy caw, Foraging for stiels and straw Then shalt, at one glance, behold The daisy and the mangold, White plum'd lilies, and the fir t Hedge grown primrose that hath burst,

Shaded hyacinth, alway Sapphire queen of the mid Max, And every leaf, and every flower, Pearled with the self same shower Thou shalt see the field mouse peep Meagre from its celled sleep, And the snal e all winter thin Cast on sunny bank its slin, Preekled nest egg thou shalt see Hatching in the hawthorn tree, When the hen bird's wing doth rest Quict on her mossy nest, Then the lunry and alarm When the bee him easts its swarm, Acorns ripe down pattering, While the antumn breezes sing

Oh, sweet l'ancy ! let her loose Liverything is spoilt by use Where 5 the check that doth not fide Too much gaz'd at? Where s the maid Whose hip mature is ever new? Where's the eye however blue Dolls not weary? Where sahe face One would meet in every place? Where's the voice however soft, One would hear so very oft? At a touch sweet Pleasure melicili, Like to bubbles when run pelteth Let, then winged I mey find Thee a mistre's to thy mind Dulcet ev'd as Ceres daughter, Ire the God of Lormont trught her How to frown and how to clude With a waist and with a side White as Ilche's when her zone Slipt its golden clasp, and down Fell her kirtle to her feet While she held the goblet sweet, And Jove grew languid - Preak the mesh Of the Lanes's silken leash Quickly break her prison string, And such joys as these she'll bring -Let the winged I mey roam, Pleasure never is at home

Madeline in her Chamber

Out went the taper as she hurried in,
Its little smoke, in pulled moonshine, died
She clos'd the door, she panted, all akin
To spirits of the air, and visions wide
No attered syllable, or, woe betide!
But to her heart, her heart was voluble,
Paining with cloquence her balmy side,
As though a tongueless nightingale should swell
Her throat in vain, and die, heart stiffed, in her dell

A casement high and triple arch'd there was,
All garlanded with carven imag ries
Of fruits, and flowers, and bunches of knot grass,
And diamonded with panes of quaint device
Innumerable of stains and splendid dives,
As are the tiger moth's deep damask d wings:
And in the midst, 'mong thousand heraldries,
And twilight saints, and dim emblazonings,
A shielded seutcheon blush'd with blood of queens and kings

Pull on this or ement shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm guler on Madeline's fair bread,
As down she linch for heaven's prace and hoon
Rose bloom fell on her hands, together press,
And on her silver cross soft amoths it
And on her har a glory, hile a sand
She seem'd a splen hid ingel, not be dreat
Sive wings, for heaven — Porphyro grow finit

Ode to a Nightingale

My heart ache and a drows numbress pain.
My sense, as thou he of head of I had orank.
Or empired some dull of rate to the drains.
One minute pass and Lethe wants had sunk.
This not through envy of the happy lot.
But being too happy in thine happiness.—
That there hight winged Draid of the trees,
In some melodious plot.

Of lecelien green, and shadows numberles Singest of summer in full throated easy.

O for a draught of vintage, that hath been Cool'd a long age in the deep delved earth
Tasting of 1 for and the country green,
Dance, and 1 rovened ong and sun burnt mirth!
O for a beaker full of the warm South
I all of the time, the blashful Happoners
With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple stained month
That I might drank, and leave the world unseen,
And with three fade away into the fore t dim

Falk far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou among the leaves hast never I nown
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groun
Where palsy shakes a few, sad last gray hairs,
Where youth grows pale and spectre thin, and dies,
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden by d despuirs
Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,

Or new Love pine at them beyond to morrow

Away ' away ' for I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards
But on the viculess wings of Poesy,
Though the dull brain perplaces and retards

Seff 1810

Already with thee! tender is the night,
And haply the Queen Moon is on her throne,
Cluster'd around by all her starry Fays,
But here there is no light,
Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft meense hangs upon the boughs,
But, in embalmed darkness, guess each sweet
Wherewith the seasonable month endows
The grass the thicket, and the fruit tree wild,
White hawthorn, and the pistoral eglantine,
Fast fiding violets cover'd up in leaves,
And mid May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eyes

Darkling I listen, and for many a time

I have been half in love with easeful Death,
Call'd him soft names in many a mused rhyme,
To take into the air my quiet breath,
Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy '
Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
To thy high requiem become a sod

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!

No liungry generations tread thee down

The voice I hear this passing night was heard

In ancient days by emperor and clown

Perhaps the self same song that found a path

Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,

She stood in tears amid the alien corn,

The same that offtimes hath

Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam

Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn

Forlorn 1 the very word is like a bell

To toll me back from thee to my sole self 1

Adieu 1 the fancy cannot cheat so well

As she is fun'd to do, deceiving elf

Adieu 1 adieu 1 thy pluintive anthem fides

Past the near meadows, over the still stream,

Up the hillside, and now 'tis buried deep

In the next valley glides

Was it a vision, or a waking dream?

Fled is that music —Do I wake or sleep?

Ode to Autumn.

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom friend of the maturing sun
Conspiring with him ho v to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch eaves run,
To bend with apples the moss'd cottage trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core
To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel, to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease,
For Summer has o'er brimm'd their clammy cells.

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft lifted by the winnowing wind,

Or on a half reap'd furrow sound asleep,
Drows'd with the fume of poppies, while thy look Spares the next swath and all its twined flowers;
And sometime like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook,
Or by a cyder press, with patient look,
Thou watchest the last oozings, hours by hours.

Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
Think not of them, thou hast thy music too,
While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
And touch the stubble plains with rosy hue,
Then in a wailful choir, the small gnats mourn
Among the river sallows, borne aloft
Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies,
And full grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn,
Hedge crickets sing, and now with treble soft
The redbreast whistles from a garden croft,
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies

La Belle Dame sans Merci.

O what can ail thee, knight at arms, Alone and palely loitering? The sedge has wither'd from the lake, And no birds sing

O what can ail thee, knight at arms 1
So haggard and so woo begone?
The squirrel's granary is full,
And the harvest's done.

I see a hily on thy brow
With anguish moist and fever dew,
And on thy cheeks a fading rose
Fast withereth too

I met a lady in the meads,
Full beautiful—a facry's child,
Her hair was long, her foot was light,
And her eves were wild

I made a garland for her herd,
And bracelets too, and fragrant zone,
She look'd at me as she did love,
And made sweet moan

I set her on my paeing steed,
And nothing else saw all day long,
For sidelong would she bend, and sing
A faery's song

She found me roots of relish sweet,
And honey wild, and manna dew,
And sure in language strange she said—
'I love thee true''

She took me to her elfin grot,
And there she wept and sigh'd full sore,
And there I shut her wild wild eyes
With kisses four

And there she lulled me asleep,
And there I dream'd—ah! woe betide 1
The latest dream I ever dream'd
On the cold hill's side

I saw pale kings and princes too,
Pale warriors, death pale were they all,
They ened, 'La Belle Dan e sans Merci
Hath thee in thrall!'

I saw their stars d lips in the gloam, With horrid warning gaped wide, And I awoke and found me here, On the cold hill's side

And this is why I sojourn here,
Alone and palely loitering,
Though the sedge is wither d from the lake,
And no birds sing

Sonnet-On a Dream

As Hermes once tool to his feathers light,
When fulled Argus, briffed, swoond and slept,
So on a Delphie reed my lidle spright
So play d, so charm'd, so conquer does bereft
The dragon world of all its hundred eyes
And seeing it asleep, so fled away
Not to pure Ida with its end cold slice,
Nor unto Tempe, where fore greet Inday,
But to that second eircle of sail Hell,
Where in the grist, the whirlwind and the flay
Of rain and limit stones, lovers need not tell
Their sorrows,—pale were the sweet hip I saw Pale were the hips I I iss d, and fair the form
I floated with, about that melancholy storm

Keats's Last Sonnet

Bright start would I were steadfast as thou art—
Not in lone splendour hung aloft the might,
And watching with eternal lids apart
Like Nature's patient—leeple's I remite,
The moving waters at their pricetille ta I
Of pure ablitton round earth's human shores.
Or giving on the new soft fallen mack
Of snow upon the mountains and the moors—
No—tet still steadfast still unchangeable,
Pillow d upon my fair love's ripening breast,
To feel for ever its soft fall and swell,
Awake for ever in a sweet unrest,
Still, still to hear her tender tal en breath,
And so live ever—or else swoon to death

Letter

Frk 19 1818

My DEAR REYNOLDS,-I had an idea that a man might pass a very pleasant life in this manner-let him on a certain day read a certain page of full Poess or ! distilled Prose, and let him wander with it, and muse upon it, and reflect upon it, and bring home to it, and i prophesy upon it, and dream upon it, until it becomes stale. But when will it do so? Never When Mnn has arrived at a certain ripeness in intellect now one grand and spiritual passage serves him as a starting post towards all 'the two and thirty Palaces' How happy is such a voyage of conception, what delicious diligent indolence! A doze upon a sofa does not lunder it, and a nap upon clover engenders othereal finger pointings The prattle of a child gives it wings, and the converse of middle age a strength to beat them. A strain of music conducts to 'an odd angle of the Isle,' and when the leaves whisper it puts a girdle round the earth. Nor will this sparing touch of noble books be any irreverence to their writers, for perhaps the honours paid by man to man are trifles in comparison to the benefit done by great works to the 'Spirit and pulse' of good by their mere passive existence. Memory should not be called off as a sort of scullion Mercury, or even a humble bee. It is no matter whether I am right or wrong, either one way or another, if there is sufficient to lift a little time from your shoulders—Your affectionate friend,

Feb 19, 1818 John Keats

See Keats s Poems and Letters, edited by Formao, to five small volumes (Gowans & Gray, 1900). The Aldine edition of the Poems (1876) gives them in nearly chronological order, but the text is bad The Letters (without those to Miss Brawne, and a few others) have been well edited by Colvin (1891). Lord Houghton's biography, first poblished in 1848, can never be superseded, but Colvin's Keats in the 'Men of Letters series (1887) is based on fuller material, and contains excellent criticism. A. C BRADLEY

Percy Bysshe Shelley,

born 4th August 1792, son of Timothy the son of Sir Bysshe Shelley, first baronet of an ancient and noble house till then undistinguished from its equals by any hereditary title, entered Eton twelve years later, after some private schooling, and passed on to Oxford in 1810 Next year he was expelled from the university which had recently cast out Landor, whose noble poem of Gebir had thready excited his just and ardent admiration The rather irrational reason, in the younger poet's case, was the appearance of an anonymous pamphlet or flysheet called The Necessity of Atheism It is not a work of any particular promise, but it is the first of Shelley's writings which would not disgrace a lower boy at Eton His previous verse and prose, ballad or elegy or fiction, were servile and futile imita tions of the illustrious Monk Lewis and the less illustrious Laura Matilda And the boy had succeeded in sinking to a deeper and a duller depth of absurdity than land ever been fathomed by his models In 1811 the youth of nineteen was induced to marry Harriet Westbrook, a schoolgirl of sixteen who had made use of her acquintance with his sister to throw herself upon his protection This unlucky alliance was the source of all the serious trouble which could possibly have affected the life of a man not miserable enough by nature to be made miserable by reviling or neglect. short first visit to Ireland, hardly memorable by the issue of a characteristic Address to the Irish People, had no recorded effect or result beyond the comical effect of alarming the Government into notice of his not very dangerous or politically important existence. In June 1813 his daughter Ianthe (a name which had already been borrowed by Byron from Landor) was born, and addressed three months later in a sonnet expressive of due and dutiful baby-worship In the same year he read Ariosto with the rapture of a boy-a fact to be remembered because the spirit of comedy, whether incarnate in Fletcher or in Sheridan, was repulsive rather than attractive to him There are certainly no signs of this influence in the poem, now privately printed, of Queen Mab-a work of impassioned rhetoric and passionate reasoning rather than poetic expression or imaginative thought. A Refutation of Deism, printed early in the following year, shows more intellectual power as well as more literary capacity than anything Shelley had yet written the design of reducing the concept of theism to an obvious and palpable absurdity, by demonstration of the assumed theorem that it must naturally and inevitably result in acceptance of Christianity, is carried out with more dialectic skill and more ironic ability than might have been thought possible for so young and so ardent a novice in controversy. On 24th March he remarried Harriet in London, probably in order to obvinte any question which might be raised as to the validity of the former ceremony, performed in Edinburgh according to Scottish law while he was still a minor In April his wife left him, as a friend of his expressed it, 'again a widower,' in May he sent after her a rather pathetic, if rather too submissive, appeal for the restoration of a regard which can hardly have ever been genuine or Soon afterwards he met the daughter of William Godwin, a novelist of unique rather than peculiar genius, but then more famous as a teacher and preacher of political and religious philosophies long since forgotten and never much more than derivative from France-the France of Diderot and Rousseau Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin and her future husband fell in love, by all accounts, at once —if not at first sight On 28th July they eloped to France, accompanied by Jane Clairmont, daughter of Mary's stepmother by a former husband 13th August Shelley wrote a singularly affectionate and simple hearted letter to the wife who had deserted him, inviting her to join them in Switzerland On 13th September they were again in England On 30th November Harriet Shelley gave birth, pre maturely, to a boy, and some friendly and kindly intercourse ensued between the alienated husband and wife. As soon as his own money matters became settled by arrangement with his father, he sent Harriet £200 to discharge her debts, and settled the same sum upon her annually in quarterly payments In February 1815 a baby girl was borne by Mary to Shelley, and died on 6th March On 24th January 1816 the little child so loved and Inmented in such lovely snatches of song by the father who had lost him was born, and called William, after the father of his mother the first poem of a great poet made its appearance in print. It was then that Shelley published Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude, and other Poems Before this he had shown himself to be a thoughtful, generous, fearless and fervent master of rhetoric in verse and prose, and assuredly He now stood forth as a poet nothing more comparable only with Coleridge and with Wordsworth, and not unworthy of such comparison

In May 1816 Shelley and Mary left England for Geneva—unhappily for all parties, again accompanied by Miss Clairmont, already the secret and unsuspected mistress of Lord Byron, who there met Shelley for the first time. The immortal Hymn to Intellectual Beauty, superior even to Spenser's fine poem on the same ideal subject, is a more memo rable record of this passing residence in Switzerland than the more rhetorical verses on Mont Blanc, fine and characteristic as they are In Septem ber Shelley and Miry neturned to England In December the body of Harriet Shelley was found in the Serpentine. Little is known of her life after her desertion of the husband who had left her amply and generously pro vided for, that little is not much to the poor girl's credit December 30th Shelley and Mary were married Westbrook, intent on imaginary profit to be made out of the guardianship of Harriets children, appealed to the Court of Chancery for legal license to retain charge of them, for Shelley had unhappily permitted them, at their mother's urgent entreaty, to remain under her care. On 27th March 1817 Lord Eldon gave judgment against Shelley, in temperate and considerate terms, from the orthodox and conventional point of view. In the same month Shelley published A Proposal for putting Reform to the Vote throughout the Kingdom His occasional pamphlets, unlike Milton's, are distin guished rather by good sense and right feeling than by eloquence or genius. He was now residing at Marlow, and his wife was engaged on her admirable and memorable romance of Frankenstein The record of his charities at this time, lavished on poorer and not less deserving or grateful recipients than Godwin and Peacock (another friend of much the same order as Godwin), would suffice to immortalise the legend of a saint. The splendid fragments of Prince Athanase, a poem originally named 'Pandemos and Urania,' were part of the occasional work too fitfully undertaken and too diffidently cast I rside during his residence at Marlow. The semilyrical narrative of Rosatinal and Heten, here begun, seems to have been afterwards finished under the instigation of his wife's unfortunate and uncritical advice. A better wife and a worse counsellor no poet and no mortal could have had. This poem, to which she referred in a letter as 'my pretty eclogue,' is doubtless more than pretty, but not sufficiently more than pretty to be beautiful, the story is 'forcible feeble,' and the style is less 'choicely good? than the reader has i right expect from ŧ great poct it his liasticst A far important more poem, Laon and Cythna, or The Re-olution of the Golden City Lision of the Nine teenth Century, appeared in 1818 When all deductions liave been mide from and claims, าไไ allowances line been made for its defects, The Revolt of Islam, as this poem was after wards. renamed. remains unassailable and unques tionable as a great magnificent and piece of work For the concep tion and composi tion of the story there certainly is gradual action and the final impression of the tragedy. The right epithet for this great work was given by Browning when he referred to it as 'the unrivalled Cenci'

On 12th November 1819 Percy Florence Shelley, the last of his ancient line, was born course of the same year his father had written the noble Mask of Anarchy-1 poem which might with equal justice be described as wise and foolish, passionate and temperate, puerile and manful, rational and preposterous, but in any case a great little masterpiece, Peter Bell the Third, a really humorous and fancifully extravagant improvisation of neither wholly just nor wholly unjust sature, and A Philosophical View of Reform (unfinished and unpublished), in which the central tenet of Quakerism was revived and proclaimed with all, if not more than all, the fervour of George Fox The value of Shelley's prose writings is almost purely subjective, they would have no interest whatever for any imaginable reader if they threw no light on the character which helped to shape and to colour, to modify and to quicken, the genius of a poet As a thinker, he was just and generous rather than original or profound, as a critic, he was sensitive and candid rather than intelligent or acute, and his style is generally rather than particularly good It is only as an interpreter of his own poeins, in the admirable introductions prefixed to the longer and more ambitious among them, that he appears as a writer of noble and memorable prose There are passages of singular beauty and felicity in his Defence of Poetry, but on the whole, though by no means deficient in thought or in truth, it is somewhat wanting in force and point. In the autumn of 1819, while engaged on the last act, or rather the lyric epilogue, of Prometheus Unbound, he was moved by the inspiration of external or phenomend nature at its highest pitch of harmony and passion to conceive and bring forth one of the supreme poems of all time-the Ode to the West Wind Such work is like the greatest work of his master, Coleridge-beyond and outside and above all criticism, all praise, and all thanksgiving personal cry of suffering and exultation and hope, of rapture and regret and futh, which thrills the matchless music of the verse as with the very throb of living blood, serves only to quicken and to deepen the effect of the sensuous and supersensual emotion impressed by the glory of nature when most joyous, and expressed in the splendour of song when most sublime Winter, the only season which seems to have been actually discomfortable to the singer of 'swift spring, and autumn, summer, and winter hoar,' drove Shelley from Florence to Pisa. The full and admirable biography, for which all students and lovers of poetry and of truth are inexpressibly indebted to the devotion and the ability of Mr Dowden, must be consulted for the details of the troubles brought upon his wife and himself by the exactions of so thankless a mendi cant as Godwin and the double dealing of so treacherous a friend as Byron The villainous lies of an infamous valet were hardly needed to heighten the passing bitterness of a troubled and uneasy time. It is a no less regrettable than imperative necessity to touch in passing on such vile matters and men in the very bracfest memoir of one of the noblest and purest imong all poets and ill In June Shelley moved from the para disc of Pisa to the purgatory of Leghorn in the neighbourhood of that unlovely seaport that the song of an immortal skylarl inspired i diviner song-the most perfect poem of its land in all the Between its claims and those of world of poetry the sister ode to the west wind no man or boy who can appreciate either will dream of choosing or desire to decide. Thence, too, was despatched the Letter to Maria Gisborne, a matchless model of nobly familiar verse and simply impeccable poetry Soon after completing his gracuful and vivid trans lation of the Homeric Himn to Hermes, he wrote in three days of August one of the most splendid existing poems of pure fancy and visionary rapture, The B ttch of Atlas The joyous and high spirited animation of all these little masterpieces is a suffi cient disproof of the pulpably preposterous if not wilfully malignant misconception which would lay to the charge of either the man or the poet a natural tendency to indulgence in 'a poor unmanly melancholy? No minor poet after the order of Horace or of Herrick ever struck such ringing and exulting notes of natural and noble jox in nature and in life The utmost enjoyment of such human linnets or finches, whose main or whose only business in poetry is the expression of self-complacent mirth and light hearted acceptance of easygoing life, is frint and dull to the deeper and higher delight of the skylark and the seamen, who can breast the wand at midnight or face the sun The matchless melody of the stanzas 'written in dejection, near Naples,' under severe if transient suffering of mind and body, has bewitched too many readers into belief that these most musi cal of all melancholy verses could be taken as the expression of something more than a passing mood, and the malignant or compassionate bigotry of critics averse from his opinions has naturally seized upon this imaginary evidence as a pretext for deploring their assumed effect on the happiness or the fortitude of the writer

In the spring of 1820 a successful rising of the Spanish nation against its villamous king moved Shelley to write his magnificent Ode to Liberty, a poem not unworthy to be named after Coleridge's ode on France—that unequalled if not unapproached masterpiece to which it was but natural and characteristic that Shelley himself should pay such tributary homage as he did with not more lovalty than justice. In the latter half of August he wrote the companion Ode to Naplis, hardly so complete and elaborate a poem, so perfectly composed and rounded off, but touched with a more intense radiance of imagery and a more passionate inspiration of music. noble righteousness of enthusiasm and fiery rectitude of faith there is no possible choice to be made between these three supreme examples of English lyrical poetry at its most ambitious and most indefatigable flight. To the record of this wonderful year it must regretfully be added that in the same month of August Shelley wrote his only poem which might reasonably be wished away are gleams of humour and touches of poetry in Swellfoot the Tyrant, but it is a blot, though an insignificant and all but imperceptible blot, on the otherwise unstained escutcheon of a poet who never published anything else which could seem, except in the eyes of prurient and malignant imbecility, liable to the charge of either unseemly or unjustified indulgence in a questionable exercise of ugly fancy or of angry fun To represent Wellington as a ruffinn drunk with blood was equally worthy of Byron and unworthy of Shellev

A casual acquaintance with a beautiful and sentimental if not hysterical young Italian Indy of rank, confined as a schoolgirl in a convent till a suitor should appear who would take her off her father's hands without a dowry, was the origin of the lovely dramatic idyl or elegy to which Shelley give the pretty and eccentric name of Epipsychidion Study of Dante's earlier poems had taught him the trick of personal allusion which gives a touch of perhaps objectionable obscurity and a note of certainly questionable ambiguity to the tone and the subject-matter of this curiously and magically fascinating rather than thoroughly satisfactory or exemplary poem No modern poet but Shelley would or could have struck so deep and so keen a note of poetic passion while weating a wholly fantastic embroidery of partly imaginary emotion about his actual sensations of sympathetic and compassionate affection for an effusive and attractive sufferer from social and conventional oppression To the poor girl who lived to endure the fate of the yet more surely immortal Pia de' Tolommei we owe the existence of a poem which is equally precious as a jewel of English poetry, whether the name of the 'noble and unfortunate lady' who inspired it was worthy or unworthy to be redeemed from oblivion into glory

In January 1821 Medwin introduced to Shelley an old schoolfellow, Edward Williams, who was next year to share with him the fellowship of death He and his wife, the charm of whose friendship and sympathy inspired some of the most magical poetry in the world, became easily and intimately friendly with Shelley and Mary During this winter Shelley suffered much from ill health, as any one might have expected who had earned it by constantly reading as he walked and stooping over his book till his back was too bent, as his friend Trelawny remembered, for the action of swimming to be practicable Unhappily he could not be wenned from his love of bonting, and a ducking in a canal between Leghorn and Pisa did not warn him to remember that he could not swim-it only gave one more proof of his dauntless and selfless nature. One of the most perfect among all poems that ever were left imperfect, 'The Boat on the Serchio,' commemorates this fatal and natural love or liking, and challenges a commentary as long or longer than the text to do anything like adequate justice to the charm of its various and spontaneous harmonies of change from pleasure in the Italian present to pleasure in the Etonian past, from joyous observation of nature to serious rapture of meditation, and again to an impassioned realism of landscape which can only be matched in the work of Dante, of Turner, and of Hugo In 1821 a poem which is one of the glories of English poetry was printed with French types and published at Pisa. A pamphlet or a book more beautiful without and within never came and never can come from any The execution of Adonais as a poem is all but impeccable, its highest passages are those in which the inspiration of the writer is least connected with the immediate subject of the elegy The introduction of Byron and Moore as mourners over the death of Keats would be the introduction of a burlesque or farcical element into a serious and tragic work of art if the absurdity of the fancy were not redeemed by the nobility of the verse. There are one or two singular oversights in the composition of a poem so elaborate and harmonious -a subsidence into debility of phrase at the close of a stanza, or a lapse into confusion of metaphor which makes nonsense of the allegory slips in style are less than spots on the sun have made elegy sublime—to have lifted it to the level of the ode by infusion of lyric life into the form of elegiac verse-was possible only to Milton and to Shelley And indeed Lycidas and Adonais are rather irregular odes than regular elegies, they have far more in common with the poetic work of Pindar than with the poetic work of Tibullus

In August 1821 Shelley visited Byron at Ravenna, and was disheartened as to his own work by his admiration for the newly written cantos of Don Juan-if not perhaps by the mere habit of intercourse with a man of genius so alien from his own, whom he could not but perceive to be equally absurd in theory as a critic and contemptible in Towards the end of the practice as a playwright month he returned to his wife at the Baths of Pisa At Ravenna Byron had proposed that Leigh Hunt, who had long been seriously ill, should come to Italy for his health and join with Shelley and himself in the establishment of a periodical in which each of the three contracting parties should publish all his original compositions and share alike in From Pisa Shelley wrote to the resulting profits Hunt an invitation conveying a proposal of which he characteristically declined to avail himself being equally unwilling to fetter his own freedom of expression as to matters of opinion, and to partake the profits which might be expected from the popular fame of By ron and the popular celebrity

Meantime in the autumn of this year he of Hunt threw off a splendid improvisation of imaginative and political poetry and sympathy in the lyrical The earlier part of this poem is drama of Hellas on a level with his very liighest work, the first two choruses, utterly different in poetic tone and move ment, are coequal in sublimity and purity of imagi-The passionate rapture of the one and the serene magnificence of the other make such music of spiritual harmony as only the greatest and the sanest among poets can strike and can sustain The justice done at once to the ideal Christ, and to the charm of the older creeds which were cast out by the triumph of Christianity, is as final and as perfect as the lesson so simply and so superbly set forth in the closing lyric of the poem The inter vening incidents are less remarkable for imagina tive invention than for the exquisite and noble charm of expression which invests them with more than merely fanciful or fantastic life, the astonish ing collapse of metre, of style, and of sense, in some of the irregular lyric passages, may be allowed to suggest the inference that not even the greatest poet can with impunity venture to cut limiself loose from the natural and eternal laws of song which refuse to verse the license of anarchy and self-will under penalty no less heavy than the forfeiture of security from shipwreck Liven such fascinating works of fancy as Arethusa and The Cloud and The Sensitive Plant cannot be classed with the poems in which their author has shown himself a great poet by the one indispensable test of poetic triumph, a consummate mastery of his instrument. Much less could his unlucky attempt at a tragedy on the unpromising subject of Charles the First, had it ever been unhappily completed on the lines on which it started, have been worthy of a place among even the least successful or memorable of his actual works Such golden and glorious frag ments as 'Marenglu' or 'The Woodman and the Nightingale' would always have been worth it all That the best of wives was the worst of counsellors is only too evident from the fact that Mrs Shelley encouraged him in thus ploughing the sand, and discouraged him from continuing to work on a poem which, even in its unfinished and fragmentary condition, is worthy of a place among the crowning works of its author and the crowning glories of English poetry, The Triumph of Lifethe swan-song, we may call it, of Shelley's 14th January 1822 Shelley first met the best friend of his few remaining days, and the best painter of his personality that has ever placed on record the impression made by the man-made in this instance on one of the manfullest of mankind-Edward John Trelawny He was now occupied on his translation from the Spanish of Calderon-a version as beautiful as his renderings of Greek and Italian poetry, which are sometimes remarkable for in accuracy, or as his translations from Goethe's Faust On 1st May Shelley and Williams, with their wives, took up their quarters in Casa Magni, 1

n house on the Bay of Spezza which Shelley had lired for the summer. On 2nd July Shelley had the pleasure of welcoming Leigh Hunt to Italy on his landing at Leghorn. His last days were spent in the service of this beloved friend, on whose behalf he extorted from Byron a naturally reluctant fulfilment of his plighted word. On 4th July Shelley and Williams went out in a yacht which had been built, against Frelawny's advice, on a model brought by Williams from England. On the 19th Trelawny recognised, in a body washed up on the beach, the mutilated corpse of Shelley

Among all Lighsh poets there is but one who can be named with the poet who recognised in Coleridge his ninster as a lyrist It is not in degree, but in kind, that they differ from all others No man ever born into the vorld can be named in the same breath with Shakespeare, but he was not Coleradge and Shelley of the same order as they The genius of Cole stand by thenisclies alone. ridge at its highest rose above the genius of any other poet on record in the special and distinctive qualities of the very highest poetry-creative imagination and coequal expression of the thing con-But in these qualities Sheller stands next to him, and not far off-either in power of conception, or in mastery of such verse as includes and combines the respective gifts of the painter, the musician, and the sculptor. And Coleridge, in a life more than twice the length of his disciple's, did not a twentieth part of the good work done by Shelley

From the 'Hymn to Intellectual Beauty'

Spirit of BEAUTY, that dost conscerate

With thine own huce all thou dost shine upon

Of human thought or form, y here art thou gone?

Why dost thou pass away, and leave our state,

This dim yest value of tears, yacant and desolate?—

Ask why the sunlight not for ever Weaves rainbows o er yon mountain river, Why aught should ful and fule that once is shown, Why fear and dream and death and birth Cast on the daylight of this earth Such gloom, why man has such a scope

No voice from some sublimer world hath ever
To sage or poet these responses given
Therefore the names of Demon, Ghost, and Heaven, Remain the records of their vain endeavour,
Frail spells, whose uttered charm might not avail to sever,
From all we hear and all we see,

For love and hate, despondency and hope !

Doubt, chance, and anywe see,
Doubt, chance, and mutability
Thy light alone, like mist o'er mountains driven,
Or music by the night wind sent Through strings of some still instrument,
Or moonlight on a unidnight stream,
Gives grace and truth to life's unquiet dream

Love, hope, and self esteem, like clouds depart
And come, for some uncertain moments lent
Man were immortal and omnipotent,
Didst thou, unknown and awful as thou art,
Keep with thy glorious train firm state within his heart.

Thou messenger of sympathies
That way and wane in lovers' eyes,
Thou that to human thought art nourishment,
Like darkness to a dying flame!
Depart not as thy shadow came Depart not, lest the grave should be,
Like hife and fear, a dark reality

From 'The Revolt of Islam,'

She saw me not—she heard me not—alone
Upon the mountain's dizzy brink she stood,
She spake not, breathed not, moved not—there was thrown

Over her look the shadow of a mood
Which only clothes the heart in solitude,
A thought of voiceless death —She stood alone
Above, the heavens were spread,—below, the flood
Was murmuring in its caves,—the wind had blown
Her hair apart, through which her eyes and forehead shone.

A cloud was langing o'er the western mountains,
Before its blue and moveless depth were flying
Grey mists poured forth from the unrestling fountains
Of darkness in the north—the day was dying—
Sudden, the sun shone forth, its beams were lying Like boiling gold on ocean, strange to see,
And on the shattered vapours which, defying
The power of light in vain, tossed restlessly
In the red heaven, like wreeks in a tempestuous sea

It was a stream of living beains, whose bank
On either side by the cloud's cleft was made,
And, where its chasms that flood of glory drank,
Its waves gushed forth like fire, and, as if swayed
By some mute tempest, rolled on her The slinde
Of her bright image floated on the river
Of liquid light, which then did end and fide—
Her radiant shape upon its verge did shiver,

Aloft, her flowing hair like strings of flame did quiver

I stood beside her, but she saw me not—
She looked upon the sea, and skies, and earth
Rapture and love and admiration wrought
A passion deeper far than tears or mirth,
Or speech or gesture, or whate er has birth
From common joy, which with the speechless feeling
That led her there united, and shot forth
From her far eyes a light of deep revealing,
All but her dearest self from my regard concealing

From 'Prometheus Unbound.'

The Earth

Ha! ha! the caverns of my hollow mountains,
My cloven fire crags, sound exulting fountains,
Laugh with a vast and inextinguishable laughter!
The oceans and the deserts and the abysses,
And the deep ur's unmeasured wildernesses,
Answer from all their clouds and billows, echoing after

They ery aloud as I do — 'Sceptred Curse, Who all our green and azure universe Threatenedst to muffle round with black destruction, sending

A solid cloud to rain hot thunder stones,
And splinter and knead down my children's bones,
All I bring forth to one void mass battering and blending—

'Until each crag like tower and storied column, Palace and obelish and temple solemn, My imperial mountains crowned with cloud and snow and fire,

My sea like forests, every blade and blossom Which finds a grave or cradle in my bosom, Were stamped by thy strong hate into a lifeless mire—

'How art thou sunk, withdrawn, covered, drunk up
By thirsty nothing, as the brackish cup
Drained by a desert troop, a little drop for all l
And from beneath, around, within, above,
Filling thy void annihilation, Love
Bursts in like light on caves cloven by the thunder ball!'

The Moon

The snow upon my lifeless mountains
Is loosened into living fountains,
My solid occans flow and sing and shine
A spirit from my heart bursts forth,
It clothes with unexpected birth
My cold bare bosom Oh! it must be thine
On mine, on mine!

Gazing on thee, I feel, I know,
Green stalks burst forth, and bright flowers grow,
And hving shapes upon my bosom move
Music is in the sea and air,
Wingèd clouds soar here and there,
Dark with the rain new buds are dreaming of
'Tis Love, all Love'

The Larth

It interpenetrates my granite mass,
Through tangled roots and trodden clay doth pass
Into the utmost leaves and delicatest flowers,
Upon the winds, among the clouds, 'tis spread,
It wakes a life in the forgotten dead,—
They breathe a spirit up from their obscurest bowers,

And, like a storm bursting its cloudy prison
With thunder and with whirlwind, has arisen
Out of the lampless caves of unimagined being —
With earthquake shock and swiftness making shiver
Thought's stagnant chaos, unremoved for ever — Till hate, and fear, and pain, light vanquished shadows, fleeing,

Leave Man, who was a many sided mirror
Which could distort to many a shape of error
This true fair world of things, a sea reflecting love
Which over all his kind—as the sun's heaven Gliding o'er occan, smooth, serene, and even—Darting from starry depths radiance and life, doth move—

Leave Man, even as a leprous child is left
Who follows a sick beast to some warm cleft
Of rocks through which the might of healing springs is poured,—

Then when it wanders home with rosy smile, Unconscious, and its mother fears awhile It is a spirit,—then, weeps on her child restored

Man,—oh! not men! a chain of linked thought,
Of love and might to be divided not,
Compelling the elements with adamantine stress

As the Sun rules, even with a tyrant's gaze, The unquiet republic of the maze

Of Planets, struggling fierce towards heaven's free wilderness

Man, one harmonious soul of many a soul,
Whose nature is its own divine control,
Where all things flow to all, as rivers to the sea,
Familiar acts are beautiful through love,
Labour and pain and grief, in life s green grove, Sport like time beasts,—none knew how gentle they could be !

His will, with all mean passions, bid delights,
And selfish cares, its trembling satellites,
A spirit ill to gnide, but mighty to obey,—
Is as a tempest wingled ship, whose helm
Love rules, through waves which dare not overwhelm, Foreing life's wildest shores to own its sovercign sway

All things confess his strength Through the cold imass Of marble and of colour his dreams pass,— Bright threads whence mothers weave the robes their children wear,

Language is a perpetual Orphic song
Which rules with dædal harmony a throng
Of thoughts and forms which else senseless and shapeless were.

The lightning is his slave, heaven's utmost deep Gives up her stars, and like a flock of slicep. They pass before his eye, are numbered, and roll on The tempest is his steed, he strides the air, And the abyss shouts from her depth laid bare, 'Heaven, hast thou secrets? Man unveils me, I have none.'

From 'Peter Bell the Third.'

He was a mighty poet and A subtle souled psychologist,
All things he seemed to understand
Of old or new, of sea or land—
But his own mind, which was a mist

I'llis was a man who might have turned liell into Heaven—and so in glidness A Heaven unto himself have carned But he in shadows undiscerned Trusted, and danned himself to madness.

He spoke of poetry, and how Divine it was—'a light—a love—
A spirit which like wind doth blow
As it listeth, to and fro,
A dew runed down from God above,

'A power which comes and goes like dream,
And which none can ever trace—
Heaven's light on earth—Truth's brightest beam'
And when he ceased there lay the gleam
Of those words upon his face.

Ode to the West Wind.

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being, Thou from whose unseen presence the leaves dead Are driven like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,

Yellow, and black, and pale, and heetic red, Pestilence stricken multitudes! O thon Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed

The winged seeds, where they he cold and low, Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine zure sister of the Spring shall blow Her clarion o er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air) With living hues and odours plain and hill,

Wild spirit which art moving everywhere, Destroyer and preserver, hear, oh hear 1

Thou on whose stream, 'mid the steep sky's commotion, Loose clouds like carth's decaying leaves are shed, Shook from the tangled boughs of heaven and ocean,

Angels of rain and lightning 1 there are spread On the blue surface of thine airy surge, Like the bright hair whilted from the head

Of some fierce Menad, even from the dim verge _Of the horizon to the zenith's height,
The locks of the approaching storm Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night Will be the dome of a vast sepulchre, Vaulted with all thy congregated might

Of vapours, from whose solid atmosphere Black rain, and fire, and hail, will burst Oh hear!

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams.
The blue Mediterranean, where he hay,
Lulled by the coil of his crystalline streams,

Beside a punitee isle in Bure's bry, And saw in sleep old princes and towers Quivering within the wave's intenser day,

All overgrown with azure moss, and flowers
So sweet the sense faints picturing them 1
Flou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers

Cleave themselves into chasms, while for below The sea blooms and the oozy woods which wear The sapless folinge of the ocean know

Thy voice, and suddenly grow grey with fear, And tremble and despoil theniselves. Oh hear?

۵.

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear,
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee,
A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share

The impulse of thy strength, only less free Than thou, O incontrollable! if even I were as in my boylood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over heaven,
As then, when to outstrip thy skiev speed
Scarce seemed a vision,—I would ne'er have striven

As thus with thee in prayer in iny sore need Oh! lift ine as a wave, a leaf, a cloud! I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed One too like thee—taineless, and swift, and proud

What if my leaves are falling like its own?

The tumult of thy mighty harmonies

Will take from both a deep autumnal tone, Sweet though in sadness Be thon, Spirit fierce, My spirit! Be thou me, impetious one! Drive my dead thoughts over the universe,

Like withcred leaves, to quicken a new birth,

And, by the incantation of this verse,

Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind, Be through my lips to nnawakened earth

The trumpet of a prophecy 1 O Wind, If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

From 'Adonais'

Peace, peace I he is not dead, he doth not sleep I
He hath awakened from the dream of life.

'This we who, lost in stormy visions, keep With phantoms an unprofitable strife,
And in mad trunce strike with our spirit's knife
Invulnerable nothings IVe decay
I ike corpses in a churnel, fear and grief
Convulse us and consume us day by day,
And cold hopes swarm like worms within our living clay

He has outsoared the shadow of our night
Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight,
Can touch him not and torture not again.
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is secure, and now can never mourn
A heart grown cold, a head grown grey, in vain—
Nor, when the spirit's self has ceased to burn,
With sparkless aslies load an unlamented urn

He lives, he wakes—'tis Denth is dead, not he,
Mourn not for Adonais.—Thou young Dawn,
Turn all thy dew to splendour, for from thee
The spirit thou lumentest is not gone!
Ye caverns and ye forests, cease to moan!
Cease, ye faint flowers and fountains! and, thou Air,
Which like a mourning veil thy scarf hadst thrown O'er the abandoned Earth, now leave it bare Even to the joyous stars which smile on its despair!

He is made one with Nature. There is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder to the song of night's sweet bird
He is a presence to be felt and known,
In darkness and in light, from herb and stone,
Spreading itself where'er that Power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to its own,
Which wields the world with never wearied love,
Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.

He is a portion of the loveliness
Which once he made more lovely He doth bear
His part, while the One Spirit's plastic stress Sweeps through the dull dense world, compelling there

All new successions to the forms they wear
Torturing the unwilling dross, that checks its flight,
To its own likeness, as each mass may bear,
And bursting in its beauty and its might
From trees and beasts and men into the heaven's light

The splendours of the firmament of time

May be eclipsed, but are extinguished not,

Like stars to their appointed height they climb,

And death is a low mist which cannot blot

The brightness it may veil When lofty thought

Lifts a young heart above its mortal lair,
And love and life contend in it for what Shall be its earthly doom, the dead live there,
And move like winds of light on dark and stormy air

The inheritors of infulfilled renown

Rose from their thrones, built beyond mortal thought

Far in the unapparent Chatterton

Rose pile, his solemn agony had not Yet faded from him, Sidney, as he fought,

And as he fell, and as he lived and loved,

Sublimely mild, a spirit without spot,

Arose, and Lucan, by his death approved,—

Oblivion as they rose shrank like a thing reproved

But whose transmitted effluence cannot die
So long as fire outlives the parent spark,
Rose, robed in dazzling immortality
'Thou art become as one of us,' they cry,
'It was for thee you kingless sphere has long
Swung blind in unascended majesty,
Silent alone amid an heaven of song
Assume thy winged throne, thou Vesper of our throng'

And many more, whose names on earth are dark,

Who mourns for Adonnis? Oh! come forth,
Fond wretch, and know thyself and him aright,
Clasp with thy panting soul the pendulous earth,
As from a centre, dart the spirit's light Beyond all worlds, until its spacious might Satiate the void circumference—then shrink
Even to a point within our day and night,
And keep thy heart light, lest it make thee sink,
When hope has kindled hope, and lured thee to the brink.

Or go to kome, which is the sepulchre,
Oh not of him, but of our joy 'I is nought
That ages, empires, and religions, there
Lie buried in the ravage they have wrought,
For such as he can lend—they borrow not Glore from those who made the world their prey,
And he is gathered to the kings of thought
Who waged contention with their time's decay,
And of the past are all that cannot pass away

Go thou to Rome,—at once the paradise,
The grave the city, and the wilderness,
And where its wrecks like shattered mountains rise,
And flowing weeds and fragrant copies dress
The bones of Desolation's nakedness,
Pass, till the Spirit of the spot shall lead
Thy footsteps to a slope of green access,
Where, like an infant's smile, over the dead
A light of laughing flowers along the grass is spread

And grey walls moulder round, on which dull Time Feeds, like slow fire upon a horry brand, And one keen pyramid with wedge sublime, Pavilioning the dust of him who planned This refuge for his memory, doth stand Like flame transformed to marble, and beneath A field is spread, on which a newer band Have pitched in heaven's smile their camp of death, Welcoming him we lose with scarce extinguished breath

Here pause These graves are all too young as yet
To have outgrown the sorrow which consigned
Its charge to each, and, if the seal is set
Here on one fountain of a mourning mind,
Break it not thou! too surely shalt thou find

Thine own well full, if thou returnest home,
Of tears and gall From the world's bitter wind
Seel shelter in the shadow of the tomb
What Adonais is why fear we to become?

The One remains, the many change and pass
Heaven's light for ever shines, earth's shadows fly,
Life, like a dome of many coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of eternity,
Until Death tramples it to fragments—Die,
If thou wouldst be with that which thou dost seek I Tollow where all is fled !—Rome's azure sky, Flowers, rains, statues, music,—words are weak the glory they transfuse with fitting truth to speak

Why linger, why turn lock, why shrink, my heart?
Thy hopes are gone before from all things here
They have departed, thou shouldst now depart!
A light is past from the revolving year,
And man and woman, and what still is dear
Attracts to crush, repels to make thee wither
The soft sly similes, the low wind whispers near
'Tis Adonais calls! O, hasten thither
No more let life divide what death can join together

That light whose smile kindles the innverse.

That beauty in which all things work and move,
That benediction which the celepsing curse.

Of birth can quench not, that sustaining I ove.
Which, through the web of being blindly wove.
By man and beast and earth and air and sea,
Burns bright or dim, as each are mirrors of.
The fire for which all thirst, now beams on me,
Consuming the last clouds of cold mortality.

The breath whose might I have evoked in song Descends on me, my spirit's barl is driven I ar from the shore, far from the trembling throng Whose sails were never to the tempest given The massy earth and sphered skies are riven! I am borne darkly, fearfully, aftr, Whilst, burning through the inmost veil of heaven, I he soul of Adonais, lil e a star, Beacons from the abode where the Eternal are.

Chorus

Worlds on worlds are rolling ever
From creation to decay,
Lile the bubbles on a river,
Sparkling, bursting, borne away
But they are still immortal
Who, through birth's orient portal

And death's dark chasm hurrying to and fro,
Clothe their unceasing flight
In the brief dust and light
Gathered around their chariots as they go
New shapes they still may weave,
New gods, new laws, receive Bright or dim are they, as the robes they last
On Death's bare ribs had cast.

A power from the unknown God,
A Promethean conqueror, came,
Like a triumphal path he trod
The thorns of death and shame
A mortal shape to him
Was like the vapour dim
Which the orient planet animates with light
Hell, sin, and slavery came,
Like bloodhounds mild and tame,
Nor preyed until their lord had taken flight
The moon of Mahomet
Arose, and it shall set
While, blazoned as on heaven's immortal noon,
The cross leads generations on

Swift as the radiant shapes of sleep
From one whose dreums are paradise
Fly, when the fond wretch wakes to weep,
And day peers forth with her blank eyes,
So fleet, so faint, so fair,
The powers of earth and air
Fled from the folding star of Bethlehem
Apollo, Pan, and Love,
And even Olympian Jove,
Grew weak, for killing Truth had glared on them
Our hills and seas and streams,
Dispeopled of their dreams,
Their waters turned to blood, their dew to tears,
Wailed for the golden years.

From 'The Triumph of Life'

Swift as a spirit linstening to his task Of glory and of good, the Sun sprang forth Rejo cing in his splendour, and the mask

Of darkness fell from the awakened earth The smokeless altars of the mountain snows Flamed above crimson clouds, and at the birth

Of light the ocean's orison arose,

To which the birds tempered their matin lay,
All flowers in field or forest which unclose

Their trembling eyelids to the kiss of day, Swinging their censers in the element, With orient incense lit by the new ray

Burned slow and inconsumably, and sent Their odorous sighs up to the smiling air, And, in succession due, did continent,

Isle, ocean, and all things that in them wear The form and character of mortal mould, Rise as the Sun their father rose, to bear

Their portion of the toil which he of old
Took as his own, and then imposed on them
But I, whom thoughts which must remain untold

Had kept as wakeful as the stars that gem. The cone of night, now they were laid asleep Stretched my faint limbs beneath the hoary stem

Which an old chesnut flung athwart the steep
Of a green Apennine Before me fled
The night, behind me rose the day, the deep

Was at my feet, and heaven above my head,— When a strange trance over my fancy grew, Which was not slumber, for the shade it spread

Was so transparent that the scene came through As clear as, when a veil of light is drawn O'er evening hills, they glimmer, and I knew

That I had felt the freshness of that dawn Bathe in the same cold dew my brow and hair, And sate as thus upon that slope of lawn

Under the self same bough, and heard as there
The birds, the fountains, and the ocean hold
Sweet talk in music through the enamonred air
And then a vision on my brain was rolled

As in that trance of wondrous thought I lay,
This was the tenour of my waking dream —
Methought I sate beside a public way

Thick strewn with summer dust, and a great stream Of people there was hurrying to and fro, Numerous as goats upon the evening gleim,—

All histening onward, yet none scenned to know Whither he went, or whence he came, or why He made one of the multitude, and so

Was borne amid the crowd as through the sky One of the million leaves of summer's bier Old age and vouth, manhood and infancy,

Mixed in one mighty torrent did appear Some flying from the thing they feared, and some Seeking the object of another's fear

And others, as with steps towards the tomb, Poured on the trodden worms that crawled beneath, And others mournfully within the gloom

Of their own shadow walked, and called it death, And some fled from it as it were a ghost, Half fainting in the affliction of vain breath

But more, with motions which each other crossed, Pursued or shunned the shadows the clouds threw, Or birds within the noonday ether lost,

Upon that path where flowers never grew,—
And, weary with vain toil and funt for thirst,
Heard not the fountains whose melodious dew

Out of their mossy cells for ever burst, Nor felt the breeze which from the forest told Of grassy paths, and wood lawns interspersed

With overtreining elms, and caverns cold,
And violet banks where sweet dreams brood,—but they

Pursued their serious folly as of old

And, as I gazed, methought that in the way The throng grew wilder, as the woods of June When the south wind shakes the extinguished day, And a cold glare, intenser than the noon

But my cold, obscured with blinding light
The sun, as he the stars Like the young moon

(When on the sunlit limits of the night Her white shell trembles amid crimson air, And whilst the sleeping tempest gathers might),

Doth, as the herald of its coming, bear
The ghost of her dead mother, whose dim form
Bends in dark ether from her infant's chair

So came a charrot on the silent storm
Of its own rushing splendour, and a Shape
So sate within, as one whom years deform,

Beneath a dusky hood and double cape, Crouching within the shadow of a tomb. And o'er what seemed the head a cloud like crape

Was bent, a dun and faint ethereal gloom Tempering the light Upon the chariot beam A Janus visaged Shadow did assume

The guidance of that wonder winged team

The shapes which drew it in thick lightenings

Were lost —I heard alone on the air's of stream

The music of their ever moving wings
All the four faces of that Charioteer Had their eyes banded Little profit brings

Speed in the van and blindness in the rear,

Nor then avail the beams that quench the sun

Or that with banded eyes could pierce the sphere

Of all that is, has been, or will be done So ill was the car guided—but it passed With solemn speed majestically on

Byron

George Gordon Byron, sixth Lord Byron of Rochdale, was born in Holles Street, London, 22nd January 1788. The original form of the name was Burun After the Norman Conquest the family held extensive property in Lancashire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire. The estate, however, that is most associated with the poet's name, Newstead, was granted to Sir John Byron by Henry VIII at the dissolution of the monasteries. The barony dates back to 1643, when Sir John Byron was created Lord Byron of Rochdale in recognition of his services to the Royalist cause. It was the poet's great uncle, the fifth lord—'the wicked Lord Byron'—who (born in 1722, and died in 1798) killed in an eccentric kind of duel his neighbour and relative Chaworth, the grandfather of Mary Chaworth, one of several girls who won the poet's boyish love, and yet, as some of his censors would say, had the good luck It was this same 'wicked to escape marrying him Lord' who sold the Lancashire estates the 'wicked' characteristics of the family blos somed vigorously in Byron's father, Captum John Byron After having seduced the Marchioness of Carmarthen, he borrowed her money, then eloped with her, then did what the world called making reparation to her-that is, completed his wrongdoing by binding her in marriage to a scamp like himself Of this marriage the only child who lived was Augusta, born in 1782, she died Between Byron and this as Mrs Leigh in 1851 lady there was a deep attachment, as some of the Captain Biron's second best of his poems show wife, Catherine Gordon, was Byron's mother, whom the captain married for her fortune from his mother, who was heiress of the Gordons of Gight, that Byron inherited that propensity to fat which, with his lameness and his impecuniosity, combined to form a life-drama of a peculiar and fantastic kind To his mother's irrational conduct may be traced many of the unfortunate incidents which flowed from these disasters When we consider that the malformation in his feet, with which from birth he was afflicted, could easily have been cured had it not been for his mother's amazing folly-first, in submitting him to the torturing hand of a quack, and, afterwards, in allowing him to run about, box like, when the feet were under proper medical treatment—the filial affection that he evinced towards her was one of the most charming of his characteristics. Often in Fate's awards there seems to be a vein of actual cynicism and fat and impecuniosity could not have worked more disastrously upon any man's heart and soul than they did upon Byron's In regard to his lameness, owing to his sensitivity upon the subject, an enormous deal has been written that need never have been written, and it is of a most contradictory Trelawny, for instance, in the first edition of his Recollections of Shelley and Byron, averred that Byron's two legs were withered at the knees This, as the present writer told Trelawny when he was living in Pelhani Crescent, some few years before his death, could not be for a moment believed by any man who knew what swimming meant, if the story of Byron's swimming the Helles pont is not a myth. To swim for any distance by striking out with only one leg is difficult enough, but to swim across the Hellespont without the use of legs is impossible. No doubt, however, the statement about the withered legs was a slip of Trelauny's pen, for afterwards, in the later edition of the Records, published in 1878, he says that the legs were not 'withered' at all, that the lameness was 'caused by the contraction of the back sinews preventing his heels resting on the ground and compelling him to walk on the fore part of his feet,' except this defect, according to frelanny's revised account of the matter, Byron's feet were perfect. The fict that there are many other descriptions by eve witnesses of his hine ness which do not in the least agree with either of Trelauny's contradictory statements, or with themselves, is another proof of the impossibility of learning the exact truth about anything concerning the personality of a man Byron has been dead hardly eighty years, and we do not know, and never shall know, how much and how little he suffered from lameness, and yet his lameness was the central fact of his life

Mrs Byron retired to Aberdeen, where she brought up her son on an income of £150 (afterwards £135) a year. To be born lame—to be obliged to starve one's self in order to keep " down one's fit-to pass one's childhood in the i tantalising atmosphere of the aristocratically connected family-to pass it there in penury, and afterwards to succeed to a poverty struck peerige " must needs have had an enormously disturbing and demoralising effect upon any character, unless the character were of a peculiarly heroic mould 1 But upon Byron, in whom personal vaniti and aristocratic prejudice were grote-quely combined with something of the hourgeois feeling about impecuniosity, its effect was disastrous-nearly rumous. As to imperumosity a man of the true patrician temper simply feels the inconvenience of want of money and chafes against it to him it never occurs, as it does to the fourgeois, that the accident of poverty is a disgrace. And yet Byron was patrician born and a poet to boot it is very curious

Seven years after his futhers death, on the decease of his great uncle, the fifth Lord Byron before mentioned, Byron during his minority succeeded to the peerage and became a ward of Chancery His mother took him to Lngland In 1801 he was sent to Harrow There is no room here to touch upon that period, except to remark that at school his attention seems to have been divided between scholastic studies and his desire, intensified if not originated by his lameness, to play the part of athlete, and that he even essayed to play cricket, though, according to one eye-witness, he was obliged to advertise the infirmity which cursed his life by engaging another boy to run for him In 1805 he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, he stayed there three years or thereabouts, and formed some important friendships. Here, too, he tried to play the part of athlete, and, handicapped b) spiteful destiny as he was, succeeded British art of sparring was then at the height of its glory, and his passion for emulation induced lum to patronise the ring-as he would have patronised anything that was fashionable, for, like his idol Bonaparte, he, while believing him self the despiser of human opinion, was the slave of it But at this early date another ambition seems to have seized him—the desire of appearing in print, although, according to Moore, his aspiration was to print a small volume and bring it out in the approved aristocratic way for private circulation. In November 1806 a volume of poems of his, called Fugitive Pieces, was published by Ridge of Newark. The volume was immediately suppressed by the advice of Byron's friend, the Rev. J. T. Becher, on account of the license of some stanzas in one of the poems. This was the poem '10 Mary,' a poem which shows how early the idea of posing as the wild oats sowing

LORD BYRON

From the Portrait (1825) by R Westall RA in the National Portrait Gallery

young gentleman-it one time sentimental, it another time cynical, whether Childe Harold, Conrad, Lara, or Don Juan-came to Byron rhyming often saves the young poet from doing the naughty things which songless youngsters actually do And, to be just to Byron, he seems to have been not very guilty of true erotic mischief a little foolish rhyming about it very It is, however, unpleasantly likely sayed him suggestive of Byron's indelicacy that the lady to whom he afterwards addressed The Dream, and whom he seems to have really loved, was named Mr Becher saved one copy of the book from destruction, and afterwards a few copies were reprinted for private circulition. It is singular how ignorant of the book writers upon Byron seem to be. As the great ambition of young men of Byron's class was to be the shining lights at such clubs as the Pugalistic, the Owls, or Fly by-Nights, Byron of course had to belong to these

It was this unfortunate weal ness of his clubs that led him to pretend to far more vice than he ever practised, and it is this that makes it so im mensely difficult to form a veil-based opinion upon the impulses of character that really and truly governed his life. At the time of life when in a general vay the true poet is listening to a music to which the fine gentlemanism of his time was deaf, he wanted to be thought not only a dandy lile Brummell, but a very wicked dandy regard to this volume Iugitive Pieces, it is to students of Byron as a metricist of special interest, because it vas in this very poem 'To Mary' that he showed a promise of metrical skill which, until he came to write in the congenial ollava rima, lic It is written in the stanza invented never fulfilled by Ben Jonson, and afterwards used by Lord Herbert of Cherbury, D. G. Rossetti, and finally by I ord Tennyson in In Memorium There is no more difficult stanza than this Owing to the rhymc-interval between the first line and the fourth, it suggests the slowness of movement of the Petrarchan quatrain, but the lines are too short to carry the stateliness of the sonnet. even Tennyson visible to reconcile the ear to its trotting effect. Coleridge, in the following quatrum in Christabel, showed us that the only way to remove this trotting effect is to hurry the movement from the first line to the fourth by cutting off the first syllable of the second and third lines, and so maling them trochaic

Yea, she doth smile and she doth veep, I if e a youthful bermitess, Beauteous in a wildernes, Who, praying always, prays in sleep

Yet, it must be said that Byron handles the metre with a certain amount of success

In 1807 appeared Hours of Idleness, 'a series of poems, original and translated, by George Gordon, 1 Lord Byron, a Minor,' containing a few of the poems from the suppressed volume, among which ' the objectionable lines 'To Mary' were not in The very name, Hours of Idleness, 15 an indication of the poet's besetting weakness-the desire to win the poet's crown, and yet to pretend that he was too much of a patrician to care to win it. It vas furiously attached (by Brougham, as Byron came to believe) in the Edinburgh Very likely the attack vas answerable for Byron's astonishing literary career The origin and composition of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, i hich was published about a year after the Edinburgh article, will explain vhy, as an attack upon the Edinburgh Review, the poem is a fraud About the time that he was publishing Hours of Idleness he had been engaged in writing a satire upon contemporary poets now took his satire from his desk, revised it, and prefived to it some vigorous abuse of Jeffrey, and after the lapse of several months had it printed. This is why there is so little said about

Scotch reviewers and so much about English Had Hours of Idleness fallen dead from the press, as it would otherwise have done, the partly-written satire upon contemporary poets might, indeed, have seen the light, but that too would have fallen dead. But an attack upon the redoubtable 'buff and blue' b a joung lord who showed that he was game at ole the sporting instinct in the public mind The attention it ittracted caused him at once to turn into literary channels the personal force and the passion of emulation in him which were so unconquerable, and which must have exercised themselves somewhere. Fuglish Bards and Scotch Reviewers did attract very considerable attention, and Byror saw that there i is a career before him as a satirist if not as a poct At that time touring over Europe vas still called 'travelling,' and still formed an important part of a patrician's educa-Poor as he was, he determined to travel, and, indeed, he seems to have liad a genuine zest for The ordinary route of the grand tourist as partially closed owing to the state of Europe brought about by the Napoiconic wars. He began to read about Persia and India and the Last generally, where he aspired to go. With money borrowed at an exorbitant rate of interest he left England on 11th June 1809, accompanied by an intimate friend, Mr Hobliouse (afterwards Lord Broughton), his valet Fletcher, his old butler Murray, and a son of one of his tenants, Robert Rushton The last of these represents the 'page' who figures in Childe Harold's Pilgrimage Byron vent to Spain, then to Malta, then to Greece and the Agean. For nearly two years he i as on the Continent, writing the first two cantos of Childe Harold After a while the butler and the page had been sent back to England from Gibraltar, and again, after a while, Hophouse had left him at Zea He then vent to Athens, and for about a vear passed through those adventures of romance and debauchery—some of which may be real, though most of them no doubt, are apocryphilwith which he perversely contrived to make his name associated. Fine gentlemanism in its every development is only another name for vulgirity, but it was unfortunate for Byron that he lived at a period when a peculiarly ofiensive form of the sulgarity in question, that of the Regence, was in vogue. Almost every "rong thing that he did came from his desire to show off the vices of the man of fashion. At that time gentil ty and devilry were synonymous terms. Among the stories con cerning his adventures on the Continent which he allowed to be circulated vas one to the effect that during this time he rescued a girl from being sewn up in a sack and thrown into the sea for infidelity to her master The story (which forms the subject of The Giaour) may be apocryphal, as are so many stories about Byron, but he was full of the passion of adventure, and had physical courage enough for anything

After his return to England he showed to his friend Dallas, at the end of October 1811, in his lodgings in St James' Street, his paraphrase of the Ars Poetica ('Hints from Hornce') Dallas asked him if he had not any other thing to show, he confessed to having written two cantos of Childe Harold, a poem of which he had great It seems, from Dallas's account, to have been with the greatest hesitation that he ventured upon publishing them Their success was prodigious. They had not been in the market many days when he woke one morning and found himself famous. Defective as these two cantos are, it should not be a matter of surprise to the student of poetry that the poem was a great success. The original name of the poem was Childe Burun, which he only changed to Childe Harold by the advice of friends Therefore to deny, as he afterwards did, that he intended the hero to be taken for himself was idle. As to the wild oats sowing at Newstead, however, which figures in Childe Harold, this, it may be assumed, was of the same imaginary kind as the 'sowings' described in the lines 'To Mary' Very likely the only one among the wild and lawless things enumerated in the poem achieved by Byron and his companions was drinking wine from the skull of a monka very cheap exploit and very silly knew through that instinctive sagacity which was one of his many endowments, that with the rank-worshipping Anglo Saxon race there is no idea so fasciniting as that of a young nobleman sowing his wild onts, and that this idea becomes still more fascinating when the young nobleman can be exhibited in a state of pensive melancholy on account of the harvest All the women and many of the men went mad about the mysterious hero of the poem. Women are more enslaved by vogues than are even men, and Byronism spread over the land like a fever among them Caroline Lamb's infatuation was perhaps no more wonderful than that of the 'White Lady' who, after his death, haunted Newstead, described by Washington Irving Apart from the poorness of the thought and the commonness of the verbal texture of the verses, Childe Harold, from the metrical point of view, is of little worth hold no place among the important poems of the It is a first principle of metrical art that whenever the struggle becomes very apparent between the metrical bars of any passage and that natural emphasis of thought or emotion which we call the sense rhythm, there is artistic failure. Hence, although fine poets will sometimes ignore the great subject of harmony between metre and motive, yet the history of poetry shows that without this harmony no poem-not even a strong poem in other respects-can take its place as a classic. In choosing the Spenserian stanza for Childe Harold, By ron would have been no doubt quite right if he could only have mastered the metre. The music of this stanza, though elegiac—the music common to all decasyllabic quatrains—is rendered far more subtle than that of Gray's Elegy (for instance) by the fourth line being made to rhyme with the fifth and seventh, and by the closing Alexandrine. In fact, the structure is so elaborate that, like the sonnet of octave and sestet, the Spenserian stanza will admit scarcely any complexities of syntax, scarcely any inversions, and scarcely any enjambement. If these artistic licenses are indulged in, as they are in Byron's Spenserians, the power of the Alexandrine at the close is lost, and the entire stanza becomes a schemeless tangle of nine rhymed lines.

Byron was never able to counteract the involution of the rhyme arrangement by achieving the simplicity of syntax before alluded to, and by throwing an unequivocal stress on the rhyme This is why in Childe Harold the poetic life, such as it is, in each stanza seems struggling and iridescent, as a fish in a net Why, then, had so defective a poem as Childe Harold so enormous a vogue? This is not so difficult a question to answer as at first it appears to be. Childe Harold depicts a character which seems to be real, and tells a life story in a peculiar way. Apart from the fact that it was published at a time when eyes of a painful and passionate anxiety were directed to the Continent, there is in the poem itself something that may be called new in the poetic literature of England, or, rather, there is a blending of two different kinds of poetry that had never been so successfully blended before Between the personal outpourings of the lyrist and those other kinds of poetry which may, perhaps, be classified as objective, there are many points of difference, and perhaps none of them is more notable than this, that while in the case of the writer of objective poetry the only question that can without impertinence be asked concerning the poet's work is simply 'Is it good?' in the case of the lyrist it is not only legitimate to inquire (within decent bounds) under what circumstances was the work produced, but such an inquiry adds an enormous interest to the poem A poem addressed to 'Thyrza,' for instance, may be beautiful in itself, and very fascinating, even though 'Thyrza' be, as Moore declared, an abstraction, but if it is believed by the reader that the Thyrza addressed was a real womana lovely girl, say, of humble life, who passionately loved a poet of superior rank, and whom the poet passionately loved-the poem seems to come straight from the bereaved poet's heart, and consequently what before was interesting becomes more interesting still. And suppose the reader were to believe, as Professor Minto believed, that the lovely girl in question had wandered with the poet dressed as his foot-page, how absorbing then does the interest become! For although lyrical poetry, like all other poetry, is an art, it should always seem to be inspired by an emotional every light and shade of tenderness, intelligence, languor, passion—mixed, of course, with scorn. The last was a very important element of Byron's success. The poet knew well how mankind loves to be scorned. To add to the charms of this adored and adorable creature, it was generally believed that he was the most unhappy being then in London, and that this unhappiness was remorse on account of certain mysterious, immoral escapades with women, European and Asiatic

This melancholy of Byron's has been much Not only Lady Byron, but Goethe, discussed Scott, Madame de Stael, and many others seem to have taken it seriously-seem to have believed that it was the basis of his nature we of a later date have ample evidence of the way in which Byron posed as being unhappy, consequently his misery does not wring our hearts as it wrung the hearts of our grandfathers and grandmothers. We know that some years after this period of his great London triumph, when he was sitting for his bust to Thorwaldsen, a suggestive dialogue took place between the two Byron placed himself opposite to the sculptor, but at once began to put on a different expression from that usual to him Thorwaldsen asked him to sit still, and said, 'You need not assume that look.' 'That is my expression,' said Byron When the bust was finished he said, 'It is not at all like me my expression is more unhappy? We further know that at a still later date, when West was painting him at Leghorn, the poet assumed a countenance that did not belong to him, 'as though,' said West, 'he were thinking of a frontispiece for Childe Harold' unhappiness of the man who is anxious that his unhappy expression should be secured in his portruit does not cause us to feel very anxious about him If, however, he was so unhappy as he seemed, it should always be remembered in regard to man that his chief sign of being superior to other creatures is his genius for being unhappy, and that, while the physical conditions which can make a human being comfortable are few, the physical conditions that can make him miserable are countless they may be leanness, fatness, lack of height, excess of height, but very likely fut is the most potent of all. No wonder, then, that the main causes of Byron's misery seem to have been fit and shortness of money With regard to fat, he, with a heroic self-restraint such as vanity alone can command, set to work to reduce it, and although he did undoubtedly live in pre Banting days, he managed in a degree to keep it down by living mainly upon biscuits and sodn-water, but it is very likely that his remedies weakened his constitution, robbed it of its power of resisting the attacks of disease, and so shortened Of course, lind it not been for Byron's colossal vanity, the tragedy of fat would not have been so appalling, but it made his life a kind of martyrdom Melancholy, however, is very much a matter of contracted habit If Byron had not been lame, and if he had not had the predisposition to fit, and if he had been born to means adequate to the expectation of rank and position, there is no reason to suppose that we should have heard so much about his melancholy. Such an anomalous position as that in which Byron found himself would surely have made any man melancholy, and such a masterfulness and pride as Byron's would have intensified it. For a man so proud as Byron to be obliged to expose at every turn the impecuniosity that he felt so keenly must have been a very bitter experience it should not be forgotten that when Byron's impecuniosity came to an end, and he had as much money as he needed, his melancholy seems to have been considerably modified, if we are to believe Leigh Hunt, who depicts him at Pisa while writing Don Juan in the least of melancholy moods, dressed in the jaunty fashion suited to the writing of such a jounty poem, lounging about in the courty and, and singing an air out of Rossini

It must not be supposed, however, that Byron's detachment and theiturnity were less fascinating than his melancholy and his amours and supposed There is no doubt whatever that silence really is as golden as the proverb affirms it to be, it is a mistake to suppose that in society women are impressed as men are by brilliant talkers When Lady Morgan speaks of Byron as cold, silent, and reserved, she enumerates the very qualities which impress women most to have been this kind of detachment and difficulty of finding the small-talk of the drawing-room that had so much to do with Napoleon's power of overawing women. Byron, of course, had native wit enough to be a brilliant society man detachment, however, did not come from any subtle design, it was the result of intense self consciousness and egoism Of every poet it may, fortunately, be said that his mind to him a kingdom is, and that the smaller the poet the bigger to him seems that kingdom satisfaction with his own kingdom saves him, as a rule, from society-worship. But Byron was an exception to this generalisation, he was not content to reign over his little kingdom craved the recognition of the fashionable world Hence his desire to figure as the young lord suffering from the terrible satiety that follows hedonism, wandering over Europe and painting all the scenes through which he wandered. And it must be remembered that what the public loves its poets to show is poetic melancholy, or, rather, poetic 'sourness of temper' It was Carlyle who said that Byron was 'only a sulky dandy,' on the other hand, an admirer of the Chelsea sage himself spoke of him as 'scowling at the century' Both Byron and Carlyle knew how dearly the nineteenth century loved to be scowled at, and, except Carlyle, there never was a more accomplished scowler than Byron Lady Caroline Lamb tells us that tantly comes forward in favour of Byron is Among all the tests of a Trelawny himself gentleman this is an infallible one the gentleman is the only man who 'can be travelled with;' especially, he is the only man one can go to sea with without a certainty of disaster Trelawny is perfectly conscious of this. 'Few friendships,' says he, 'can stand the ordeal by water, when a vacht from England with a pair of these thus tried friends touches, say, at Malta or Gibraltar, you may be sure that she will depart with one only.' And the reason is obvious, for, says he, with his usual politeness to the sex, 'You never know a man's temper until you have been imprisoned in a ship with him, or a woman's until you have married her? And now see what he says about Byron 'I never was on shipboard with a better companion than Byron, he was generally cheerful, gave no trouble, assumed no authority, uttered no complaints, and did not interfere with the working of the ship, when appealed to he answered,"Do as you like" How many companions of this kind are there in this island?' Therefore the failure of the Byron marringe was not, as his been so often assumed, brought about by the fact of Byron's not having been a gentleman

Marringe generally either makes or mars a man It seems quite clear that if Byron had made his selection from the whole fashionable world of London he could not have made a more unfortunate choice. The great charm of English patrician women, marking them off from the middle class, is that 'cheery pessimism' before alluded to, in which there is a certain soupçon of Bohemianism This may, perhaps, in a general was make them more adapted to be the companions of a poet than the daughters of the bourgeouse In Biron, as in Sheller, there was a great deal of Bohennanism, and he tied himself in wedlock to the most strait Liced and priggish woman in the whole fashionable world of the Regency most worthy and respectable lady she was, no doubt, but she was steeped in a peculiar atmosphere of bourgeois Puritanism—the only woman, perhaps, who was so steeped in the whole Melbourne set, or, indeed, in the whole patriciate of that time Disaster was mevitable, irritation between them soon began. The squalid impecumosity into which Lady Byron found herself plunged must have been one cause. On 15th November Byron was obliged to sell his library There were nine executions in the house in the space of twelve months. But here again fat, we may be sure, formed an integral part of the tragedy It was impossible for a man like Byron whose diet, owing to his propensity to fit, was obliged to be biscuits and soda water, to dine dix after day with a lady who seems to have liad what another husband might have called 'a pleasing perchant for food! Very irritating must this 'pleasing feneral to have been to a starting man with the perfume of the lady's rich viands in his nostrils. In an equal degree must have suffered the poor lady who was soon obliged to take her meals alone.

On the 10th of December of the same year Lads Byron gave birth to a daughter, who was christened Augusta Ada. On the 16th of the following January she went with the child, with the consent and, indeed, wish of Byron, to stay with her relations at Kirkby Mallor. Byton was to follow her there. but before this could be he received intimation of the movement for separating him from his uife. On the 2nd of February a proposition was made to him by Lady Byron's father, Sir R Noel, that there should be an amicable separation Byron at first flath refused to consent to this, but at last yielded, still cherishing the hope that there would eventually be a reconciliation. The actual charges brought against Byron by his wife That they were have always been a mystery grave, very grave, is made evident by the attitude of both Lushington and Romilly Let the mystery rest What is it all to us, to whom the poet has given Don Juan, the Ission of Judgment, and Buppos Up to quite lately the inquisitive ones have been thinking that some further light would be thrown upon this matter, for it was said that Lord Broughton drew up 'a full and scrupulously accurate account' of the affair, intending to publish it, but yielded to the pressure brought to bear upon him by friends of the families, and withheld it. At his death he bequeathed one copy of the document to his daughter (Lady Dorchester) and the other to the trustees of the British Museum, with a mass of unpublished letters, with directions that it was not to be made public until 1900. This time has since expired, but the papers disclosed nothing about Byron, and so the matter remains mystery rest we repeat-rest unsolved

Then came that grotesque revolt of the society butterflies which was certain to come sooner or He who had been adored was now ostracised by the senseless crowd who had adored him-adored him for the very vices which, as ther now alleged, caused them to shun him Some of the same ladies who, according to the Countess Guiccioli, used to send him letters offering themselves to him on any terms-letters of which that lady, as she told Lord Malmesbury, possessed a box full-would now pour out of a room with shuddening shoulders and faces aghast as soon as he entered it. Byron was such a worldling that one cannot give him the sympathy that would have been given to another poet. The true poet indeed, has no place in that galler Ever since the accession of George the First, the English bere moude, which under the Tudors and the Stewarts was more brillian, and artistic than any other Court societ in Europe, has been annexed by Philistia, and never was it more contempable than under the Regence What the ignorant, martistic, fashionable corld of England have the world believe. In 1822 Shelley was drawned and Byron, Irchwny, and others were p esent at the cremation of the body on the shore Fon what Irelanny told the present writer, Byron on this occision comported limitelf in the mirror that was to be expected of him this time livron joined Leigh Hunt in a newspaper called the Liberal which was a failure same year he left Pisa for Genoa, and there pur sued his literary labours, still with unswerring energy. During the seven years that chapsed from his abandonment of England to his death, tac nort he produced was enormous in quan If the quality had been equally great, his position among the nineteenth century poets would not have been the uncertain one that he now holds. For in regard to the question of quantity and quality poetic critics seem to be divided Some contend that there are two kinds of poetic genus—the senius which has the power of expressing itself in quintessential forms, and the senius which, licking this power, manifests itself in markellous fecundity, producing a kind of literature more diffuse, but still of a comparatively high class Others iffirm that in poetry quality is everything, quantity nothing—that the few fragments which we have of Sappho will be as fresh as when they were first written centuries after Byron's mass of work so much of which is only second rate, has been forgotten. The third and fourth cantos of Childe Harold, however, written at this time, are greatly superior to the first and second cantos, but even here Byron shows no power of 'using the sieve for noble words' which Dante speaks of If there is invitrath in the canon of criticism that 'while eloquence is heard, poetry is over heard,' these two cantos consist of eloquence rather than of poetry. Let so rich is our literal ture that in any other poetry save that of Gregoe and that of England it would take a high rank The vorl at this period included many of his dramas Marfrel, Cair, Marino Faliero The

if he knew did he really enjoy that solitary communing with Nature in her holiest moods, in her most secret recesses, of which he talks so much? It is true that no man without having passed some important period of his life with Nature alone, undisturbed by the distractions of an active social life, ever yet got from her all that she has to give But had Byron such an experience? Upon the question of solitude and its effects upon his mind he has been very voluble, but whether solitude is good for man or harmful depends upon individual character Whether among the beauties and wonders of Nature man's soul eats poison or wholesome food depends upon the soul that feeds Where there is health of body-where there is a clean memory, a well-stored mind, and a genuine passion for Nature-solitude, either in those leafy dingles of England whose fascination when fully known makes this island the Paradise of the world, or by the seashore or among the great European hills, widens the soul and makes tender the heart But upon Byron's frivolity and cynicism, or affected cynicism, it had no influence apparently, he remained a worldling to the last. His love of the sea, however, was genuine And no wonder, for while swimming in the ocean billows the lame man was a true athlete and no sham. On deck the martyr to fat was no more trammelled by fleshly conditions than other men

It is impossible to exaggerate the slovenliness of Byron's work at the worst, it is bid enough in his rhymed verse, but in his blank verse it is intolerable. Yet, as regards the best portion of his poetry—that written in the ottava rima some of our most thoroughly equipped critics are apt to do him less than justice. In comparing him with Coleridge, Shelley, and Keats, we should not forget that there are two kinds of 'narrative poetry' The temper of the one is idealistic, the temper of the other is realistic. In the former kind of narrative the poem depends largely upon the beauty of the poetic form, as in fulian and Maddalo, The Revolt of Islam, The Eve of St Agnes, Isabella, Lamia, and especially in Christabel In the latter it depends upon a more externally truthful representation of the life of Nature and the life of man, as in Marmion and as in the serious portions of Don Juan In its own line Don Juan is as successful as are the poems of Coleridge, Keats, and Shelley in theirs fuan does exactly what it sets out to do, it competes with prose narrative in lucidity and in truthfulness of representation, and yet it remains a To demand also that it shall be steeped in the moonlight magic of Christabel, or in the rich poetic dyes of Keats's Lamia or Eve of St Agnes, is as absurd as to demand that these last-named poems should touch life as closely as Don Juan touches life In such a richly coloured picture of fury life as that going on in Madeline's moonlit chamber the puerile talk of the lovers is not, and should not be, challenged by any true reader of poetry, but in a poem so closely touching life as Don Juan such talk would seem imbecile. The Vision of Judgment and Don Juan are ebullient of life. They have all the idiomatic spring of living speech, and yet, deficient as they are in artistic excellence, they are not, as we have said, so deficient as to be undeserving of the name of poetry

In that debatable land between poetry and prose where the poetic sieve is not used, Byron has no peer save Scott, and although his imagination was immeasurably behind Scott's, there are passages in Don Juan which show the genuine seeing power The shipwreck scene is one of these That this famous scene is not comparable with such concentrated vision as is found in Shakespeare's sea painting in the opening of The Tempest is true. The sea-painting in The Ancient Mariner, too, is so far above it that the two pictures can scarcely be com-But it is not enough to say against Byron's sea-picture that the scenic business was a mere collection of actual recorded incidents which had occurred in actual shipwrecks, a man without an imagination or with a feeble imagination might have collected all these details, and might have marshalled them with as much dexterity as Byron has done, and yet have failed to fuse them-have failed to inform them with dramatic life say, therefore, as so many critics have said, that Byron was without imagination would be wrong, though it would be right to say that his imagination was not of the first class. And the episode of Haidée which follows the shipwreck is so beautiful and so full of life that it is difficult to imagine the time when it will not be read with the deepest interest. Underlying all the cynicism and disagreeable swagger which is so offensive in Don Juan, Byron shows in this episode (and shows, perhaps, for the first time) that he had a true feeling for the pathos of woman's relations to man -her trustfulness, her ignorance of masculine guile and sin, the fatality that attends her love when she gives, as she so often does give, more than she receives And yet even here the reader, perhaps, feels that the good work as regards the use of the sieve for noble words' ought to have been better

It would be hard to exaggerate the splendour and triumph of Don Juan And here we touch upon the very core of Byron's poetic work mere fact that almost all the best portion of that work is written in ottava rima, the stanza which especially lends itself to the use of a diction common to verse and prose, is alone sufficient to indicate his place among poets Every stanzaic arrangement of lines, as has been said in discussing Childe Harold, has its metrical meaning, the instinctive understanding of which is necessary to every poet who works in it. Although Fairfax and Kerts and others have used the ottava rama for entirely serious poetry, its metrical motive is what may be called jountiness, and this makes it very himself, he succumbed, and he died 19th April in that year. His body was brought to England and buried close to Newstead, in the little church of Hucknall-Torkard.

.If the time is not even yet come for speaking with any confidence as to Byron's final place in the poetical literature of England, it is because the force which may be called the genius of personality is as effective for a time in keeping a poet alive as the most perfect exercise of artistic In the popular imagination he is still, as a figure, more striking than any other in the galaxy of illustrious poets among whom he lived And even among people of culture, though a deal of the magic associated with his name has faded away, a considerable remnant of that magic is vital still To that great mass of intelligent people who read prose with avidity, but who read poetry only under the stress of the voice of authority, Byron is the only name among the poets of his period who is known at all, unless we except Scott, whose fame as a poet gains enormously by his fame as a prose writer Any fresh incident connected with Byron's life, any fresh anecdote related concerning him, is at once circulated in every newspaper and read with avidity, not by students of poetry merely, but by people to whom the names of Coleridge, Shelley, Wordsworth, and Keats are mere names critics still explain this by affirming that Byron's poetry is finer than that of his contemporaries, but these are few and of very little importance, for Ruskin, with all his genius, was an extremelybad critic of poetry By far the larger number of critics, and these are among the best equipped, now hold the opposite opinion—the opinion so strenuously put forward vears ago by Landor Some, indeed, go so far as to affirm that Byron's verse is not poetry at all, but a third something between poetry and prose. The view taken by the present writer is midway between these two

It is not necessary to go to the length of Landor in depreciation of the poet in order to see how excessive are Matthew Arnold's laudations of him Arnold goes even so far as to speak of him in the same breath with Dante

In criticising Byron it must never be forgotten that there is the poetry of art and the poetry of impulse, and that the great masters have both. No competent English critic, except Matthew Arnold, has ever claimed for Byron that he is to be ranked among the great misters. And Arnold's exaggerated estimate of Byron's poetry may very likely be traced to his reverence for the opinion of Goethe. There is every reason for understanding, without accepting, Goethe's views upon this subject. Apart from the fact that no foreigner can really judge of the finer and more subtle effects of English poetic-art, it must be remembered that the countrymen of Goethe do not use the words Dichtkunst, Dichtung, and Dichter in exactly the same way as English critics use the corresponding words 'poetic art,' 'poetry,' and 'poet' In England the idea of perfect artistic verse is always included in the idea of poetry

Now, although much of Byron's work is only poetry in solution, and suffers terribly when it is criticised as poetry, it can be fairly and justly estimated under the head of Dichtung Dichtung can include a vast mass of material which, according to the English definition of the word poetry, can only be called 'worldly verse.' This is why, notwithstanding certain recent well-meaning and praiseworthy efforts to reinstate Byron in the position he once held, his rank in the courts of universal criticism still remains, and will always remain, below that of his five great contemporaries

Moreover, this has to be said, that brilliant as is his best work-Don Juan, the Vision of Judgment, and Beppo-it would be difficult to say what is the message to his fellow-men of a poet whom such work represents Not that we can expect any poets to be fully adequate to these modern ages of the world Yet it is the artist's paramount duty to represent, not, indeed, the accidental forms, but the temper and the spirit of his time. To perform this duty in the grand but simple age of Pericles, to perform it in the age of Dante and even in the age of Shakespeare, there was requisite not much more than poetic genius, to perform it in the time of Byron something more was required, something which is not commonly found alongside the power of song save in the greatest namesthe wide intelligence and the keen sagacity that enable men to pierce through the complex conventions beneath which the heart of the age palpitates at one time as much as at another, and to see, even in the darkest days, where lies that eternal core of beauty of which, as Spenser teaches, physical beauty is but the type and the token-to see that, in the deepest of all senses, 'Beauty is truth, truth beauty' Shelley taught, in the Prometheus Unbound, the sublimity of resignation before those great inscrutable powers -conscious or unconscious-in the grip of which Man is and must always remain helpless Wordsworth taught the noble effects upon the human mind and soul of grzing into the eyes of Nature as she lies dreaming of Man's destiny Coleridge, although he in his more precious work like the Ancient Mariner, Christabel, and Kubla Khan, cannot be said to have taught, or to have attempted to teach, any set ethical lesson, yet, inasmuch as his beautiful pictures impress the mind with the near presence of those powers of the unseen world which govern, while they seem not to govern, all that is seen, suggests, perhaps, a truth that is greater than all taught a kind of Sufistic beauty-worship which is far more profound in its teaching than is generally His words above quoted remind us supposed that even his, the most purely artistic of all

From 'The Island,'

Young Neuha plunged into the deep, and he Follow'd her track beneath her native sea Was as a native's of the element. So smoothly-bravely-brilliantly she went, Leaving a streak of light behind her heel, Which struck and flash'd like an amphibious steel. Closely, and scarcely less expert to trace The depths where divers hold the pearl in chase, Torquil, the nurshing of the northern seas, Pursued her liquid steps with heart and ease Deep-deeper for an instant Neuha led The way-then npward soar'd-and as she spread Her arms, and flung the foam from off her locks, Laugh'd, and the sound was answer'd by the rocks. They had gained a central realm of earth again, But looked for tree, and field, and sky, in vain Around she pointed to a spacious cave, Whose only portal was the keyless wave, (A hollow archway by the sun unseen, Save through the billows' grassy veil of green, In some transparent occan holiday, When all the finny people are at play,) Wiped with her hair the brine from Torquil's eyes, And elapp'd her hands with joy at his surprise, Led him to where the rock appeared to jut, And form a something like a Triton's hut, For all was darkness for a space, till day Through clefts above let in a sobered ray As in some old cathedril's glimmering aisle The dusty monuments from light recoil, Thus sadly in their refuge submarine The vault drew half her shadow from the scene.

Stanzas to Augusta

Though the day of my destiny's over,
And the star of my fate hith declined,
Thy soft heart refused to discover
The faults which so many could find,
Though thy Soul with my grief was acquainted,
It shrunk not to share it with me,
And the Love which my Spirit hath painted
It never hath found but in Thee

Then when Nature around me is smiling,
The last smile which answers to mine,
I do not believe it beguiling,
Because it reminds me of thine,
And when winds are at war with the ocean,
As the breasts I believed in with me,
If their billows excite an emotion,
It is that they bear me from Thee

Though the rock of my last hope is slivered,
And its fragments are sunk in the wave,
Though I feel that my soul is delivered
To pain—it shall not be its slave.
There is many a pang to pursue me
They may crush, but they shall not conteinn,
They may torture, but shall not subdue me,
"Tis of Thee that I think—not of them

Though human, thou didst not deceive me,
Though woman, thou didst not forsake,
Though loved, thou forborest to grieve me,
Though slander'd, thou never couldst shake,
Though trusted, thou didst not disclaim me,
Though parted, it was not to fly,
Though watchful, 'twas not to defame me,
Nor, mnte, that the world might belie.

Yet I blame not the world, nor despise it,
Nor the war of the many with one
If my soul was not fitted to prize it,
'Twas folly not sooner to shun
And if dearly that error hath cost me,
And more than I once could foresee,
I have found that, whatever it lost me,
It could not deprive me of Thee.

From the wreek of the past, which hath perished,
Thus much I at least may recall,
It hath taught me that what I most cherish'd,
Deserved to be dearest of all
In the Desert a fountain is springing,
In the wide waste there still is a tree,
And a bird in the solitude singing,
Which speaks to my spirit of Thee

Fare thee Well!

Fare thee well! and if for ever,
Still for ever, fare thee well!
Even though unforgiving, never 'Gainst thee shall my heart rebel Would that breast were bared before thee
Whiere thy head so oft hath lain,
While that placed sleep came o'er thee
Which thou ne'er canst know again

'Twas such a night!
'Tis strange that I recall it at this time,
But I have found our thoughts take wildest flight
Even at the moment when they should array Themselves in pensive order

Julia's Letter

'They tell me 'tis decided you depart
'Tis wise—'tis well, but not the less a pain
I have no further claim on your young heart,
Mine is the victim, and would be again
To love too much has been the only art
I used,—I write in haste, and if a stain
Be on this sheet, 'tis not what it appears My eyeballs burn and throb, but have no tears

'I loved, I love you, for this love have lost
State, station, heaven, mankind's, my own esteem,
And yet cannot regret what it hath cost,
So dear is still the memory of that dream
Yet if I name my guilt, 'tis not to boast, None can deem harshlier of me than I deem I trace this serawl because I cannot rest—
I've nothing to reproach, or to request.

'Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
'Tis woman's whole existence. Man may range
The Court, Camp, Church, the Vessel, and the Mart, Sword, Gown, Gain, Glory, offer in exchange
Pride, Fame, Ambition, to fill up his heart,
And few there are whom these cannot estrange
Men have all these resources, We but one—
To love again, and be again undone.

'You will proceed in pleasure, and in pride,
Beloved and loving many, all is o'er
For mc on earth, except some years to hide
My shame and sorrow deep in my heart's core
These I could bear, but cannot cast aside
The passion which still rages as before,—
And so farewell—forgive me, love me—No,
That word is idle now—but let it go

'My breast has been all weakness, is so yet,
But still I think I can collect my mind,
My blood still rushes where my spirit's set,
As roll the waves before the settled wind,
My heart is feminine, nor can forget—
To all, except one image, madly blind,

So shakes the needle, and so stands the pole, As vibrates my fond heart to my fixed soul

And dare not set my seal upon this sheet,

'I have no more to say, but linger still,

And yet I may as well the task fulfil,

My misery can scarce be more complete,

I had not lived till now, could sorrow kill,

Death shuns the wretch who fain the blow would meet,

And I must even survive this last adieu,

And bear with life, to love and pray for you!'

(From Don Juan, Canto!)

Juan and Haidée

How long in this damp trance young Juan lay
He knew not, for the earth was gone for him,
And Time had nothing more of night nor day
For his congealing blood and senses dim,
And how this heavy faintness passed away
He knew not, till each painful pulse and himb,
And tingling vein, seemed throbbing back to life,
For Death, though vanquished, still retired with strife

His eyes he open'd, shut, again nuclosed,
For all was doubt and dizziness, he thought
He still was in the boat, and had but dozed,
And felt again with his despair o'erwrought,
And wished it Death in which he had reposed,
And then once more his feelings back were brought,
And slowly by his swimming eyes was seen
A lovely female face of seventeen

'Twas bending close o'er his, and the small mouth Seem'd almost prying into his for breath, And, chafing him, the soft warm hand of youth Recalled his answering spirits back from Death, And, bathing his chill temples, tried to soothe Each pulse to animation, till, beneath Its gentle touch and trembling care, a sigh To these kind efforts made a low reply

Then was the cordial poured, and mantle flung Around his scarce clad limbs, and the fair arm
Raised higher the faint head which o'er it hung,
And her transparent cheek, all pure and warm,
Pillowed his death like forehead, then she wrung
His dewy curls, long drenched by every storm,
And watched with eagerness each throb that drew
A sigh from his heaved bosom—and hers too

And lifting him with care into the cave,

The gentle girl and her attendant,—one
Young, yet her elder, and of brow less grave,

And more robust of figure,—then begun
To kindle fire, and as the new flames gave

Light to the rocks that roofed them, which the sun
Had never seen, the maid, or whatsoe'er
She was, appeared distinct, and tall, and fur

Her brow was overhung with coins of gold,
That sparkled o'er the auburn of her hair—
Her clustering hair, whose longer locks were rolled In braids behind, and though her stature were Even of the highest for a female mould,
They nearly reached her heel, and in her air

There was a something which bespoke command, As one who was a Lady in the land

Her hair, I said, was auburn, but her eyes
Were black as Death, their lashes the same hue,
Of downcast length, in whose silk shadow lies
Deepest attraction, for when to the view
Forth from its raven fringe the full glance flies, Ne'er with such force the swiftest arrow flew,
'Tis as the snake late coiled, who pours his length,
And hurls at once his venom and his strength

Her brow was white and low, her cheek's pure dye Like twilight, rosy still with the set sun, Short upper lip—sweet lips! that make its sigh Ever to bave seen such, for she was one Fit for the model of a statuary,

(A race of mere impostors, when all's done—
I've seen much finer women, ripe and real,
Than all the nonsense of their stone ideal)

(From Den Tuan, Canto ii)

From 'Don Juan.'

And forth they wander'd, her sire being gone,
As I have said, upon an expedition,
And mother, brother, guardian she had none,
Save Zoe, who, although with due precision
She waited on her lady with the sun,
Thought daily service was her only mission,
Bringing warm water, wreathing her long tresses,
And asking now and then for east off dresses

It was the cooling hour, just when the rounded Red sun sinks down behind the azure hill, Which then seems as if the whole earth it bounded, Circling all nature, hush'd, and dim, and still, With the far mountain crescent half surrounded On one side, and the deep sea calm and chill Upon the other, and the rosy sky, With one star sparkling through it like an eye.

And thus they wander'd forth, and hand in hand,
Over the shining pebbles and the shells,
Glided along the smooth and hirden'd sand,
And in the worn and wild receptacles
Work'd by the storms, yet work'd as it were plann'd,
In hollow halls, with sparry roofs and cells,
They turn'd to rest, and, each clasp'd by an arm,
Yielded to the deep twilight's purple charm

They look'd up to the sky, whose floating glow
Spread like a rosy ocean, vast and bright,
They gazed upon the glittering sea below,
Whence the broad moon rose circling into sight,
They heard the waves splash, and the wind so low,
And saw each other's dark eyes darting light
Into each other—and, beholding this,
Their lips drew near, and clung into a kiss

A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth, and love,
And beauty, all concentrating like rays
Into one focus, kindled from above
Such kisses as belong to early days
Where heart, and sool, and sense in concert move,
And the blood's lava, and the polse a blaze,
Each kiss a heart quake,—for a kiss's strength,
I think, it must be reckon'd by its length

By length I mean duration their, endured

Heaven knows how long -- no doubt they never reckon'd,

And if they had, they could not have secured
The sum of their sensations to a second
They had not spoken, but they felt allured,
As if their souls and hips each other beel on'd,
Which, being joined, like swarming bees they clung—
Their hearts the flowers from whence the honey sprung

They were alone, but not alone as they Who shut in chambers think it loneliness,
The silent ocean, and the starlit bry,
The twilight glow, which momently gre y less
The voiceless sands, and dropping caves, that lay
Around them, made them to each other press,
As if there were no life beneath the sty
Save theirs, and that their life could never die.

They fear'd no eyes nor ears on that lone beach,
They felt no terrors from the night, they were All in all to each other—though their speech
Was broken words, they thought in language there
And all the borning tongues the passions teach
I ound in one sigh the best interpreter
Of nature's oracle—first love,—that all
Which Eve has left her daughters since her fall

Hudee spoke not of seruples, ask'd no vows,
Nor offer d any, she had never heard
Of plight and promises to be a spouse,
Or perils by a loving maid incurr'd,
She was all which pure ignorance allows,
And flew to her young mate lil e a young bird,
And, never having dreamt of falsehood, she Had not one word to say of constancy

She loved, and was beloved—she adored,
And she was worshipp'd after nature a fashion—
Their intense souls, into each other poured,
It souls could die, had perish'd in that passion,—
But by degrees their senses were restored,
Again to be o'creome, again to dash on,
And, beating 'gainst his bosom, Haidee's heart Felt as if never more to beat apart

Alas' they were so young, so beautiful,
So lonely, loving, helpless, and the hour
Was that in which the Heart is always full,
And, having o'er itself no further power,
Prompts deeds Eternity cannot annul,
Bot pays off moments in an endless shower
Of hell fire—all prepared for people giving Pleasure or pain to one another living

Alas for Juan and Haidée! they were So loving and so lovely—till then never,
Excepting oor first parents, such a pair
Had run the risk of being damned for ever
And Haidée, being devout as well as fair
Had, doubtless, heard about the Stygran river,
And Hell, and Porgatory—but forgot,
Just in the very crisis she should not.

They look upon each other, and their eyes
Gleam in the moonlight, and her white arm clasps Round Juan's head, and his around hers lies Half buried in the tresses which it grasps

She sits upon his knee, and drinks his sighs, He hers, until they end in broken gisps, And thus they form a group that's quite antique, Half naked, loving, natural, and Greek

And when those deep and burning moments passed,
And Juan sunk to sleep within her arms,
She slept not, but all tenderly, though fast,
Sustain'd his head upon her bosoin's charms,
And now and then her eye to Heaven is east,
And then on the pale check her breast now warms, Pillowed on her o'erflowing heart, which pants
With all it granted, and with all it grants

An infant when it gazes on the light,

A child the moment when it drains the breast,

A devotee when soars the Host in sight,

An Arab with a stranger for a guest,

A sailor when the prize has strack in fight,

A miser filling his most hoarded chest,

Feel rapture, but not such true joy are reaping,

As they who watch o'er what they love while sleeping

For there it lies, so tranquil, so beloved
All that it hath of life with us is living,
So gentle, stirless, helpless, and unmoved,
And all unconscious of the joy 'tis giving,
All it hith felt, inflicted, passed, and proved,
Hushed into depths beyond the watcher's diving
There lies the thing we love, with all its errors
And all its charms, like Death without its terrors

The lady watched her lover—and that liour
Of Love's, and Night's, and Ocean's solitude
O'erflow'd her soul with their united power,
Amidst the barren sand and rocks so rude,
She and her wave worn love had made their bower
Where nought upon their passion could intrude,
And all the stars that crowded the blue space,
Saw nothing happier than her glowing face

Haidée was Nature's bride, and knew not this,
Haidée was passion's cluld, born where the sun
Showers triple light, and scorches even the kiss
Of his gazelle eyed daughters, she was one Made but to love, to feel that she was his
Who was her chosen what was said or done
Elsewhere was nothing She had nought to fear, Hope, care, nor love beyond—her heart beat here (From Canto 11)

From 'Childe Harold.'

I see before me the Gladiator lie

He leans upon his hand—his manly brow
Consents to death, but conquers agony,
And his droop'd head sinks gradually low—
And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow
From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
Like the first of a thunder shower, and now
The arena swims around lum—he is gone,
Ere ceased the inhuman shout which hall'd the wretch who won

(From Canto iv)

Sonnet on Chillon.

Eternal Spirit of the chainless Mind!

Brightest in dungeons, Liberty! thou art
For there thy habitation is the heart—

The heart which love of thee alone can bind,
And when thy sons to fetters are consign'd—
To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom—
Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind
Chillon' thy prison is a holy place,
And thy sad floor an altar—for 'twas trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace
Worn, as if thy cold pavement were a sod,
By Bonnivard '—May none those marks efface!
For they appeal from tyranny to God

(From The Prisoner of Chillon.)

From 'Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte'

'Tis done—but yesterday a King!
And armed with Kings to strive—
And now thou art a nameless thing
So abject—yet alive!
Is this the man of thousand thrones,
Who strewed our earth with hostile bones,
And can he thus survive?
Since he, miscalled the Morning Star,
Nor man nor fiend both fallen so far

Saul

Thou whose spell can raise the dead, Bid the Prophet's form appear, 'Samuel, raise thy buried head! King, behold the pliantom seer!'

Earth yawned, he stood the centre of a cloud Light changed its hue, returng from his shroud Death stood all glassy in his fixed eye, His hand was withered, and his veins were dry His foot, in bony whiteness, glitter'd there Shrunken and sinewless, and ghistly bare, From hips that moved not and unbreathing frame, Like caverned winds, the hollow accents came. Saul saw, and fell to earth, as falls the oak, At once, and blasted by the thunder stroke.

'Why is my sleep disquieted? Who is he that calls the dead? Is it thou, O King? Behold, Bloodless are these limbs, and cold Such are mine, and such shall be Thine to morrow, when with me Ere the coming day is done, Such shalt thou be, such thy Son Fare thee well, but for a day, Then we mix our mouldering clay Thou-thy race, he pale and low, Pierced by shafts of many a bow, And the falchion by thy side To thy heart thy hand shall guide Crownless-breathless-headless fall, Son and sire-the house of Saul!'

THEODORE WATTS DUNTON

[The standard edition of Lord Byron's Poetical and Prose Works is that issued in 1898-1904 in thirteen volumes by Mr Murray the poems edited by Mr Ernest Hartiey Coleridge, the letters and journals by Mr Rowland E Prothero This edition contains many hitherto anpublished additions, thus whereas Moore gave in the Life (1830) 561 of Byron's letters, this gives 1198]

Thomas Hood.

Thomas Hood was born on the 23rd of May 1799, at No 31 the Poultry, in the City of London, where his father was a publisher Thomas Hood the elder, a Scotsman born near Errol, midway between Perth and Dundee, was originally bound apprentice to a bookseller in Dundee, but soon found his way to London He had some turn for authorship, and even wrote a couple of novels now forgotten, so that his more distinguished son was born 'with ink in his blood' To Thomas Hood the publisher and his wife, daughter of an engraver, were born a family of six children, two four sons and daughters. whom Thomas was the second son A tendency to consumption on the mother's side, fatal to three of her children and ultimately to herself. was at the root of those complicated disorders which made the life of Thomas Hood 'one long disease.' The father died after a few days' illness in 1811, when Thomas was only twelve years old, leaving the widow and re maining children in reduced circum stances

From the Portrait in the National Portrait Gallery

In his Literary Reminiscences, published in the first series of Hood's Own, Hood tells us that he owed his earliest instruction to two maiden ladies. of the name of Hogsflesh, that he was then sent to a suburban boarding school (the 'Clapham Academy' of his famous Ode), and ultimately to a day school at Clerkenwell After the age of thirteen or fourteen his own keen and catholic love of reading was the foundation of that singular versatility and resource which marked both his poetic and his humorous vein. Through the influence of a friend of the family he was placed in a merchant's counting house in the City, but his health proving unable to stand the confinement to the desk, he was shipped off to Dundee, where he lived among his father's relations from 1815 to The threatened consumption was for a time warded off—the boy led the healthiest of outdoor lives in fishing and boating, he had ample leisure besides for reading and sketching, and he began to practise his pen both in verse and prose in the pages of local newspapers and magazines. In 1818 he returned to London with his health apparently re established, and entered the studio of his uncle, the engraver—After a short apprenticeship of only two years he began to work on his own account, until he discovered where lay the true field for his genius—About the same time, n young man of two-and-twenty, he was appointed sub-editor of the London Magazine

Nothing more propitious for Hood's genius could have happened It emancipated him for ever from the engraver's desk, and it threw him at once into a society of writers best fitted to call forth all that was best in him He now found himself in daily companionship with such men as Procter, Cary, Allan Cunningham, Quincey, Hazlitt, and, above all, with Charles. Lamb, with whom a close friendshipsprang up, destined to be one of the best influences of Hood's literary life. It was, however, the intimacy with John Hamilton Revnolds, whose sister he married three years later, that more than all the rest served to encourage and train Hood's poetic faculty John Keats had died early in 1821, the year that Hood joined the magraine, and it does not appear that they ever met, but Reynolds had been the close friend and disciple of Keats, and Hood passed at once under the same fascinating influence. Between July 1821 and July 1823, besides other and lighter contributions to the London, Hood wrote and published in the magazine some of the finest of what may be called the poems of his Keatsian period-Lycus the Centaur, the Two Peacocks of Bedfont, the Ode to Autumn, and others-poems which have never materially increased Hood's fame with the ordinary reader, chiefly because Hood the humourist appeals to a larger audience than Hood the poet, and the world is always in disposed to allow credit to a writer for gifts of very And although in the class of sub opposite kinds jects, and in the very titles of these poems, as well as in turns of phrase and versification, the influence of Keats is unmistakable, the poems show quite as markedly the result of an ear and taste formed upon a loving study of the narrative poems of And 'over all there hung' a tender Shakespeare melancholy observable in all Hood's serious verse, engendered in a personality on which from the beginning there rested the shadow of impending fate. In spite of real and original poetic quality, these poems, issued anonymously, fulled to attract notice, and when in 1827 he produced them with others of still finer quality in book-form, the volume fell all but dead from the press

A different fate attended an earlier venture in 1825, when Hood and his brother-in law Reynolds published (also anonymously) the little volume entitled Odes and Addresses to Great People While writing serious poetry in the London it had fallen to Hood's lot to act as 'comic man' or humorous chorus to the magazine, and as such to invent facetious answers to correspondents, real or imaginary Among these he had inserted a bur lesque Ode to Dr Kitchener, exhibiting a verbal wit of quite different flavour from the ordinary The success of this trifle seems to have suggested a collection of similar odes, to which Reynolds contributed a few, but Hood's was far the more conspicuous share, revealing a wealth of humorous ingenuity that at once attracted notice wrote attributing the book to Lamb as the only writer he knew capable of the achievement book passed rapidly through three editions, and practically determined the chief occupation of Hood for the remainder of his short life. His musical melancholy verse had brought him no recognition, his first facetious efforts had gained him an audience at once, from that day forth for twenty years of anxiety and struggle the vein thus opened was to be worked, in health and in sickness, with the grain and against the grain For Hood had married in 1824, contrary to all counsels of pru-The marriage with the sister of his friend Reynolds was one of truest affection, but Hood had no means of support but his pen, and his health was already matter of serious anxiety, soon there were strained relations with the Reynoldses, and in the end came a complete estrangement from Hood's early friend and brother-in-law Odes and Addresses were followed in 1826 by the first series of Whims and Oddities, where Hood first exhibited such graphic talent as he possessed in these picture puns of which he seems to have been the inventor, he said of himself that, like Pope's 'tape tied curtains,' he was 'never meant to draw' A second series of Whims and Oddities appeared in 1827, dedicated to Sir Walter Scott, followed without delay by two volumes of National Tales, the least characteristic and noticeable of Hood's writings. In 1829 he edited The Gem, one of the many fashionable annuals then in vogue—a remarkable little volume, for besides Charles Lamb's 'Lines on a Child dying as soon as born,' written on the death of Hood's first child, it gave to the world Hood's Eugene Aram, the first of his poems showing a tragic force of real individuality

Hood and his wife left London in 1829 for a cottage at Winchmore Hill, a few miles to the north, and there he schemed the first of those comic annuals which he produced yearly and single-handed from 1830 to 1839 In 1832 he left Winchmore Hill for an old fashioned house at Wanstead in Essey, forming part of the historic mansion of Wanstead House, and the romantic scenery of the park and neighbourhood furnished him with a background for his one novel, Tylney Hall, written during the next two years, and published in three volumes in 1834—a story of a conventional melodramatic type, with an underplot of cockney life and manners, not without many touches of Hood's peculiar charm, but on the whole a failure He never repeated the experiment of prose romance In 1834 the failure of a publisher plunged Hood into serious money difficulties by which he was hampered for the rest of his life. After the birth of his second child, a son, in January 1835, and Mrs Hood's dangerous illness, the family settled for two years at Coblenz, and for the next three at During these five years Hood, struggling against the slow progress of a fatal disease, con tinued to produce his Connc Annuals and other lighter matter, and schemed his Up the Rhine, a humorous account of the proceedings of an English family in Germany, told in letters, and too obviously imitated from Humplirey Clinker Published in 1839, this at once hit the public taste, but seems to have brought little profit to its author, who, apparently destitute of all business faculty, suffered throughout his career from the misfortunes or the superior sagacity of his publishers The sufferings of Hood during these five years were very terrible, and are only hinted by his son and daughter in their Memoir of their father In an unpublished letter to his wife in April 1840, written during a temporary visit to England from the house of his generous friend, the first Charles Wentworth Dilke, he writes 'I find my position a very cruel one-after all my struggles to be, as I am, almost moneyless, and with a very dim prospect of getting any, but by the sheer exercise of my pen What is to be done in the meantime is a question I ask myself without any answer but -Bruges Jul At the very moment of being free of Bailey, am I tied elsewhere, hand and foot, and by sheer necessity ready to surrender myself that slave, a bookseller's hack !'

By the kindness of friends Hood was enabled to return to England, with security from his creditors, in 1840 Disease of lungs and heart was now so far advanced that the fatal issue was only a question of time, but he continued to struggle on bravely and cheerfully for five years longer. In 1841 he was offered by Colburn the editorship of the New Monthly Magazine at a salary of £300 a year, a post which he filled for two years, when, a difference arising with the proprietor, he resigned the editorship, and in January 1844 started a new periodical of his own, Hood's Monthly Magazine, destined to be his last literary venture. Meantime in the Christmas number of Punch (1843) had appeared 'The Song of the Shirt,' and in Hood's Magazine, during its brief career, there followed 'The Haunted House,' 'The Lay of the Labourer,' and 'The Bridge of Sighs,' proving that, as the darkness of his own prospects deepened, the sympathies with his kind deepened also, and quickened his finest genius. Only a few months after the starting of the magazine a notice to the subscribers had to tell that the health of the editor was rapidly failing Towards the end of the year his friends used their interest with the Government, and in November Sir Robert Peel wrote announcing a pension to Mrs Hood on the Civil List of £100 a year In the number of the magazine for February 1845 appeared Hood's last contribution, the touching lines, prophetic of his approaching end, beginning

> Farewell life-my senses swim, And the world is growing dim, and ending

O'er the earth there comes a bloom, Sunny light for sullen gloom, Warm perfume for vapours cold— I smell the rose above the mould!

After three more months of increasing pain and distress, Thomas Hood died at Devonshire Lodge, Finchley Road, on the 3rd of May 1845, and was buried in Kensal Green Cemetery. His devoted wife, broken in health with the long attendance on her husband, survived him only eighteen months

Hood produced in twenty-four years an amount of prose and verse one-half of which at least the world might willingly let die. Of the other half, all the serious poetry is remarkable, and a small portion of first-rate excellence. Lyrics such as the 'Song of the Shirt,' the 'Bridge of Sighs, 'Eugene Arım,' the song beginning 'I remember, I remember, the house where I was born,' and the 'Ode to Melancholy' are of an assured immortality humorous verse-and in the best of it, as in 'Miss Kilmansegg,' are often blended poctry, pathos, and even real trigic power—is of a kind that Hood absolutely created. Not only was he the most prolific and successful punster that ever used that form of wit, but he turned it to purposes of which no one had ever supposed it capable. It became in his hands the most natural and obvious vehicle for all his better gifts. The truth is, he brought | to it the transfiguring power of real imagination, and, instead of its degrading whatever object it touched, in his hands it ministered to the noblest ends. Even in the 'Song of the Shirt,' when his deepest sympathies were involved, he uses the pun with almost magical effect, as where the poor needlewoman, confined to her squalid garret when all nature is beckoning her forth, exclaims

While underneath the eaves
The brooding swallows cling,
As if to show me their sunny backs,
And tunt me with the spring!

It was Hood's misfortune that the necessity of writing for bread compelled him to write constantly below his better genius. But he has left sufficient to found a durable fame as a writer of rare individuality, who, using a discredited method, made it delightful by the imagination of a true poet and the humanity of a genuine lover of his kind

The Bridge of Sighs.

Oue more Unfortunate, Weary of breath, Rashly importunate, Gone to her death!

Take her up tenderly, Lift her with care, Fashion'd so slenderly, Young, and so fair!

Look at her garments
Clinging like cerements,
Whilst the wave constantly
Drips from her clothing,
Take her up instantly,
Loving, not loathing—

Touch her not scornfully Think of her mournfully, Gentle and humanly, Not of the stains of her, All that remains of her Now is pure womanly

Make no deep scrutiny
Into her mutiny
Rash and undutiful,
Past all dishonour,
Death has left on her
Only the beautiful.

Still, for all slips of hers, One of Eve's family— Wipe those poor lips of hers Oozing so clammily

Loop up her tresses Escaped from the comb, Her fair auburn tresses, Whilst wonderment guesses Where was her home?

Who was her father? Who was her mother? Had she a sister? Had she a brother? Or was there a dearer one Still, and a nearer one Yet, than all other?

Alas! for the ranty
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!
Oh! it was pitful!
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none.

Sisterly, brotherly,
Fatherly, motherly
Feelings had changed
Love, by harsh evidence,
Thrown from its eminence,
Even God's providence
Seeming estranged

Where the lamps quiver So far in the river, With many a light From window and casement, From garret to basement, She stood, with amazement, Houseless by night

The bleak wind of March
Made her tremble and shiver,
But not the dark arch,
Or the black flowing river
Mad from life's history,
Glad to death's mystery
Swift to be hurl'd—
Any where, any where
Out of the world!

In she plunged boldly, No matter how coldly The rough river ran,— Over the brink of it, Picture it—think of it, Dissolute Man! Lave in it, drink of it, Then, if you can!

Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care,
Fashion'd so slenderly,
Young, and so fair '
Ere her limbs frigidly
Stiffen too rigidly,
Decently,—kindly,— Smooth, and compose them,
And her eyes, close them
Staring so blindly!

Dreadfully staring Thro' muddy impurity, As when with the daring Last look of despairing Fix'd on futurity

Perishing gloomily,
Spurr'd by contumely,
Cold inhumanity,
Burning insanity,
Into her rest —
Cross her hands humbly,
As if praying dumbly,
Over her breast!

Owning her weakness, Her evil behaviour, And leaving, with meekness, Her sins to her Saviour!

The Song of the Shirt

With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat, in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sang the 'Song of the Shirt.'

'Work! work! work!
While the coek is crowing aloof!
And work—work—work,
Till the stars shine through the roof!
It's Oh! to be a slave
Along with the barbarous Turk,
Where woman has never a soul to save,
If this is Christian work!

'Work—work—work
Till the brain begins to swim,
Work—work—work
Till the eyes are heavy and dim!
Seam, and gusset, and band,
Band, and gusset, and seam,
Till over the buttons I fall asleep,
And sew them on in a dream!

'Oh, Men, with Sisters dear 1
Oh, men, with Mothers and Wives!
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives!
Stitch—stitch—stitch,
In poverty, hunger, and dirt,
Sewing at once, with a double thread,
A Shroud as well as a Shirt

'But why do I talk of Death?

That Phantom of grisly bone,
I hardly fear its terrible shape,
It seems so like my own—
It seems so like my own,
Because of the fasts I keep,
Oh, God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap!

'Work—work—work!
My labour never flags,
And what are its wages? A bed of straw,
A crust of bread—and rags
That shatter'd roof—and this naked floor—
A table—a broken chair—
And a wall so blank, my shadow I thank For sometimes falling there!

'Work—work—work '
From weary chime to chime,
Work—work—work—
As prisoners work for crime '
Band, and gusset, and seam,
Seam, and gusset, and band,
Till the heart is sick, and the brain benumb'd
As well as the weary hand in the simplicity and intensity of many of his unforgettable brief lyrics and epigrams, like the lines on Rose Aylmer and the quatrain beginning, 'I strove with none, for none was worth my strife.' Yet Mr Sidney Colvin's definition of Landor as a classic writing in a romantic age' is not to be accepted without qualification The classic calm of his pose does not avail to hide in him the rebellious individualism which is a main and essential characteristic of the romantic movement and spirit. He is really as much an insurgent in temper as Shelley or Byron, the mutinous pugnacity of his life is mirrored in the audacious and extravagant paradox too often displayed in The writer who belittled Plato and Napoleon and extolled Alfieri as the greatest man of his time had certainly not the true classic serenity which sees life steadily and sees it whole. He glorified Milton ('It may be doubted if the Creator ever created one altogether so great'), found Spenser tedious, and by no means fully sympathised with Wordsworth or his romantic He was no sustained or systecontemporaries matic thinker, his thoughts are essentially opinions and prejudices, and hence it comes that the reader often wearies of him ere he ceases to admire Admiration, indeed, will never be wanting to Landor so long as nobility of style and of nature keeps its power to charm Browning said he owed more to him than to any contemporary

Many of Landor's detached fragments, both in prose and verse, are current 'Ambition is but avarice on stilts and masked, 'Religion is the elder sister of philosophy,' 'It is a kindness to lead the sober, a duty to lead the drunk, ' 'Nicknames and whippings, when they are once laid on, no one has discovered how to take off,' 'Study is the bane of boyhood, the aliment of youth, the indulgence of manhood, and the restorative of old age' But no saying of his is perhaps oftener quoted than the picturesque and rather mixedly metaphorical remark about his own standing as an author 'I shall dine late, but the dining-room will be well lighted, the guests few and select, I neither am nor ever shall be popular'

Rose Aylmer

Ah, what avuls the sceptred race, Ah, what the form divine! What every virtue, every grace ! Rose Aylmer, all were thme.

Rose Aylmer, whom these wakeful eyes May weep, but never see, A night of memories and of sighs I consecrate to thee.

Years After

'Do you remember me? or are you proud?' Lightly advancing thro' her star trimm'd crowd, Innthe said, and look'd into my eyes. 'A jes, a yes to both for memory Where you but once have been must ever be, And at your voice Pride from his throne must rise? No, my own love of other years ' No, it must never be Much rests with you that yet endears, Alas! but what with me? Could those bright years o'er me revolve So gay, o'er you so fair, The pearl of life we would dissolve And each the cup might share You show that truth can ne'er decay, Whatever fate befalls, I, that the myrtle and the bay

I wonder not that youth remains With you, wherever else she flies Where could she find such fair domains, Where bask beneath such sunny eyes?

Shoot fresh on ruin'd walls

Your pleasures spring like daisies in the grass, Cut down and up again as blithe as ever, From you, Ianthe, little troubles pass Like little ripples in a sunny river

Years, many parti colour'd years, Some have crept on, and some have flown, Since first before me fell those tears I never could see fall alone. Years, not so many, are to come, Years not so varied, when from you One more will fall when, carried home, I see it not, nor hear Adien

Well I remember how you smiled To sec mc write your name upon The soft sea sand,—'O! what a child! You think you're writing upon stone!' I have since written what no tide Shall ever wash away, what men Unborn shall read o'er ocean wide And find Ianthe's name again

To Southey

Indweller of a peaceful vale, Ravaged erewhile by white hair'd Dane, Rare architect of many a wondrous tale, Which, till Helvellyn's head lie prostrate, shall remain !

From Arno's side I hear thy Derwent flow, And see methinks the lake below Reflect thy graceful progeny, more fair And radiant than the purest waters are, Even when gurgling in their joy among The bright and blessed throng, Whom on her arm recline The beauteous Proserpine With tenderest regretful gaze, Thinking of Enna's yellow field, surveys.

Alas I that snows are shed Upon thy laurel'd head, Hurtled by many cares and many wrongs ! Malignity lets none Approach the Delphic throne, A hundred lane fed curs bark down Fame's hundred But this is in the night, when men are slow

To raise their eyes, when high and low, The scarlet and the colourless, are one Soon sleep unbars his noiseless prison,

And active minds again are risen, [the sun Where are the curs? dream bound, and whimpering in [tongues

At fife s or lyre's or tabor's sound
The dance of yonth, O Southey, runs not round
But closes at the bottom of the room
Amid the falling dust and deepening gloom,
Where the weary sit them down,

And Beauty too unbraids, and waits a lovelier crown.

We harry to the river we must cross,

And swifter downward every footstep wends,
Happy, who reach it ere they count the loss
Of balf their faculties and half their friends I
When we are come to it, the stream
Is not so dreary as they deem Who look on it from haunts too dear,
The weak from Pleasure's baths feel most its chilling air

No firmer breast than thine liath Heaven

To poet sage or hero given

No heart more tender, none more just

To that He largely placed in trust
Therefore shalt thou, whatever date
Of years be thine, with soul elate
Rise up before the eternal throne,
And bear in God's own voice 'Well done.'

Not, were that submarine
Gem lighted city mine,
Wherein my name, engraven by thy hand,
Above the royal gleam of blazonry shall stand,
Not, were all Syracuse
Pour'd forth before my muse,
With Hiero's cars and steeds, and Pindar's lyre
Brightening the path with more than solar fire,
Could I, as would beseem, requite the praise
Showered upon my low head from thy most lofty lays.

On Southey's Death.

Friends, hear the words my wandering thoughts would say, And cast them into shape some other day, Sonthey, my friend of forty years, is gone, And, shattered by the fall, I stand alone

To the Sister of Elia.

Comfort thee, O thou mourner, yet awhile 'Again shall Elia's smile Refresh thy heart, where heart can ache no more
What is it we deplore?

He leaves behind him, freed from griefs and years, Far worthier things than tears. The love of friends without a single foe

Unequalled lot below I

His gentle soul, his genius, these are thine, For these dost thou repine?

He may have left the lowly walks of men, Left them he has, what then?

Are not his footsteps followed by the eyes Of all the good and wise?

Though the warm day is over, yet they seek Upon the lofty peak

Of his pure mind the roseate light that glows
O'er death's perennial snows
Behold him! from the region of the blest
He speaks he bids thee rest

Tamar and the Sea-nymph.

'Twas evening, though not sunset, and the tide Level with these green meadows, seem'd yet higher 'Twas pleasant, and I loosen'd from my neck The pipe you gave me, and began to play O that I ne'er had learnt the tuneful art! It always brings us enemies or love Well, I was playing, when above the waves Some swimmer's head methought I saw ascend, I, sitting still, survey'd it with my pipe Awkwardly held before my lips half closed Gebir! it was a Nymph! a Nymph divine! I cannot wait describing how she came, How I was sitting, how she first assumed The Sulor, of what happen'd there remains Enough to say, and too much to forget. The sweet deceiver stepp'd upon this bank Before I was aware, for with surprise Moments fly rapid as with love itself Stooping to tune afresh the hoarsen'd reed, I heard a rustling, and where that arose My glance first lighted on her nimble feet. Her feet resembled those long shells explored By him who to befriend his steed's dim sight Would blow the pungent powder in the eye. Her eyes too ! O immortal gods! her eyes Resembled-what could they resemble? what Ever resemble those? Even her attire Was not of wonted woof nor yulgar art Her mantle show'd the yellow samphire pod, Her girdle the dove colour'd wave serene 'Shepherd,' said slie, 'and will you wrestle now, And with the sailor's hardier race engage?' I was rejoiced to hear it, and contrived How to keep up contention could I fail By pressing not too strongly, yet to press? 'Whether a shepherd, as indeed you seem, Or whether of the hardier race you boast, I am not daunted, no, I will engage.' 'But first,' said she, 'what wager will you lay?' 'A sheep,' I answered 'add whate'er you will.'
'I cannot,' she replied, 'make that return Our hided vessels in their pitchy round Seldom, unless from rapine, hold a sheep But I have sinuous shells of pearly hue Within, and they that lustre have imbibed In the sun's palace porch, where when unyoked His chariot wheel stands midway in the wave Shake one and it awakens, then apply Its polish'd lips to your attentive ear, And it remembers its august abodes, And murmurs as the ocean murmurs there. And I have others given me by the nymphs, Of sweeter sound than any pipe you have, But we, by Neptune! for no pipe contend, This time a sheep I win, a pipe the next.' Now came she forward eager to engage, But first her dress, her bosom then survey'd, And heaved it, doubting if she could deceive. Her bosom seem'd, enclosed in haze like heaven, To baffle touch, and rose forth undefined Above her knee she drew the robe succinct, Above her breast, and just below her arms. 'This will preserve my breath when tightly bound, If struggle and equal strength should so construm? Thus, pulling hard to fasten it, she spake, And, rushing at me, closed I thrill'd throughout And seem'd to lessen and shrink up with cold Again with violent impulse gush'd my blood,

And hearing nought external, thus absorb'd, I heard it, rushing through each turbid vein, Slinke my unsteady swimming sight in air I et with unyielding though uncertain arms I clung around her neck, the vest beneath Rustled against our slippery limbs entwined Often mine springing with eluded force Started aside and trembled till replaced And when I most succeeded, as I thought, My bosom and my throat felt so compress'd That life was almost quivering on my lips Yet nothing was there painful these are, signs Of secret arts and not of human might, What arts I cannot tell, I only know My eyes grew dizzy and my strength decay'd, I was mdeed o'ercome-with what regret, And more, with what confusion, when I reach'd The fold, and yielding up the sheep, she cried, 'This pays a shepherd to a conquering maid.' She smiled, and more of pleasure than disdain Was in her dimpled chin and liberal lip, And eyes that languish'd, lengthening, just like love. (From Gebir)

Hannibal and the Dying Roman.

Surgeon Hardly an hour of life is left.

Marcellus I must die then! The gods he praised!

The commander of a Roman army is no captive

Hannibal (to the Surgeon) Could not be bear a sea soyage? Extract the arrow

Surgeon He expires that moment Marcellus It pains me extract it

Hannibal Marcellus, I see no expression of pain on your countenance, and never will I consent to hasten the death of an enemy in my power. Since your recovery is hopeless, you say truly you are no captive

(To the Surgeon) Is there nothing, man, that can assuage the mortal pain? for, suppress the signs of it as lie may, he must feel it. Is there nothing to alleviate and allay it?

Mircellus Hannibil, give me thy hand-thou hast found it and brought it me, compassion

(To the Surgeon) Go, friend, others want thy aid, several fell around me.

Hannibal Recommend to your country, O Marcellus, while time permits it, reconciliation and peace with me, informing the Senate of my superiority in force, and the impossibility of resistance. The tablet is ready let me take off this ring—try to write, to sign it at least O what satisfaction I feel at seeing you able to rest upon the cllow, and even to smile I

Marcellus Within an hour or less, with how severe a brow would Minos say to me, 'Marcellus, is this thy writing?'

Rome loses one man she hath lost many such, and she still both many left

Hannibal Afraid as you are of falsehood, say you this? I confess in shime the ferocity of my countrymen Unfortunately too the nearer posts are occupied by Gauls, infinitely more cruel. The Numidians are so in revenge, the Gauls both in revenge and in sport. My presence is required in a distance, and I apprehend the barbarity of one or other, learning, as they must do, your refusal to execute my wishes for the common good, and feeling that by this refusal you deprive them of their country, after so long an absence.

Marcellus Hannibal, thou art not dying Hannibal What then? What mean you?

Marcellus That thou mayest, and very justly, have many things yet to apprehend I can have none. The barbarity of thy soldiers is nothing to me. Mine would not dare be cruel. Hannibal is forced to be absent, and his authority goes away with his horse. On this turf hes defaced the semblance of a general, but Marcellus is yet the regulator of his army. Dost thou abdicate a power conferred on thee by thy nation? or wouldst thou acknowledge it to have become, by thy own sole fault, less plenary than thy adversary's?

I have spoken too much let me rest this mantle oppresses me

Hannbal I placed my mantle on your head when the helmet was first removed, and while you were lying in the sun Let me fold it under, and then replace the ring

Marcellus Take it, Hannibal It was given me by a poor woman who flew to me at Syracuse, and who covered it with her hair, torn off in desperation that she had no other gift to offer Little thought I that her gift and her words should be mine How suddenly may the most powerful be in the situation of the most helpless! Let that ring and the mantle under my head be the exchange of guests at parting The time may come, Hannibal, when thou (and the gods alone know whether as conqueror or conquered) mayest sit under the roof of my children, and in either case it shall serve thee. In thy adverse fortune, they will remember on whose pillow their father breathed his last, in thy prosperous (Heaven grant it may shine upon thee in some other country), it will rejoice thee to protect them. We feel ourselves the most exempt from affliction when we relieve it, although we are then the most conscious that it may befall us. There is one thing here which is not at the disposal of either

Hannibal What?

Marcellus This body

Hanmbal Whither would you be lifted? Men are ready

Marcellus I meant not so My strength is failing I seem to hear rather what is within than what is without. My sight and my other senses are in confusion I would have said, This body, when a few bubbles of air shall have left it, is no more worthy of thy notice than of mine, but thy glory will not let thee refuse it to the piety of my family

Hannibal You would ask something else I perceive an inquietude not visible till now

Marcellus Duty and Death make us think of home sometimes.

Hannibal Thitherward the thoughts of the conqueror and of the conquered fly together

Marcellus Hast thou any prisoners from my escort?

Hannibal A few dying he about—and let them he—they are Tuscans The remainder I saw at a distance, flying, and but one brave man among them—he appeared a Roman—a youth who turned back, though wounded They surrounded and dragged him away, spurring his horse with their swords. These Etrurians measure their courage carefully, and tack it well together before they put it on, but throw it off again with lordly ease Marcellus, why think about them? or does aught else disquiet your thoughts?

Marcellus I have suppressed it long enough My son—my beloved son 1

Hannibal Where is he? Can it be? Was he with you?

Marcellus He would have shared my fate—and has not Gods of my country beneficent throughout life to me, in death snrpassingly beneficent, I render you, for the last time, thanks. (From Imaginary Conversations)

Chatham and Chesterfield

Chesterfield It is true, my lord, we have not always been of the same opinion, or, to use a better, truer, and more significant expression, of the same side in politics, yet I never heard a sentence from your lordship which I did not listen to with deep attention. I understand that you have written some pieces of admonition and advice to a young relative, they are mentioned as being truly excellent, I wish I could have profited by them when I was composing mine on a similar occasion.

Chatham My lord, you certainly would not have done it, even supposing they contained, which I am far from believing, any topics that could have escaped your pene trating view of manners and morals, for your lordship and I set out diversely from the very threshold. Let us, then, rather hope that what we have written, with an equally good intention, may produce its due effect, which indeed, I am afraid, may be almost as doubtful, if we consider how ineffectual were the cares and exhor tations, and even the daily example and high renown, of the most zealous and prudent men on the life and conduct of their children and disciples Let us, how ever, hope the best rather than fear the worst, and believe that there never was a right thing done or a wise one spoken in vain, although the fruit of them may not spring up in the place designated or at the time expected.

Chesterfield Pray, if I am not taking too great a freedom, give me the outline of your plan

Chatham Willingly, my lord, but since a greater man than either of us has laid down a more comprehensive one, containing all I could bring forward, would it not be preferable to consult it? I differ in nothing from Locke, unless it be that I would recommend the lighter as well as the graver part of the ancient classics, and the constant practice of imitating them in early youth. This is no cliange in the system, and no larger an addition than a woodbine to a sacred grove

Chesterfield I do not admire Mr Locke

Chatham Nor I—he is too simply grand for admiration—I contemplate and revere him Equally deep and clear, he is both philosophically and grammatically the most elegant of English writers

Chesterfield If I expressed by any motion of limb or feature my surprise at this remark, your lordship, I hope, will pardon me a slight and involuntary transgression of my own precept I must entreat you, before we move a step further in our inquiry, to inform me whether I am really to consider him in style the most elegant of our prose authors

Chatham Your lordship is capable of forming an opinion on this point certainly no less correct than mine.

Chesterfield Pray assist me.

Chatham Education and grammar are surely the two driest of all subjects on which a conversation can turn, yet if the ground is not promiscuously sown, if what ought to be clear is not covered, if what ought to be covered is not bare, and, above all, if the plants are choice ones, we may spend a few moments on it not unpleasantly. It appears, then, to me that elegance in prose composition is mainly this a just admission of topics and of words, neither too many nor too few of either, enough of sweetness in the sound to induce us to enter and sit still, enough of illustration and reflection to change the postnre of our minds when they would tire, and enough of sound matter in the complex to repay us for our attendance. I could perhaps be more logical in my definition and more concise, but am I at all erroneous?

Chesterfield I see not that you are

Chatham My ear is well satisfied with Locke I find nothing idle or redundant in him

Chesterfield But in the opinion of you graver men would not some of his principles lead too far?

Chatham The danger is, that few will be led by them for enough most who begin with him stop short, and, pretending to find pebbles in their shoes, throw themselves down upon the ground, and complain of their guide

Chesterfield What, then, can be the reason why Plato, so much less intelligible, is so much more quoted and applauded?

Chatham The difficulties we never try are no difficulties to us. Those who are upon the summit of a mountain know in some measure its altitude, by comparing it with all objects around, but those who stand at the bottom, and never mounted it, can compare it with few only, and with those imperfectly. Until a short time ago, I could have conversed more fluently about Plato than I can at present, I had read all the titles to his dialogues, and several semps of commentary, these I have now forgotten, and am indebted to long attacks of the gout for what I have acquired instead.

Chesterfield A very severe schoolmaster! I hope he allows a long vacation

Chatham Severe he is indeed, and although he sets no example of regularity, he exacts few observances, and teaches many things. Without him I should have had less patience, less learning less reflection, less lessure, in short, less of everything but of sleep.

Chesterfield Locke, from a deficiency of fancy, is not likely to attract so many listeners as Plato

Chatham And yet occasionally his language is both metaphorical and rich in images. In fact all our great philosophers have also this property in a wonderful degree. Not to speak of the devotional, in whose writings one might expect it, we find it abundantly in Bacon, not spanngly in Hobbes, the next to him in range of inquiry and potency of intellect. And what would you think, my lord, if you discovered in the records of Newton a sentence in the spirit of Shakespeare?

Chesterfield I should look npon it as upon a wonder, not to say a mirrele Newton, like Barrow, had no feeling or respect for poetry

Chatham His words are these 'I don't know what I may seem to the world, but as to myself, I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the sea shore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of Truth lay all undiscovered before me.'

Chesterfield Surely nature, who had given him the volumes of her greater mysteries to naseal who had bent over him and taken his hand, and taught him to decipher the characters of her sacred language, who had lifted up before him her glorious veil, higher than ever vet for mortal, that she might impress her features and her fondness on his heart, threw it back wholly at these words, and gazed upon him with as much admira tion as ever lie had gazed upou lier

(From Imaginary Conversations)

William Penn and Lord Peterborough.

Peterlorough The worst objection I myself could ever find against the theatre is that I lose in it my original idea of such men as Cresar and Coriolanus, and, where the loss affects me more deeply, of Juliet and Desde Alexander was a fool to wish for a second world to conquer but no man is a fool who wishes for the enjoyment of two-the real and the ideal nor is it anything short of a misfortune, I had almost said of a calamity, to confound them. This is done by the stage, it is likewise done by engravings in books, which have a great effect in weakening the imagination, and are serviceable only to those who have none, and who rend negligently and idly I should be sorry if the most ingenious print in the world were to cover the first impression left on my mind of such characters as Don Quixote and Sancho yet probably a very in different one might do it, for we cannot master our funcies, nor give them at will a greater or less tenacity. a greater or less promptitude in coming and recurring

You I riends are no less adverse to representation by painting than by acting

Penn We do not educate our youth to such profes sions and practices Iliou, I conceive, art unconcerned and disinterested in this matter

Peterborough Nearly, but not quite I am ignorant of the art, and prefer that branch of it which to many seems the lowest, I mean portraiture. I can find flowers in my garden, landscapes in my rides, the works of saints in the Bible, of great statesmen and captains in the historians, and of those who with equal advantages had been the same, in the Newgate Calendar The best representation of them can only give me a high opinion of the painter's abilities fixed on a point of time. But when I look on a family pieture by Vandyke, when I contemplate the elegant and happy father in the midst of his blooming progeny, and the partner of his fortunes and his joy beside him, I am affected very differently, and much He who there stands meditating for them some delightful scheme of pleasure or aggrandisement, has bowed his head to calamity, perhaps even to the Those roses gathered from the parterre behind, those taper fingers negligently holding them that hair, the softness of which seems unable to support the riot of its ringlets, are moved away from earth, amid the terrs and aching hearts of the very boys and girls who again are looking at me with such unconcern.

Pathfullest recorder of domestic bliss, perpetuator of youth and beauty, vanquisher of time, leading in triumpli the Hours and Seasons, the painter here bestows on me the richest treasures of his enchanting art

(From Imaginary Conversations)

Aspasla at the Theatre

How fortunate' to have arrived at Athens, at dawn, on the twelfth of Llaphebolion. On this day began the festivals of Bacchus, and the theatre is thrown open at

What a theatre! What an elevation! What a prospect of city and port, of land and water, of porticoes and temples, of men and heroes, of demi gods and gods !

It was indeed my wish and intention, when I left Ionia, to be present at the first of the Dionysiacs, but how rarely are wishes and intentions so accomplished, even when winds and waters do not interfere!

I will now tell you all No time was to be lost, so I hastened on shore in the dress of an Athenian boy, who came over with his mother from Lemnos ness of youth he forgot to tell me that, not being yet eighteen years old, he could not be admitted, and he left me on the steps My heart sank within me, so many young men stared and whispered, yet never was stranger treated with more civility. Crowded as the theatre was (for the tragedy had begun), every one made room for me. When they were seated, and I too, I looked toward the stage, and behold there lay before me, but afar off, bound upon a rock, a more majestic form, and bearing a counte nance more heroic, I should rather say more divine, than ever my imagination had conceived. I know not how long it was before I discovered that as many eyes were directed toward me as toward the competitor of the gods. I was neither flattered by it nor abashed Every wish, hope, sigh, sensation, was successively with the cham pion of the human race, with his antagonist Zens, and his creator Æschylus. How often, O Cleone, have we throbbed with his injuries thow often hath his vulture torn our breasts 1 how often have we thrown our arms round each other's neck, and half renounced the religion of our fathers l Even your image, inseparable at other times, came not across me then Promethcus stood between us. He had resisted in silcuce and disdain the cruellest tortures that Almightiness could inflict now arose the Nymphs of Ocean, which heaved its vast waves before us, and now they descended with open arms and sweet benign countenances, and spake with pity, and the insurgent heart was mollified and quelled

(From Pericles and Aspasia)

The standard Life of Landor is by John Forster (2 vols 1869), and there is an admirable sketch by Mr Sidney Colvin in the 'English Men of Letters series (1881) to him also we owe Selections from Landor (1882) Stephen Wheeler's Letters and Unpublished Writings of Landor (2 vols. 1897-99) includes a bibliography, and reference may be made to Evans s Landor, a Critical Study (1892) and to essays by Lord Houghton, Mrs Lynn Linton (Fraser's Magazine, July 1870), and Mr Swinburne -Landor's youngest brother, Robert Eyres Landor (1781-1869), studied at Oxford for forty years was a model clergyman in Worcestershire, but wrote several tragedies and poems. Landor's grandson A H Savage Landor, became Lnown as a traveller amongst the Amos of Japan, and in Tibet (1893-98).

Edwin Atherstone (1788-1872) was born at Nottingham, and died at Bath He was a friend of the painter Martin, and wrote Martinesque epics and romances, among them The Last Days of Herculaneum (1821), The Fall of Nineveh (in thirty books, 1828-68), and Israel in Egypt (1861), his chief poem, and the historical romances The Sea-Kings in England (1830) and The Handwriting on the Wall (1858) Though praised by contemporary critics for vigour, power, splendid diction, and truly poetical feeling, they are one and all completely forgotten

James Henry Leigh Hunt, poet and essayist, was born at Southgate in Middlesex, 19th October 1784 His father, a West Indian, who at the time of the American war espoused the British interest with so much warnth that he had to leave the New World and seek a subsistence in the Old, took orders in the Church of England, and was for some time tutor to the nephew of Lord Chandos, near Southgate His son-named after mother pupil, Mr Leigh-was educated at Christ's Hospital till his fifteenth year. "I was then" he says, "first deputy Grecian, and had the honour of going out of the school in the same rank, at the same age, and for the same reason as my friend Charles Lamb The reason was that I hest tited in my speech. It was understood that it Greenn was bound to deliver a public speech before he left school, and to go into the Church afterwards, and as I could do neither of these things, a Grecian I could not be! Leigh wis then a poet, and his father collected his verses, and published them with a large list of subscribers under the appropriate title of Jurentia He has himself described this volume in 1801 as a heap of imitations, some of them clever enough for a youth of sixteen, but absolutely worthless in every other respect. In 1805 his brother John started a paper called The News, and the poet went to live with him and write the theatrical criticisms in it. Three years after wards they established The Examiner, a weekly journal conducted with great ability. Then, as throughou, his life, Hunt was a stout Radicil, but unfortunitely lie ventured some violent strictures on the Prince Resent, terming him 'a fit Adoms of fifty,' with other personalities, and he was sentenced to two years' imprison ment in 1813. His captivity was not without its bright side He had much of the public sympaths, and his friends-Byron and Moore imong them-were attentive in their visits One of his two rooms on the 'ground floor' he converted into a picturesque and poetical study 'I pripared the walls with a trellis of roses, I had the ceiling coloured with clouds and sky, the barred windows were screened with Venetian blinds, and when my bool cases were set up, with their busts and flowers, and a pranoforte made its appearance, perhaps there was not a handsomer room on that side the I took a pleasure, when a stranger knocked at the door, to see him come in and stare about him. The surprise on issuing from the Borough, and passing through the avenues of a jail, was dramatic. Charles Lainb declared there was no other such room except in a fairy tale But I had another surprise, which was a garden. There was a little yard outside railed off from another belonging to the neighbouring ward This yard I shut in with green palings, adorned it with a trellis, bordered it with a thick bed of earth from a nursery, and even contrived to have a grass-plot. The earth I filled with flowers and young trees. There was an apple tree from which we managed to get a pudding the second year. As to my flowers, they were allowed to be perfect. A poet from Derbyshire [Mr. Moore] told me he had seen no such heart's-ease. I bought the Parnaso Haliano while in prison, and used often to think of a passage in it, while looking at this ministure piece of horticulture.

Mio picciol orto, A me sei vigna, e cimpo, e selva, e prato —Barrii My Intle garden,

To me thou 'et vinevard, field, and wood, and meadow.

LHGH HUNT From an Fagraving after Hayter

Here I wrote and read in fine weather, sometimes under an awning. In autumn my trellises were living with scarlet runners, which added to the flowery investment. I used to shut my eyes in my arm chair, and affect to think myself hundreds, of miles off. But my triumph was in issuing forth of a morning. A wicket out of the garden led into the large one belonging to the prison. The latter was only for vegetables, but it contained a cherrytree, which I twice saw in blossom?

The poet was not so well fitted to battle with the world or apply himself to worldly business as to dress his garden and nurse poetical fancies. He fell into difficulties, from which he was never afterwards wholly free. His habits were careless and unbusiness like, he was too facile a borrower, and there can be no doubt, in spite of Dickens's denials, that he is the original of Harold Skimpole in Bleak House He himself confessed that he never knew the multiplication table. On leaving prison he published his Story of Rimini (1816), the tale of Paolo and Francesca in verse, afterwards altered, but without improvement. He set up a little weekly paper, The Indicator (1819-21), on the plan of the periodical essayists, which was well received. He also gave to the world two small volumes of poetry, The Feast of the Poets (1814) and Foliage (1818) In 1822 he went to Italy with his wife and seven children to reside with Lord Byron, and to establish The Liberal, a quarterly review containing a crude and violent melange of poetry and politics, both in the extreme of liberalism This connection proved a failure. Shelley, on whose advice he had gone out, was drowned soon after his arrival, and Hunt was one of those present at his cremation The Liberal did not sell-it ran through only four numbers (1822-23), Byron's titled and aristocratic friends cried out against so plebeian a partnership, and Hunt found that 'my noble friend,' to whom he was indebted in a pecuniary sense, was cold, sarcastic, and worldly-minded Unluckily Hunt, after his return to England in 1825, published Lord Byron and Some of his Contemporaries (1828), in which his disappointment found vent, and this was construed into ingratitude life for the next twenty years was spent in precarious journalism, the profits of which did not always avail to keep the bailiffs out of the Several weekly periodicals which he edited-The Companion (1828), the Chat of the Week (1830), The Tatler (1830-32), and Leigh Hunt's London Journal (1834-35)-had but an evanescent success. The last of these, perhaps the most characteristic and popular of them all, obtained at the time the generous praise of Dr Robert Chambers, who addressed to Hunt a congratulatory letter extolling his 'kind nature,' and describing him as 'the friend of all man-In 1835 Hunt produced and dedicated to Lord Brougham his anti-war poem of Captain Sword and Captain Pen, which was followed in 1840 by a drama entitled A Legend of Florence, and in 1842 by a narrative poem, The Palfrey Through Macaulay's influence he became a con tributor to the Edinburgh Review, whose editor, however, the ponderous Macvey Napier, objected to the chattiness of his style, and offended him by asking for something 'gentleman-like' from his pen The chief of Hunt's many later works were Sir Ralph Esher, a novel (1832), Biographical and Critical Notices of Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar (1840), which gave the occasion of Macaulay's well-known essay, the interesting Autobiography (1850), and The Old Court Suburb (1855), a delightful sketch of Kensington, where he lived from 1840 to 1850 For ten years before his death on 28th August 1859 the pecuniary distresses so disagreeably described by Carlyle had been at least illeviated by pensions from the Shelley family and the Civil List

Leigh Hunt's great and unrealised ambition was to be a poet His most elaborate effort in verse, the Story of Rimini, shows him utterly inadequate to the treatment of a noble and passionate theme, and justifies to some extent the attacks of the Blackwood critics and other Tory reviewers, who so mercilessly ridiculed the faults in taste committed by the 'Cockney poet.' Hunt has no dignity and often very little delicacy as a poet, but his verses as a rule show good spirits, good humour, and a lively if rather too luxurious fancy It is as an essayist and critic, however, that he is read and gratefully remembered papers in the Indicator and Companion show, of course, nothing to be compared with the rare and poignant genius of Lamb or the keen and brusque virility of Hazlitt, but their familiar bonhomie and mild enthusiasm give them an individuality and a humbler charm of their own As a critic, again, while neither luminous nor penetrative, Hunt has the merit of genuine and zestful appreciativeness and of a saving catholicity of taste. Despite the frequent triviality of his egotistic prattle, his honest love of literature becomes contagious, and of few critics can it be said that their books have done so much as the Indicator and Companion, the volumes on Imagination and Fancy and Wit and Humour, and the Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla to spread a love and an understanding of good poetry

May Morning at Ravenna.

The sun is up, and 'tis a morn of May,
Round old Ravenna's clear shewn towers and bay,
A morn, the loveliest which the year has seen,
Last of the spring, yet fresh with all its green,
For a warm eve, and gentle rains at night,
Have left a sparkling welcome for the light,
And there's a crystal clearness all about,
The leaves are sharp, the distant hills look out,
A balmy briskness comes npon the breeze,
The smoke goes dancing from the cottage trees,
And when you listen, you may hear a coil
Of bubbling springs about the grassy soil,
And all the scene, in short—sky, earth, and sea—
Breathes like a bright eyed face, that laughs out openly

Tis nature, full of spirits, waked and springing The birds to the delicious time are singing, Darting with freaks and snatches up and down, Where the light woods go seaward from the town, While happy faces, striking through the green Of leafy roads, at every turn are seen, And the far ships, lifting their sails of white Like joyful hands, come up with scattered light, Come gleaming up, true to the wished for day, And chase the whistling brine, and swirl into the bay

Already in the streets the stir grows loud, Of expectation and a bustling crowd. With feet and voice the gathering hum contends, The deep talk heaves, the ready laugh ascends, Callings, and clapping doors, and curs unite,
And shouts from mere exuberance of delight,
And armed bands, making important way,
Gallant and grave, the lords of holiday,
And nodding neighbours, greeting as they run,
And pilgrims, chanting in the morning sun

To T L H., six years old, during a Sickness

Sleep breathes at last from out thee,
My little patient boy,
And balmy rest about thee
Smooths off the day s annoy
I sit me down, and think
Of all thy winning ways,
Yet almost wish, with sudden shrink,
That I had less to pruse.

Thy sidelong pillowed meekness,
Thy thanks to all that aid,
Thy heart, in pun and weakness,
Of fancied faults afraid,
The little trembling hand
That wipes thy quiet tears,
These, these are the things that may demand
Dread memories for years.

Sorrows I've had, severe ones,
I will not think of now,
And calmly 'midst my dear ones
Have wasted with dry brow,
But when thy fingers press
And pat my stooping head,
I cannot bear the gentleness—
The tears are in their bed

Ah ' first born of thy mother,
When life and hope were new,
Kind playmate of thy brother,
Thy sister, father, too.
My light, where'er I go,
My bird when prison bound,
My hand in hand companion—no,
My prayers shall hold thee round

To say 'He has departed'—
'His voice'—'his faee is gone'—'is gone,'
To feel impatient hearted,
Yet feel we must bear on,
Ah! I could not endure
To whisper of sneh woe,
Unless I felt this sleep ensure That it will not be so'

Yes, still he's fixed, and sleeping!
This silence too the while—
Its very hush and creeping
Seem whispering us a smile
Something divine and dim
Seems going by one's ear,
Like parting wings of seraphim,
Who say, 'We've finished here'

To the Grasshopper and the Cricket

Green little vaulter in the sunny grass,
Catching your heart up at the feel of June,
Sole voice that's heard amidst the lazy noon,
When even the bees lag at the summoning brass,

And you, warm little housekeeper, who class
With those who think the candles come too soon,
Loving the fire, and with your tricksome tune
Nick the glad silent moments as they pass,
O sweet and tiny cousins, that belong,
One to the fields, the other to the hearth,
Both have your sunshine, both, though small, are strong
At your clear hearts, and both seem given to earth

Abou Ben Adhem and the Angel.

Fo ring in thoughtful ears this natural song— Indoors and out, summer and winter, Mirth.

Abou Ben Adhem—may his tribe increase!— Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace, And saw, within the moonlight in his room, Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom, An angel writing in a book of gold I receding peace had made Ben Adhem bold, And to the presence in the room he said 'What writest thou?' The vision rused its head, And with a look made of all sweet record, Answered 'The names of those who love the Lord' 'And is mine one?' said Abou 'Nay, not so,' Replied the angel Abou spoke more low, But cheerily still, and said 'I pray thee, then, Write me as one that loves his fellow men The angel wrote, and vanished The next night It came again with a great wakening light, And showed the names whom love of God had blest,

My Books

And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest

Sitting last winter, among my books, and walled round with all the comfort and protection which they and my fireside could afford me-to wit, a table of high piled books at my back, my writing desk on one side of me, some shelves on the other, and the feeling of the warm fire at my feet-I began to consider how I loved the anthors of those books how I loved them, too, not only for the imaginative pleasures they afforded me, but for their making ine love the very books themselves, and delight to be in contact with them. I looked sideways at my Spenser, my Theocritus, and my Arabian Nights, then above them at my Itnlian poets, then behind me at my Dry den and Pope, my romanees, and my Boccaccio, then on my left side nt my Chaucer, who lay on a writingdesk, and thought how natural it was in C L to give a kiss to an old folio, as I once saw him do to Chapman's At the same time I wondered how he could sit in that front room of his with nothing but a few unfeeling tables and chairs, or at best a few engravings in trim frames, instead of putting a couple of arm chairs into the back room with the books in it, where there is but Would I were there, with both the chairs one window properly filled, and one or two more besides! 'We lind talk, sir,'-the only talk capable of making one forget

I entrench myself in my books equally against sorrow and the weather. If the wind comes through a passage, I look about to see how I can fence it off by a better disposition of my movables, if a melaneholy thought is importunate, I give mother glance at my Spenser. When I speak of being in contact with my books, I mean it literally. I like to lean my head against them Living in a southern climate, though in a part sufficiently northern to feel the winter, I was obliged, during that

The War-song of Dinas Vawr

The mountain sheep are sweeter, But the valley sheep are fatter, We therefore deemed it meeter To carry off the latter We made an expedition, We met an host and quelled it, We forced a strong position, And killed the men who held it

On Dyfed's richest valley,
Where herds of kine were browsing,
We made a mighty sally,
To furnish our carousing
Fierce warnors rushed to meet us,
We met them, and o'erthrew them
They struggled hard to beat us,
But we conquered them, and slew them

As we drove our prize at leisure,
The king marched forth to catch us,
His rage surpassed all measure,
But his people could not match us
He fled to his hall pillars,
And, ere our force we led off,
Some sacked his house and cellars,
While others cut his head off

We there, in strife bewildering, Spilt blood enough to swim in We orphaned many children, And widowed many women The eagles and the ravens We glutted with our foemen, The heroes and the cravens, The spearmen and the bowmen

We brought away from battle,
And much their land bemoaned them,
Two thousand head of cattle,
And the head of him who owned them
Ednyfed, King of Dyfed,
His head was borne before us,
His wine and beasts supplied our feasts,
And his overthrow, our chorus

Landscape-gardening

Mr Milestone This, you perceive, is the natural state of one part of the grounds. Here is a wood, never yet touched by the finger of taste, thick, intricate, and gloomy. Here is a little stream, dashing from stone to stone, and overshadowed with these natrimmed boughs.

Miss Tenorina The sweet romantic spot! How beau tifully the birds must sing there on a summer evening!

Miss Graziosa. Dear sister! how can you endure the horrid thicket?

Mr Milestone You' are right, Miss Graziosa your taste is correct—perfectly en règle Now, here is the same place corrected—trimmed—polished—decorated—adorned Here sweeps a plantation, in that beautiful regular curve there winds a gravel walk here are parts of the old wood, left in these majestic circular clumps, disposed at equal distances with wonderful symmetry there are some single shrubs scattered in elegant profusion here a Portugal laurel, there a juniper, here a laurustinus, there a spruce fir, here a larch, there a lilae, here a rhododendron, there an arbutus. The stream, you see, is become a canal the banks are perfectly smooth and green, sloping to the water's edge and there is Lord Littlebrain, rowing in an elegant boat.

Mr Milestone Beautiful, Miss Tenorina. Hideous Base, common, and popular Such a thing as you may see anywhere, in wild and mountainous districts Now, observe the metamorphosis. Here is the same rock, cut into the shape of a giant. In one hand he holds a horn, through which that little fountain is thrown to a prodigious elevation. In the other is a ponderous stone, so exactly balanced as to be apparently ready to fall on the head of any person who may happen to be beneath and there is Lord Littlebrain walking under it

Winter Scenery Waterfalls in Frost.

I wish I could find language sufficiently powerful to convey to you an idea of the sublime magnificence of the waterfalls in the frost, when the old, overhanging oaks are spangled with icicles, the rocks sheeted with frozen form, formed by the flying spray, and the water that cores from their sides congented into innumerable pillars of crystal. Every season has its charms. The picturesque tourists—those birds of summer—see not half the beauties of nature.

Truth to Nature essential in Poetry

Miss Ilex Few intry perceive an inaccuracy, but to those who do, it causes a great diminution, if not a total destruction, of pleasure in perusal. Shakespeare never makes a flower blossom out of season! Words worth, Coleradge, and Southey are true to nature in this and in all other respects, even in their wildest imaginings.

The Re Dr Opimian \ \ \text{ there is a combination, by one of our greatest poets, of flowers that never blossom in the same season

Bring the rathe primrore that forsaken dies,
The tufted crow toe and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy freaked with jet,
The glowing violet,
The musk rose, and the well attired woodbine,
With cowships wan that hang the pensive head,
And every flower that sad embroidery wears
Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And diffedilhes fill their cups with tears,
To deck the hareate hearse where Lycid hes.'

And at the same time he plucks the bernes of the myrtle and the avy

Miss liex Very beautiful, if not true to Linglish seasons, but Milton might have thought himself justified in mil-ing this combination in Arcadia Generally, he is strictly accurate, to a degree that is in itself a beauty. For instance, in his address to the nightingale

'Thee, chauntress, oft the woods among, I woo, to hear thy even song, And missing thee, I walk unseen. On the dry smooth shaven green'

The song of the nightingale ceases about the time that the press is mown

The Rev. Dr. Opinian. The old Greek poetry is alway true to nature and will bear any degree of critical analysis. I must say I talle no pleasure in poetry that will not

Mr. Ma. Berrevalale. No poetry is truer to nature than Burns, and no one less so than Moore. His imagery is almost always false. Here is a highly applanded a mea and very taking at first sight.

*The night-dew of heaven, though in rilence it weeps, Shall brighten with verdure the soft where he sleeps And the text that we shed, though in secret it rolls Shall long keep his memory green in our smale."

offensive to me than even filse imagery. Here is ore in a son, which I have often heard with displeasors. A young man goes up a mountain, and as he per higher and higher he repeats Litedia r t but excluse is only taller in the comparison of things on a common basis, not higher as a detached object in the air. Jack's bean stall, was excelling the higher it grew, but Jack himself was no more cellus at the top than he had been at the bottom.

Mr Mac Borrowlate I am afraid, doctor, if you look for profound knowledge in popular poetry, you will often be disappointed

The Rev Dr Opimian I do not look for profound knowledge, but I do expect that poets should under stand what they talk of Burns was not a scholar, but he was always master of his subject. All the scholar-ship in the world would not have produced 'Fam o' Shanter,' but in the whole of that poem there is not a false image or a misused worl. What do you suppose these lines represent?—

'I turning saw, throned on a flowery rise, One sitting on a crimison scarf unrolled—

A queen with swarthy cheeks and bold black eyes, Brow bound with burning gold

[IRBNESON'S Dream of Fair Homen ]

Mr Mac Borrowdale I should take it to be a description of the Queen of Bambo

The Re Dr Ofimian Vet thus one of our most popular poets describes Cleopatra, and one of our mo t popular artists has illustrated the description by a portrait of a hideous granning l'thiop! Moore led the way to this perveision by demonstrating that the Lyyptian women must have been be nutiful because they were 'the country women of Cleopatra.' Here we have a sorof counter demonstration that Cleopatra must have been a fright because she was the countrywoman of the I gyptimes. But Cleopatra was a Greek, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes and a lady of Pontus The Ptolemus were Greeks, and whoever will look at their penealism, their coms, and their medals will see how carefully they kept their pure blood uncontaminated by African intermixture. Think of this description and this picture applied to one who, Dio says-and all antiquity confirm him-was 'the most superlatively beautiful of wonen, splended to see and delightful to hear. Sydney Smith (1771-1845), one of the most witty, popular, and influential writers of bis age, was born at Woodford in Essex, 3rd June. He was one of the three sons of an eccentric and improvident gentleman, who out of the wreck of bis fortune was able to give his family a good education The opinion that men of genius more generally inherit their intellectual eminence from the mother than the father is illustrated by this remarkable family, for the mother, Maria Olier, the daughter of a French emigrant, was a woman of strong sense, energy of character, and constitutional vivacity or The eldest son, Robert—best known by his Eton nickname of Bobus-was distinguished as a classical scholar, and adopted the profession of the law, Courtenay, the youngest, went to India,

He obtained in 1794 a curacy in a small village in the midst of Salisbury Plain The squire of the parisb, Mr Beach, four years afterwards engaged him as tutor to his eldest son, and it was arranged that tutor and pupil should proceed to Weimar out, but 'before we could get there, says Sydney Smith, 'Germany became the seat of war, and in stress of politics we put into Edinburgh, where I remained five years? He preached occasionally at an Episcopal chapel there. After two years' residence in Edinburgn, he returned to England to marry at Cheam a Miss Pybus, daughter of a deceased banker The bride's brother, one of Pitt's Lords of the Admiralty, was highly incensed at the marriage of his sister with a decided Whig without fortune, and the prospects of the young pur were far from brilliant But the wife had a small fortune of her own, and she realised £500 by the sale of a necklace her mother had given her The Wiltshire squire added £750 for Sydney's care of his son, and thus the sordid ills of poverty Literature also furnished an addiwere averted The Edinburgh Review was tional resource. started in 1802, and it was Sydney Smith who was the original projector

'The principles of the French Revolution,' he says, 'were then fully afloat, and it is impossible to conceive a more violent and agitated state of Among the first persons with whom I became acquainted were Lord Jeffrey, Lord Murray-late Lord Advocate for Scotland-and Lord Brougham, all of them maintaining opinions upon political subjects a little too liberal for the dynasty of Dundas, then exercising supreme power over the northern division of the island day we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story or flat in Buccleuch Place, the elevated residence of the then Mr Jeffrey I proposed that we should set up a Review, this was acceded to with acclamation I was appointed editor, and remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number of the Edinburgh Review motto I proposed for the Review was, Tentu musam meditamur avena-"We cultivate literature upon a little oatmed" But this was too near the truth to be admitted, and so we took our present grave motto from Publius Syrus, of whom none of us had, I am sure, ever read a single line, and so began what has since turned out to be a very important and able journal When I left Edinburgh it fell into the stronger hands of Lord Jeffrey and Lord Brougham, and reached the highest point of popularity and success?

A not unimportant feature in the scheme was that the writers were to receive for their contributions ten guineas a sheet of sixteen printed pages In 1804 Sydney Smith went to London, officiated for some time as preacher of the Foundling Hospital at £50 per annum, and obtained another preachership in Berkeley Square His sermons were eminently popular, and a course of lectures on Moral Philosophy, delivered in 1804, 1805, and 1806 at the Royal Institution, and published after his death, raised his reputation In Holland House and other select circles his extraordinary conversational powers had already made him famous, and his contributions to the Edinburgh Review brought him much Celat, though their liberal tone and spirit rendered him obnoxious to the party in power During the short Whig administration in 1806-7, he obtained the living of Foston-le Clay in Yorkshire, and here he wrote his most amusing and powerful Letters on the Subject of the Catholics, to my Brother Abraham, who lives in the Country, by Peter Plymley (1807) The success of the Letters was immense—they ran through twenty-one editions. Since the days of Swift, no such irresistible argument had been indited in such masterly political irony.

The Yorkshire clergyman, not content with his clerical work and his literary undertakings, became a farmer next. And having in his youth made some studies in medicine, he occasionally doctored It was his aim to make his poorer parishioners the most of his situation in life, and no man with a tithe of his talents was ever a more contented practical philosopher Patronage came slowly About 1825 the Duke of Devonshire presented him with the living of Londesborough, to hold till the duke's nephew came of age, and in 1828 Lord Lyndhurst, disregarding party considerations, gave him a prebend at Bristol 'Moralists tell you,' he said, 'of the evils of wealth and station, and the happiness of poverty. I have been very poor the greatest part of my life, and have borne it as well, I believe, as most people, but I can safely say that I have been happier every guinea I have gained' Lord Lyndhurst conferred another favour he enabled him in 1829 to exchange Foston for Combe Florey, near Taunton, and the rector and his family removed from Yorkshire to Somerset. In 1831 the advent of the Whigs to power procured for him a prebendal stall at St Paul's political agitation about the Reform Bill drew from his vigorous pen some letters intended for circulation amongst the poor, and several short but pronouncedly liberal speeches, in one of which, delivered at Taunton in 1831, the famous Mrs Partington was introduced

Like Swift, Sydney Smith seems almost never to have taken up his pen from the mere love of composition, but to enforce practical views and opinions on which he felt strongly Though he was a professed joker and convivial wit—'a dinerout of the first lustre,' as he himself described Canning—there is not one of his humorous or witty sallies that does not come in as haturally as if it had been struck out or remembered at the moment it was used In his latter years Sydney Smith waged war with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in a series of Letters addressed to Archdeacon Singleton He thought the Commission had been invested with too much power, and that the interests of the inferior clergy had not been sufficiently regarded, he took up the defence of the rights of Dean and Chapter with warmth and spirit, and his tone was at times none too friendly to his old Whig associates The Letters contain some admirable portrait painting, bordering on caricature, and a characteristic variety of rich illustration In 1839 the death of his youngest brother, Courtenay, in India, put him in possession of £50,000 'in my grand climacteric, I became unexpectedly a rich man? This wealth enabled him to invest money in Pennsylvanian bonds, and when Pennsylvania and other states sought to repudiate the debt due to England, the witty canon of St Paul's took the field, and by a petition and a series of letters roused all Europe against the repudiating states His last work was a short treatise on the use of the Ballot at elections A representative Englishman, manly, fearless, independent, practical, he strove in season and out of season to correct what he deemed abuses, to enforce religious toleration, to expose cant and hypocrisy, and to inculcate timely refor-No politician was ever more disinterested or effective. He had some of the wit of Swift without his coarseness or cynicism, and if inferior to Swift in the high attribute of original inventive genius, he had a peculiar and inimitable breadth of humour and drollery of illustration that served as potent auxiliaries to his clear and logical argument. Shortly after his death was published A Fragment on the Irish Roman Catholic Church Smith discharged with diligence his public and clerical duties, and was much annoyed when persons of a devouter temper assumed that he was indifferent to the creed he professed or was a scoffer at religion Certainly his jests were hardly consistent with a reverent temper, his intimate friends were neither religious nor orthodox, and he himself was frankly and outspokenly hostile to mysticism and fanaticism, to evangelicalism and Methodism (he said Methodists and evangelicals were 'numerous and nasty vermin'), to Puseyism and transcendentalism

Mrs Partington,

I do not mean to be disrespectful, but the attempt of the Lords to stop the progress of reform reminds me very forcibly of the great storm of Sidmouth, and of the conduct of the excellent Mrs Partington on that In the winter of 1824 there set in a great flood upon that town—the tide rose to an incredible height-the waves rushed in upon the bouses-and everything was threatened with destruction. In the midst of this sublime storm, Dame Partington, who lived upon the beach, was seen at the door of her house with mop and pattens, trundling her mop, and squeezing out the sea water, and vigorously pushing away the Atlantic Ocean The Atlantic was roused, Mrs Partington's spirit was up, but I need not tell you that the contest was unequal The Atlantic Ocean beat Mrs Partington. • She was excellent at a slop or a puddle, hnt she sbonld not have meddled with a 1empest (From a Speech at Taunton in 1831)

From Peter Plymley's Letters

The pope has not landed—nor are there any curates sent out after him—nor bas he been hid at St Albans by the Dowager Lady Spencer—nor dined privately at Holland House—nor been seen near Dropmore. If these fears exist—which I do not believe—they exist only in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer [Spencer Perceval], they emanate from his zeal for the Protestant interest, and though they reflect the highest houour upon the delicate irritability of his faith, must certainly be considered as more ambiguous proofs of the sanity and vigour of his understanding. By this time, however, the best informed clergy in the neigh bourhood of the metropolis are convinced that the rumour is without foundation, and though the pope is probably hovering about our coast in a fishing smack, it is most likely he will fall a prey to the vigilance of the cruisers, and it is certain he has not yet polluted the Protestantism of our soil Exactly in the same manner the story of the wooden gods seized at Charing Cross, by an order from the Foreign Office, turns out to be without the shadow of a foundation instead of the angels and archangels mentioned by the informer, nothing was discovered but a wooden image of Lord Mulgrave going down to Chatham as a head piece for the Spanker gun vessel, it was an exact resemblance of his lordship in his military uniform, and therefore as little like a god as can well be imagined

From 'Wit and Humour

Surprise is so essential an ingredient of wit, that no wit will bear repetition, -at least the original electrical feeling produced by any piece of wit can never be renewed There is a sober sort of approbation succeeds at hearing it the second time, which is as different from its original rapid, pungent volatility as a bottle of cham pagne that has been opened three days is from one that has at that very instant emerged from the dark ness of the cellar To hear that the top of Mont Blanc is like an umhrella, though the relation be new to me, is not sufficient to excite surprise the idea is so very obvious, it is so much within the reach of the most ordinary understandings, that I can derive no sort of pleasure from the comparison The relation discovered must be something remote from all the common tracks and sheep-walks made in the mind, it must not be a comparison of colour with colour, and figure with figure, or any comparison which, though individually new, is specifically stale, and to which the mind has been in the habit of making many similar, but it must be something removed from common appreliension, distant from the ordinary haunts of thought-things which are never brought together in the common events of life, and in which the mind has discovered relations by its own subtlety and quickness.

It is imagined that wit is a sort of inexplicable visita tion, that it comes and goes with the rapidity of light ning and that it is quite as unattainable as beauty or I am so much of a contrary way of just proportion thinking, that I am convinced a man might sit down as systematically, and as successfully, to the study of wit as he might to the study of mathematics, and I would answer for it that, by giving up only six hours a day to being witty, he should come on prodigiously before midsummer, so that his friends should hardly know him For what is there to hinder the mind from gradually acquiring a habit of attending to the lighter relations of ideas in which wit consists? Punning grows upon everybody, and punning is the wit of words I do not mean to say that it is so easy to acquire a habit of discovering new relations in ideas as in roords. but the difficulty is not so much greater as to render it insuperable to habit One man is unquestionably much better calculated for it by nature than another, but association, which gradually makes a bad speaker a good one, might give a man wit who had it not, if any man chose to be so absurd as to sit down to acquire it.

I have mentioned puns. They are, I believe, what I titioner in London, solicitor to the Board of Ordnance, and noted for his accomplishments. Both James (1775-1839) and Horatto (usually Horace, 1779-1849) were educated at Chigwell in Essex, and for this retired 'school-boy spot' James ever retained a strong affection. After school days James Smith was articled to his father, was taken into partnership in due time, and in 1812 suc ceeded to the business, as well as to the post of solicitor to the Ordnance. With a quick sense of the ridiculous, a strong passion for the stage and the drama, and a love of London society and manners, Smith became a town wit and humourist -delighting in parodies, dramatic dialogues, and current criticism. His first pieces appear to have been contributed to The Pic-nic newspaper, afterwards merged in The Cabinet He wrote for the London Review, a short lived journal established by Cumberland the dramatist, on the principle that every writer's name must be appended to his critique, and next became a constant writer in The Monthly Mirror, where there appeared a series of parodies and poetical imitations, Horace in London, the joint work of the brothers of the pieces are sprightly and humorous, many only trifling and tedious To London he was as strongly attached as Dr Johnson himself confirmed metropolitan in all his tastes and habits, he would often quaintly observe that London was the best place in summer, and the only place in winter, or quote Dr Johnson's dogma "Sir, the man that is tired of London is tired of existence "" He did sometimes condescend to go as far as Yorkshire to stay with friends But when at a country house he excused himself from joining in a stroll by asking his host to note the gouty shoe he wore, the host only said, 'You don't really mean to say that you have got the gout? I thought you had only put on that shoe to avoid being shown over the improvements'

The Rejected Addresses, 'one of the luckiest hits in literature,' appeared in 1812, having kept James and Horace busy for six weeks directors of Drury Lane Theatre had offered a premium for the best poetical address to be spoken it the opening of the new building, and a casual hint from the secretary of the theatre suggested to the witty brothers a series of humorous addresses, professedly composed by the principal authors of the day. The work was ready by the opening day, but, marvellous to record, it was with difficulty that a publisher could be found, although the authors asked nothing for At length John Miller, a dramatic copyright publisher, undertook to publish and give half profits, should there be any In an advertisement prefixed to the twenty-second edition it is put on record that Mr Murray, who had refused without even looking at the manuscript, purchased the copyright for £131 in 1819, after the book had run through sixteen editions The success of the work was indeed almost unexampled contributions were imitations of Wordsworth, Cobbett, Southey, Coleridge, and Crabbe Horace

The Baby's Début -By W W (Wordsworth)

Spoken in the character of Nancy Lake, a girl eight years of age, who is drawn upon the stage in a child's chaise by Samuel Hughes, her uncle's porter

My brother Jack was nine in May, And I was eight on New Year's Day, So in Kate Wilson's shop Papa (he's my papa and Jack's) Bought me, last week, a doll of wax, And brother Jack a top

Jack's in the pouts, and this it is,
He thinks mine came to more than his,
So to my drawer he goes,
Takes out the doll, and, O my stars!
He pokes her head between the bars,
And melts off half her nose!

Quite cross, a bit of string I beg, And tie it to his peg top's peg, And bang, with might and main, Its head against the parlour door, Off flies the head, and hits the floor, And breaks a window pane This made him cry with rage and spite, Well, let him cry, it serves him right.

A pretty thing, forsooth '
If he's to melt, all scalding hot,
Half my doll's nose, and I am not
To draw his peg top's tooth !

Aunt Hannah heard the window break,
And cried 'O naughty Nancy Lake,
Thus to distress your aunt
No Drury Lane for you to-day!'
And while papa said 'Pooh, she may!'
Mamma said 'No, she shan't!'

Well, after many a sad reproach,
They got into a hackney coach,
And trotted flown the street
I saw them go one horse was hlind,
The tails of both hing down behind,
Their shoes were on their feet.

The chaise in which poor brother Bill Used to be drawn to Pentonville, Stood in the lumber room
I wiped the dust from off the top,
While Molly mopped it with a mop,
And brushed it with a broom

My uncle's porter, Samuel Hughes, Came in at six to black the shoes (I always talk to Sam) So what does he but takes and drags Me in the chaise along the flags, And leaves me where I am

My father's walls are made of brick,
But not so tall and not so thick
As these, and, goodness mc'
My father's beams are made of wood,
But never, never half so good
As these that now I see.

What a large floor! 'tis like a town! The carpet, when they lay it down, Won't hide it, I'll be bound And there's a row of lamps, my eye! How they do blaze! I wonder why They keep them on the ground

At first I caught hold of the wing,
And kept away, hut Mr Thing
Umbob, the prompter man,
Gave with his hand my chaise a shove,
And said 'Go on, my pretty love,
Speak to 'em, little Nan

'You've only got to curtsey, whisp er, hold your chin up, laugh and lisp, And then you're sure to take I've known the day when bruts not quite Thirteen got fifty pounds a night, Then why not Nancy Lake?'

But while I'm speaking, where's papa?

And where's my aunt? and where's mamma?

Where's Jack? Oh, there they sit!

They smile, they nod, I'll go my ways,

And order round poor Billy's chaise,

To join them in the pit

Tell us—for doubtless thou canst recollect—
To whom should we assign the Splanx's fame?
Was Cheops or Cephrenes architect
Of either pyramid that bears his name?
Is Pompey's pillar really a misnomer?
Had Thebes a hundred gates, as sung by Homer?

Perhaps thou wert a mason, and forbidden
By oath to tell the secrets of thy trade—
Then say, what secret melody was hidden
In Memnou's statue, which at sunnse played?
Perhaps thou wert a priest—if so, my struggles
Are vain, for priesteraft never owns its juggles

Perchance that very hand, now pinioned flat,
Has hob a nobbed with Pharaoh, glass to glass,
Or dropped a halfpenny in Homer's hat,
Or doffed thine own to let Qaeen Dido pass,
Or held, by Solomon's own invitation,
A torch at the great Temple's dedication

I need not ask thee if that hand, when armed,
II as any Roman soldier mauled and knuckled,
For thou wert dead, and buried, and embalmed
Ere Romulus and Remus had been suckled
Antiquity appears to have begun
Long after thy princial race was run

Thou couldst develop, if that withered tongue
Might tell us what those sightless orbs have seen,
How the world looked when it was fresh and young,
And the great Deluge still had left it green,
Or was it then so old that history's pages
Contained no record of its early ages?

Still silent, incommunicative elf?
Art sworn to secrecy? then keep thy vows,
But prithee tell is something of thiself,
Reveal the secrets of thy prison house,
Since in the world of spirits thou hast slumbered,
What hast thou seen—what strange adventures numbered?

Since first thy form was in this box extended,
We have, above ground, seen some strange mutations,
The Roman empire has begun and ended,
New worlds have riseu—we have lost old nations,
And countless kings have into dust been humbled,

Didst thou not hear the pother o'er thy head
When the great Persián conqueror, Cambyses,
Marched armies o'er thy tomb with thundering tread,
O'erthrew Osiris, Orus, Apis, Isis,
And shook the pyramids with fear and wonder,
When the gigantic Memuon fell asunder?

Whilst not a fragment of thy flesh has erumbled

If the tomb's secrets may not be confessed,
The nature of thy private life unfold
A heart his throbbed beneath that leathern breast,
And tears adown that dusky check have rolled
Have children climbed those knees, and kissed that face?
What was thy name and station, age and race?

Statue of flesh—immortal of the dead!
Imperishable type of evanescence!
Posthumous man, who quitt'st thy narrow bed,
And standest undecayed within our presence,
Thou wilt hear nothing till the Judgment morning,
When the great trump shall thrill thee with its warning

Why should this worthless tegument endure, If its undying guest be lost for ever? Oh, let us keep the soul embalmed and pure In living virtue, that, when both must sever, Although corruption may our frame consume, The immortal spirit in the skies may bloom.

The Rejected Addresses were edited, with Memoirs, by Epes Sargent (New York, 1871) and P Fitzgerald (1890), Arthur H Beatan published a joint life of the two brothers—James and Horace Smith (1899), and see also Timbs s Lives of the Wits and Humonrists (1862) There is a good paper on the Smiths in the first volume of Hayward's Essays (1858), and an account of the real Rejected Addresses may be found in Blackwood's Magazine for May 1893.

was almost limited to a year at Harrow and matriculation at Oxford, but he early achieved celebrity as a playwright, a punster and matchless improvisatore, and as a practical joker—his greatest performance the Berners Street Hoax (1809), which took in the Lord Mayor, the Duke of Gloucester, and hundreds of thousands of lowher victims 1805 he composed a comic opera, The Soldier's Return, overture and music, as well as dialogues and songs, being entirely by himself. It was highly successful, and young Theodore was ready next year with another after-piece, Catch Him Who Can, which showed Liston and Mathews at their best, and had a great run Hook then produced in rapid succession a series of musical operas-The Invisible Girl, Music Mad, Darkness Visible, Trial by Jury, The Fortress, Tekeli, Exchange no Robbery, and Killing no Murder Some of these and his scurrility in controversy, can only partly be excused by reason of the defects of his education, and much of his cleverest work is now all but unread and unknown

An Adventurer

'My dear Johnny,' said the respectable widow Brag to her son, 'what is the good of your going on in this way? Here, instead of minding the business, you are day after day galloping and gallivanting, steeple chasing, for hunting, lord hunting, n wasting your time and your substance, the shop going to Old Nick, and jon getting dipped instead of your candles '

'Mother,' said Jack, 'don't talk so foolishly ' You are of the old school-excellent in your way, but a long way behindhand the business is safe enough You cannot suppose, with the education I have had, I can meddle with moulds, or look after sixes, tens, fours to the pound, or farthing rushlights, -no, thanks to my enlightenment.

I flatter myself I soar a little ligher than that

'No nonsense, Johnny '' said Mrs Brag have now, and all you have spent since your poor father's death, was gained by your father's enlightenment of his customers and how do you suppose I can carry on the trade if you will not now and then attend to it?'

'Take my advice, my dear mother,' said Jack, 'and I'm old enough now not to care a fig for a father in law, -marriage is the plan, as I say to my friend Lord Tom-straight up, right down, and no mistake. Get a sensible, stir about husband, who does not mind grahbing, and hasa t a nose '-

'Hasn't a nose?' interrupted Mrs Brag

'I don't mean literally, said Jack, 'but sportingly,does not mind the particular scent of tallow-you understand? Let him into the tricks of the trade you will still be queen bee of the hive, -make him look after the drones while you watch the wax '

'And while you, Johnny, lap up the honey,' said the queen bee.

'Do what you like,' said her son, 'only marry-"marry come up," as somebody says in n play

'But, John,' said Mrs Brig, 'I have no desire to change my condition 3

'Nor I that you should,' said Jack, 'but I wish you would change your name. As long as "Brag, wax and tallow chandler," sucks up on the front of the house, with three dozen and four dangling dips swinging along the shop front, like so many malefactors expirting their crimes, I live in a perpetual fever lest my numerous friends should inquire whether I am one of the firm or the family

'Johnny,' said Mrs Brag, 'you are a silly fellow What is there to be ashamed of in honest industry? If all the fine folks whom you go a hunting with, and all the rest of it, like yon, and are really glad to see yon, it is for yourself alone, and if they, who must know by your name and nature that you can never be one of themselves, care a button for you, your trade, so as you do not carry it about with you, will do you What difference is it to them how you get your thorough bred horses, your smart scarlet coat, neat tops, and white cords, so as you have them?-they won't give you any new ones when they are gone '

'It is all very well talking,' said Johnny, 'but I never should show my free amongst them if I once thought they guessed at my real trade. I live in a regular worry

If ever a fellow asks me if I was at Melton last year, that moment I think of the shop-" pretty mould of a horse" tingles in my ears-"sweet dip of the country" sets me doubting, and, only last week, a proposal to go 'cross country and meet Lord Hurricane's harriers nt Hampton Wick nearly extinguished me.'

'And what now, Johnny,' said Mrs Brag, 'do you think these lords take you for, if not for a tallow chandler?'

' In independent gentleman,' said Jack.

'That is to say,' replied his mother, 'a gentleman who has nothing to depend upon '

'They look upon me as an agreeable rattle,' said John 'One that has often been in the watchman's hands, too,' said the old lady

'I talk big and ride small,' said Jack, 'I am always up with the liounds-never flineli at anything-am the pride of the field wherever I go-and in steeple chases of infinite value?

'And very little weight, my dear Johnny,' interrupted lus mother

'One of my dearest friends,' continued Brag, 'Lord Tom Towzle, n dcuee of a fellow amongst the females, is going to put me up as a candidate at the "Travellers'"

'What' nders for respectable houses?' said Mrs Brag,

'and a very proper club, too'

'Respectable houses!' said Jack 'Poh! not a hit of it! What! higmen in buggies with boxes of buttons in the boots? No, no ' the "Trivellers'"-par excellence'

'Par what?' said Mrs Brig 'What' d'ye mean the fine Club house in Pall Mall which you showed me the outside of last King's birth night?'

'The same, said Brig 'Now, if I had stuck to the naked, as Lord Tom says-told the plain unvarnished-I never could have qualified. Lord Tom asked me if I should like to belong to the "Travellers', "-in course I said jes-straight up, right down, and no mistake Well, then he asks me if I could qualify,—so not quite understanding him, he says, "Have you ever been in Greece?"-" I es," said I -I might have added "up to the elbows often," didn't though Had him dead Down he whips my name, and calls in Sir Somebody Something out of the street to second me

'If you could but get into a club, Johnny,' said Mrs Brag, 'where they uses gas, and get 'em to give it up and try oil on illumination nights, I'd say something to you -them Travellers has oil as it is But what I think is, somebody is sure to find you out, Johnny '

'Time enough,' said Jack 'I'm going it now smooth and soft across the country, increasing my acquaintance, fulling into the society of elegant females-women of fushion, with beautiful faces and liberal hearts, -intro duced to three last week-proud as peacocks to every body else, delighted with me, -met them at Ascot-cold collation in the carriage-champagne iced from London, -got on capital-never was so happy in my life-hottest weather I ever felt, spirits mounted-I was the delight of the party-told them half a dozen stones of myself, and made them laugh like cockatoos, but I was bundled nll of a heap by the Marquis of Middlesdale, who had been at luncheon with the king, and who, in passing the barouche, gave me a smack on the back you might have heard to Egham, and eried out, "Jack, this is a melting day, isn't it?"'

'He meant it, Johnny, depend upon it,' said Mrs obviously not intended to deceive His originals Barham found everywhere and anywhere, French contes being occasionally drawn on The legends were first collected into a volume in 1840, and the third series was published in 1846, with a brief memoir, an eighty-eighth edition of the whole by the author's daughter, Mrs Bond, appeared in 1894 A collection of Ingoldsby Lyrics was issued in 1881, comprising political skits, parodies, occasional pieces, family poetry, songs, epigrams, poetical epistles, and other miscellanea from various sources—some of them published in one or other of the editions of the Legends, some printed in Barham's Life, and some exhumed from old magazines—so that the Legends and the Lyrics contain all of Barham's poetical work his son thought worth preserving The famous 'parody' of The Burial of Sir John Moore—

Not a sou had he got, not a guinea or groat, And he looked confoundedly flurried, As he bolted away without paying his shot, And the landlady after him hurried—is not really a parody of the poem, but a burlesque piece with a few points imitated, in a measure very skilfully resembling that of the original. There are two or three skits or satires in which the method of 'The house that Jack built' is ingeniously applied, with all the cumulative repetitions, to such subjects as the burning of the Houses of Parliament in 1834. It was published in 1824, when Wolfe's authorship was still debated and the poem was being attributed to Byron, Campbell, and others (see Vol. II p 788), and Barham's jeu d'espret was declared to be the only 'true and original' version, the work of 'Dr Peppercorn' The following were described as 'the last lines of Thomas Ingoldsby'

As I Laye A-Thynkynge

As I laye a thynkynge, a thynkynge, a thynkynge, Merrie sang the Birde as she sat upon the spraye,
There came a noble Knyghte,
With his hauberle chynynge brighte

With his hauberke shynynge brighte, And his gallaut heart was lyghte, Free and gaye,

As I laye a thynkynge, he rode upon his waye

As I laye a thynkynge, a thynkynge, a thynkynge, Sadly sang the Birde as she sat upon the tree!

There seem'd a crimson plain,

As I laye a thynkynge, most pitiful to see!

As I laye a thynkynge, a thynkynge, a thynkynge, Merne sang the Birde as she sat upon the boughe,

> A lovely Mayde came bye, And a gentil Youth was nyghe, And he breathed mane a syghe And a vowe.

As I laye a thynkynge, her heart was gladsome now

As I laye a thynkynge, a thynkynge, a thynkynge, Sadly sang the Birde as she sat upon the thorne,

> No more a Youth was there, But a Maiden rent her haire, And cried in sadde despaire, 'That I was borne!'

As I laye a thynkynge, she perished forlorne

As I laye a thynkynge, a thynkynge, a thynkynge, Sweetly sang the Birde as she sat upon the briar,

There came a lovely childe,
And his face was meek and mild,
Yet joyously he smiled
On his sire.

As I laye a thynkynge, a Cherub mote admire.

But I laye a thynkynge, a thynkynge, a thynkynge, And sadly sang the Birde as it perch'd upon a bier,

That joyous smile was gone,
And the face was white and wan,
As the downe upon the swan
Doth appear,

As I laye a thynkynge,—oh! bitter flow'd the tear!

As I laye a thynkynge, the golden sun was sinking, O, merrie sang that Birde as it glitter'd on her breast

With a thousand gorgeous dyes, While soaring to the skies, 'Mid the stars she seem'd to rise, As to her nest,

As I laye a thynkynge, her meaning was exprest —
'Follow, follow me away,
It boots not to delay,'—

'Twas so she seem'd to saye,
'HERE IS REST!'

The Life and Letters of Barham was published by his son, the Rei R. H D Barham, who was also Hook's biographer (2 vols. 1870, 3rd ed. 1880, 1 vol. ed. 1893).

concerning poetic imagination. I have not been able to raise my mind to the subject, farther than this, that imagination is the faculty by which the poet conceives and produces—that is, images—individual forms, in which are embodied universal ideas or abstractions. This I do comprehend, and I find the most beautiful and striking illustrations of this faculty in the works of Wordsworth himself

The incomparable twelve lines, 'She dwelt among the untrodden vavs,' ending, 'The difference to mel' are finely imagined. They exhibit the powerful effect of the loss of a very obscure object upon one tenderly attached to it. The opposition between the apparent strength of the passion and the insignificance of the object is delightfully conceived, and the object itself well portraved.

September 12th —This was a day of rest, but of enjoy ment also, though the amusement of the day was rather social than arising from the beauties of nature.

I wrote some of my journal in hed. After my break fast I accompanied Mr Wordsworth, Mr Hutton, and a Mr Smith to look at some fields belonging to the late Mr Wordsworth, and which were to be sold by anction this evening. I may here mention a singular illustration of the maxim, 'A prophet is not without honour save in his own country.' Mr Hutton, a very gentlemanly and seemingly intelligent man, asked me, 'Is it true—as I have heard reported—that Mr Wordsworth ever wrote verses?'

A Feast of the Poets.

Afril 4th (1823)—Dined at Monkhouse's. Our party consisted of Wordsworth, Coleridge Lainh, Moore, and Rogers. Five poets of vers unequal worth and most disproportionate popularity, whom the public probably would arrange in a different order. During this after noon Coleridge alone displayed any of his peculiar talent. I have not for years seen him in such excellent health and with so fine a flow of spirits. His discourse was addressed chiefly to Wordsworth, on points of metaphysical criticism—Rogers occasionally interposing a remark. The only one of the poets who seemed not to enjoy himself was Moore. He was very attentive to Coleridge, but seemed to relish I ainb, next to whom he was placed.

Rem -Of this dinner an account is given in Moore's Life, which account is quoted in the Ithenaum of April 23rd, 1853 Moore writes - April 4th, 1823 Dined at Mr Monkhouse's (a gentleman I had never seen before) on Wordsworth's invitation, who lives there whenever he comes to town. A singular party ridge, Rogers, Wordsworth and wife, Charles Lamb (the hero at present of the London Magazine) and his sister (the poor woman who went mad in a diligence on the way to Paris), and a Mr Robinson, one of the minora sidera of this constellation of the Lakes, the host lumself, a Macenas of the school, contributing nothing but good dinners and silence. Charles Lamb, a elever fellow, certainly, but full of villamous and abortive puns, which he miscarries of every minute Some excellent things, however, have come from him' Charles Lamb is indeed praised by a word the most unsuitable imaginable, for he was by no means a clever man, and dear Mary Lamb, a woman of singular good sense, who when really herself, and free from the malady that periodically assailed her, was quiet and judicious in an eminent degree—this admirable person is dryly noticed as 'the poor woman who went mad in a diligence,' &c Moore is not to be blamed for thisthey were strangers to him. The Athenaum reviewer, who quotes this passage from Moore, remarks 'The tone is not to our liking,' and it is added 'We should like to see Lamb's account' This occasioned my send lng to the Athenaum (June 25th, 1853) a letter by Lamb to Bernard Barton - DEAR SIR,-I washed for I dined in Parnassus with Wordsworth, you yesterday Colendge, Rogers, and Tom Moore, half the poetry of England constellated in Gloueester Place. It was a delightful evening! Coloridge was in his finest vein of talk—had all the talk and let 'em talk as evilly as they do of the envy of poets, I am sure not one there but was content to be nothing but a listener The Muses were dumb while Apollo lectured on his and their fine It is a he that poets are envious. I have known the best of them, and can speak to it that they give each other their ments and are the kindest critics as well as best authors. I am seribbling a muddy epistle with an aclung head, for ve did not quaff Hippocrene last night, marry! It was hippocrass rather?

Lamb was in a happy frame, and I can still recall to my mind the look and tone with which he addressed Moore when he could not articulate very distinctly 'Mister Moore, will you drink a glass of wine with me?'—sming the action to the word, and hobnobling Then he went on 'Mister Moore, till now I have always felt an antipathy to you, but now that I have seen you I shall like you ever after' Some years after I mentioned this to Moore. He recollected the fact, but not Lamb's amusing manner. Moore's talent was of another sort, for many years he had been the most brilliant man of his company. In anecdote, small tall, and especially in singing he was supreme, but he was no match for Coleridge in his vein. As little could be feel Lamb's humour.

Besides these five hards were no one but Mrs Words worth, Miss Hutchinson, Mary I amb, and Mrs Gilman I was at the bottom of the table, where I very ill performed my part.

Goethe at Welmar

August 2nd (1829) - A golden day! Voigt and I left Jena before seven, and in three hours were at Weimar Having left our cards at Goethe's dwelling house, we proceeded to the garden house in the park, and were at once admitted to the great man. I was aware, by the present of medals from him, that I was not forgotten, and I had heard from Hall and others that I was expected Let I was oppressed by the kindness of his reception. We found the old man in his cottage in the park, to which he retires for solitude from his town house, where are his son, his daughter in law, and three grandchildren He generally eats and drinks alone, and when he invites a stranger, it is to a tête-à tête This is a wise sparing of his strength Twenty seven years ago I thus described him - In Goethe I beheld an elderly man of terrific dignity, a penetrating and insupportable eye-"the eye, like Jove, to threaten or command "-a somewhat aquiline nose, and most expres sive lips, which when closed seemed to be making an effort to move, as if they could with difficulty keep their hidden treasures from bursting forth. His step was firm, ennobling an otherwise too corpulent body, there was ease in his gestures, and he had a free and enkindled air' Now I beheld the same eye, indeed, but the evebrows were become thin, the cheeks were furrowed, the lips no longer curled with fearful com pression, and the lofty, erect posture had sunk to a gentle stoop Then he never honoured me with a look after the first haughty bow, now he was all courtesy 'Well, you are come at last,' he said, 'we have waited years for you How is my old friend Knebel? You liave given him youth again, I have no doubt.' his room, in which there was a French bed without curtains, hung two large engravings one, the well known panoramic view of Rome, the other, the old square engraving, an imaginary restoration of the ancient public buildings Both of these I then possessed, but I have now given them to University Hall, London spoke of the old engraving as what delighted him, as showing what the scholars thought in the fifteenth The opinion of scholars is now changed like manner he thought favourably of the panoramic view, though it is incorrect, including objects which cannot be seen from the same spot

I had a second chat with him late in the evening We talked much of Lord Byron, and the subject was renewed afterwards. To refer to detached subjects of conversation, I ascertained that he was unacquainted with Burns's 'Vision'. This is most remarkable, on account of its close resemblance to the Zuagnung (dedication) to his own works, because the whole logic of the two poems is the same. Each poet confesses his infirmities, each is consoled by the Muse—the holly leaf of the Scotch poet being the 'veil of dew and sun beams' of the German. I pointed out this resemblance to Frau von Goethe, and she acknowledged it.

This evening I gave Goethe an account of De Lamen nais, and quoted from him a passage importing that all truth comes from God, and is made known to us by the Church. He held at the moment a flower in his hand, and a beautiful butterfly was in the room. He exclaimed, 'No donbt all truth comes from God, but the Chnrch! There's the point. God speaks to us through this flower and that butterfly, and that's a language these Spitzbuben don't understand' Something led him to speak of Ossian with contempt. I remarked, 'The taste for Ossian is to be ascribed to you in a great measure. It was Werter that set the fashion' smiled, and said, 'That's partly true, but it was never perceived by the critics that Werter praised Homer while he retained his senses, and Ossian when he was going mad But reviewers do not notice such things' I reminded Goethe that Napoleon loved Ossian was the contrast with his own nature,' Goethe replied 'He loved soft and melancholy music. Werter was among his books at St Helena.'

We spoke of the emancipation of the Catholics Goethe said, 'My daughter will be glad to talk about it, I take no interest in such matters' On my leaving him the first evening, he kissed me three times. (I was always before disgusted with man's kisses.) Voigt never saw him do so much to any other

He pressed me to spend some days at Weimar on my return, and, indeed, afterwards induced me to protract my stay I was there from the 13th of August till the 19th

The three volumes of the Diary (of which there was a new edition in 1872) contain but gleanings from a plentiful crop garnered in upwards of a hundred MS volumes of Diary, Journals of tours, Letters Reminiscences and Anecdotes, preserved in Dr Williams's library in Gordon Square, London.

John Wilson Croker (1780-1857), the last and most indefatigable of the original corps of the Quarterly Review, was born at Galway, the son of the Surveyor-General of Customs and Excise in Ireland Educated at Portarlington and Trinity College, Dublin, in 1800 he entered Lincoln's Inn, but in 1802 was called to the Irish Bar His first literary attempts were satirical—Familiar Epistles on the Irish Stage (1804) and An Intercepted Letter from Canton (1805), a satire on certain politicians and magnates in Dublin These trifles were followed by Songs of Trafalgar (1806) and A Sketch of Ireland, Past and Present (1807), a pamphlet advocating Catholic emancipation Entering Parliament for Downpatrick (1807), he in 1809 warmly defended the Duke of York over the Mary Anne Clarke scandal, and was rewarded with the post of Secretary to the Admiralty, which he held for nearly twenty-two years, until he retired in 1830 with a pension of £1500. In 1809 he published anonymously The Battles of Talavera, a poem in the style of Scott, on which Wellington remarked that he had never thought 'a battle could be turned into anything so entertaining? In the same style Mr Croker commemorated The Battle of Albuera (1811), apparently the last of his poetic efforts. He was now busy with the Quarterly Review, which he had helped to found in 1809 His articles were mainly personal or historical—attacks on Whigs and Jacobins, or rectifications of dates and facts regarding public characters and events He it was who, as the reviewer of Keats's Endymion in September 1818, incurred Byron's famous catechetical criticism

Who killed John Keats?, I, says the Quarterly, So savage and Tartarly, 'Twas one of my feats

The article in three pages of abuse styles Keats a copyist of Leigh Hunt, 'more unintelligible, almost as rugged, twice as diffuse, and ten times more tiresome and absurd than his prototype? Lady Morgan's Italy was despatched in the same trenchant style. One of Croker's most brilliant 'feats' in this way was his success in mortifying the vanity of Fanny Burney (Madame D'Arblay), who wished to have it believed that she was only seventeen when her novel of Evelina was published She is said to have kept up the delusion without exactly giving the date, but the reviewer, knowing that she was born at Lynn in Norfolk, had the parishregister examined, and found that she was baptised in June 1752, and consequently, instead of being a youthful prodigy, was between twenty-five and twenty-six years of age when Evelina appeared. Croker's success in this species of literary statistics led him afterwards to apply it to the case of the Empress Josephine and Napoleon, he had the French registers examined, and from them proved that both Josephine and Napoleon had falsified their ages This fact, with other disparaging details, the reviewer brought out in a paper that the Duke of Wellington (who was seriously annoyed by the mistimed reminiscence) had deprived him of his dinner at Oporto in 1809, Two of the later conand at Waterloo in 1815 tributions to the Review by Croker made considerable noise - those on Macaulay's History and Moore's Memoirs In Macaulay's case, Rogers said Croker 'attempted murder, but only committed suicide.' With Moore the reviewer had been on friendly terms They were countrymen and college acquintances, and when Lord John Russell pub lished the poet's journals for the benefit of his widow, a generous friend of the dead man would have abstained from harsh comments plied the scalpel unsparingly, the editor remarked on the critic's 'safe malignity,' and Croker retaliated by showing that Moore had been recording unfavourable notices of Lord John in his journal at the very time that he was cultivating his acquaintance by letters and soliciting favours at his hands Lord John's faults as an editor were also unsparingly exposed, and on the whole, in all but good feeling, Croker was triumphant in this passage at-arms. Disraeli satirised him in Coningsby as 'Rigby,' the jackal of 'Lord Monmouth' (Hertford), and Macaulay, as is well known, 'detested him more than cold boiled veal' Yet Croker did service to literature by his annotated edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson, and his publication of the Suffolk Papers, the Letters of Lady Hervey, and Lord Hervey's Memoirs of the Court of George II He wrote Stories from the History of England for Children, which served as a model for Sir Walter Scott's Tales of a Grandfather, and he collected some of his contributions to the Review as Essays on the Early Period of the French Revo-At his death he was preparing an edition of Pope's works, which passed into the hands of the Rev Whitworth Elwin Croker's publications numbered nearly a score, and his Correspondence and Diaries were edited by Louis J Jennings (3 vols 1884) George Croly (1780-1860) was a voluminous writer in poetry, history, fiction, exegetical and polemical theology, politics, &c. Born in Dublin, and educated at Trinity College, he took orders in 1804, and coming in 1810 to London, was appointed rector of St Stephen's, Walbrook, in He wrote industriously for Blackwood's

(2 vols 1830), and The Modern Orlando, a satirical poem (1846) He edited the works of Jeremy Taylor and the poems of Pope The most important of his theological works is The Apocalypse of St John, a new Interpretation (1827), but he published also on providence, baptism, the papal aggression, and the deceased wife's sister, while his historical writings include a series of Sketches, n Character of Curran, The Political Life of Burke, and The Personal History of King George the Fourth There were also books on the Holy Land, a history of the defence of Hamburg against Davoût, and three volumes of Tales of the Great St Bernard-a series of stories supposed to be told to relieve the monotony of imprisonment by bad weather at the hospice, the Englishman, the Italian, and the rest of the storm-stayed travellers each telling his tale The romances Salathici (1829) and Marston, Soldier and Statesman (1846), are sharply contrasted in subject as in other things -the latter a tale of modern public life, the former the part of the story of the Wandering Jew and his trigic adventures till after the siege of Salathul was greeted on its appear-Jerusalem ance by the Athenaum (then but two years old) as 'one of the most splendid productions among works of fiction that the age has brought forth, and was by other reviews compared with the most powerful of Shakespeare's dramas. ## Pericles and Aspasia.

This was the ruler of the land, When Athens was the land of fame, This was the light that led the band, When each was like a living flame, The centre of earth's noblest ring, Of more than men, the more than Ling

Yet not by fetter, nor by speur, His sovereignty was held or won Teared-but alone as freemen fear, Loved-but as freemen love alone, He waved the sceptre o'er his kind By nature's first great title-mind !

Resistless words were on his tongue, Then Eloquence first flashed below, Full armed to life the portent spring, Minerva from the Thunderer's brow! And his the sole, the sacred hand, That shook her ægis o'er the land

And throned immortal by his side, A woman sits with eye sublime, Aspasia, all his spirit's bride, But if their solemn love were crime, Pity the beauty and the sage,
Their crime was in their darkened age
He perished, but his wreath was won,
He perished in his height of fame
Then sunk the cloud on Athens' sun,
Yet still she conquered in his name.
Filled with his soul, she could not die,
Her conquest was Posterity!

The French Army in Russia.

Magnificence of ruin ' what has time
In all it ever gazed upon of war,
Of the wild rage of storm, or deadly clime,
Seen, with that battle's vengeance to compare?
How glorious shone the invaders pomp afar '
Like pampered lions from the spoil they came,
The land before them silence and despair,
The land behind them massacre and flame, [name Blood will have tenfold blood What are they now? A

Homeward by hundred thousands, column deep, Broad square, loose squadron, rolling like the flood When mighty torrents from their channels leap, Rushed through the land the haughty multitude, Billow on endless billow, on through wood, O'er rugged hill, down sunless, marshy vale, The death devoted moved, to clangour rude Of drum and horn, and dissonant clash of mail, Glancing disastrous light before that sunbeam pale.

Agun they reached thee, Borodino' still Upon the loaded soil the carnage lay,
The human harvest, now stark, stiff, and chill,
Friend, foe, stretched thick together, clay to clay,
In vain the startled legions burst away,
The land was all one naked sepulchre,
The shrinking eye still glanced on grim decay,
Still did the lioof and wheel their passage tear, [drear
Through cloven helms and arms, and corpses mouldering

The field was as they left it, fosse and fort Steaming with slaughter still, but desolate,
The camion flung dismantled by its port,
Each knew the mound, the black ravine whose strait
Was won and lost, and thronged with dead, till fate
Had fixed upon the victor—half undone
There was the hill, from which their eyes elate
Had seen the burst of Moseow's golden zone, [on.
But death was at their heels, they shuddered and rushed

The hour of vengeance strikes. Hark to the gale! As it bursts hollow through the rolling clouds, That from the north in sullen grandeur sail Like floating Alps. Advancing darkness broods Upon the wild horizon, and the woods, Now sinking into brambles, echo shrill, As the gusts sweep them, and those upper floods Shoot on their leafless boughs the sleet-drops chill, That on the hurrying crowds in freezing showers distil

They reach the wilderness! The majesty
Of solitude is spread before their gize,
Stern nakedness—dark earth and wrathful sky
If ruins were there, they long had ceased to blaze,
If blood was shed, the ground no more betrays,
I win by a skeleton, the crime of man,
Behind them rolls the deep and drenching haze,
Wrapping their rear in might, before their van
The struggling daylight shows the unmeasured desert wan.

Still on they sweep, as if their hurrying march
Could bear them from the rushing of His wheel
Whose chariot is the whirlwind. Heaven's clear arch
At once is covered with a livid veil,
In mixed and fighting heaps the deep clouds reel,
Upon the dense horizon hangs the sun,
In singuine light, an orb of burning steel,
The snows wheel down through twilight, thick and dun,
Now tremble, men of blood, the judgment has begun!

The trumpet of the northern winds has blown,
And it is answered by the dying roar
Of armies on that boundless field o'erthrown
Now in the awful gusts the desert hoar
Is tempested, a sea without a shore,
Lifting its feathery waves The legions fly,
Volley on volley down the hailstones pour,
Blind, famished, frozen, mad, the wanderers die,
And dying, hear the storm but wilder thunder by

Satan from a Picture by Sir Thomas Lawrence
'Satan dilated stood —Milton

Prince of the fallen! around thee sweep The billows of the burning deep, Above thee lowers the sullen fire, Beneath thee bursts the flaming spire, And on thy sleepless vision rise Hell's living clouds of agonies.

But thou dost like a mountain stand,
The spear uplifted in thy hand,
Thy gorgeous eye—a comet shorn,
Calm into utter darkness borne,
A naked giant, stern, sublime,
Armed in despair, and scorning Time.

On thy curled lip is throned disdain,
That may revenge, but not complain
Thy mighty cheek is firm, though pale,
There smote the blast of fiery hail
Yet wan, wild beauty lingers there,
The wreck of an archangel's sphere

Thy forehead wears no diadem
The king is in thy eyeball's beam,
Thy form is grandeur unsubdued,
Sole Chief of Hell's dark multitude.
Thou prisoned, ruined, unforgiven!
Yet fit to master all but Heaven

Charles Calcb Colton.—A once popular collection of apophthegms and moral reflections was published in 1820-22 under the title of Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words, addressed to those who Think, six editions of it appeared within a twelvemonth. The history of its author conveys a moral probably more striking than even the best of his maxims Rev Charles Caleb Colton (c. 1780-1832) passed in 1796 from Eton to King's College, Cambridge, and in 1801 obtained a fellowship and the college living of Prior's Portion near Tiverton, in 1818 that of Kew and Petersham A great fisherman and sportsman generally, he was eccentric to a degree, for a time he carried on a wine-merchant's business, and he would go abroad in military dress About 1823 gambling and extravagance forced him to leave England, and for a time he lived in America and in Paris In the French capital he is said to have been so successful as a gamester that in two years he realised £25,000 For fear of a surgical operation he shot himself at Fontamebleau 28th April 1832 Besides Lacon, he published a satire on hypocrisy, a poem on Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, and one or two trifles. His somewhat pretentious moralising is exemplified in such shorter extracts from Lacon as 'Bigotry murders religion to frighten fools with her ghost,' 'Ignorance is a blank sheet on which we may write, but error is a scribbled one on which we must first erase,' and these longer ones

Mystery and Intrigue

There are minds so habituated to intrigue and mystery in themselves, and so prone to expect it from others, that they will never accept of a plain reason for a plain fact, if it be possible to devise causes for it that are obscure, far fetched, and usually not worth the carriage. Like the miser of Berkshire, who would ruin a good horse to escape a tumpike, so these gentlemen ride their high bred theories to death, in order to come at truth, through by paths, lanes, and alleys, while she herself is jogging quietly along upon the high and beaten road of common sense. The consequence is, that those who take this mode of arriving at truth are sometimes before her, and sometimes behind her, but very seldom with her Thus the great statesman who relates the conspiracy against Doria pauses to deliberate upon, and minutely to scrutinise into, divers and sundry errors committed and opportunities neglected whereby he would wish to account for the total failure of that spirited enter prise But the plain fact was, that the scheme had been so well planned and digested that it was victo nous in every point of its operation, both on the sea and on the shore, in the harbour of Genoa no less than in the city, until that most unlucky accident befell the Count de Fiesque, who was the very life and soul of the conspiracy In stepping from one galley to another, the plank on which he stood upset, and he fell into the sea. His armour happened to be very heavy, the night to be very dark, the water to be very deep, and the bottom to be very muddy And it is another plain fact that water, in all such cases, happens to make no distinction whatever between a conqueror and a cat.

Magnanimity in a Cottage

In the obscurity of retirement, amid the squalid poverty and revolting privations of a cottage, it has often been my lot to witness scenes of magnanimity and self-demal as much beyond the belief as the practice of the great, a heroism borrowing no support either from the gaze of the many or the admiration of the few, yet flourishing amidst ruins and on the confines of the grave, a spectacle as stupeadous in the moral world as the falls of the Missouri in the natural, and, like that mighty cataract, doomed to display its grandeur only where there are no eyes to appreciate its magnificence.

Charles Waterton (1782-1865), born at Walton Hall, Wakefield, and educated at the Roman Catholic college of Stonyhurst, went out about 1804 to Denierara to manage some family estates, and determined in 1812 to wander 'through the wilds of Demerara and Essequibo, with the view to reach the inland frontier fort of Portuguese Guiana, to collect a quantity of the strongest Wourali (Curari) poison, and to catch and stuff the beautiful birds which abound in that part of South America? He made two more journeys, amidst difficulties unspeakable, through Brazil and Guiana-in 1816 and 1820-and in 1825 published his most entertaining Wanderings in South America, the North west of the United States, and 'In order to pick up matter for the Antilles natural history, I have wandered through the wildest parts of South America's equinoctial regions. I have attacked and slain a modern python, and rode on the back of a cayman close to the water's edge, a very different situation from that of a Hyde-Park dandy on his Sunday prancer before the ladies Alone and barefoot I have pulled poisonous snakes out of their lurkingplaces, climbed up trees to peep into holes for bats and vampires, and for days together hastened through sun and rain to the thickest parts of the forest to procure specimens I had never seen before' The python and cayman made much noise and amusement at the time, and the conquest of the cayman was made the subject of a caricature Waterton had long wished to obtain one of the huge (non-venomous) Coulacanara snakes, and at length he saw one coiled up in his den He advanced towards him stealthily, and with his lance struck him behind the neck and fixed him to the ground

A Snake Story

That moment the negro next to me seized the lance and held it firm in its place, while I dashed head fore most into the den to grapple with the snake, and to get hold of his tail before he could do any mischief On pinning him to the ground with the lance, he gave a tremendous loud hiss, and the little dog ran away, howling as he went. We had a sharp fray in the dea, the rotten sticks flying on all sides, and each party struggling for the superiority I called out to the second negro to throw himself upon me, as I found I was not heavy enough He did so, and his additional weight was of great service. I had now got firm hold of his tail, and after a violent struggle or two he gave in, finding himself overpowered This was the moment to secure him So while the first negro continued to hold the lance firm to the ground, and the other was helping me, I contrived to unloose my braces, and with them tied up the snake's mouth The snake, now finding himself in an unpleasant situation, tried to better himself, and set resolutely to work, but we overpowered him We contrived to make him twist himself round the shaft of the lance, and then prepared to convey him out of the forest. I stood at his head and held it firm under my arm, one negro supported the belly, and the other the tail In this order we began to move slowly towards home, and reached it after resting ten times

Next day Waterton killed the snake, which was fourteen feet long and enormously thick. The cay man or alligator was found on the Essequibo after three days' waiting and seeking, and caught with a shark hook baited with a large fish. The difficulty was to pull him up. The Indians proposed shooting him with arrows, but this the 'Wanderer' resisted. 'I had come above three hundred miles on purpose to catch a cayman uninjured, and not to carry back a mutilated specimen'. The men pulled with a will, and out he came at last, the modern St George standing armed with the mast of the canoe, which he proposed to force down the dragon's throat.

How to catch a Cayman.

By the time the cayman was within two yards of me, I saw lie was in a state of fear and perturbation, I instantly dropped the mast, sprang up, and jumped on his back, turning half round as I vaulted, so that I gained my seat with my face in a right position immediately seized his fore legs, and by main force twisted them on his back, thus they served me for a He now seemed to have recovered from his surprise, and, probably fancying himself in hostile company, he began to plunge furiously, and lashed the sand with his long and powerful tail. I was out of reach of the strokes of it, by being near his head. He continued to plunge and strike, and made my seat very uncomfort able It must have been a fine sight for an unoccupied spectator The people roared out in triumph, and were so vociferous that it was some time before they heard me tell them to pull me and my beast of burden further I was apprehensive the rope might break, and then there would have been every chance of going down to the regions under water with the cayman would have been more perilous than Arion's marine morning ride-'Delphini insidens, vada cærula sulcat Arion' The people now dragged us above forty yards on the sand it was the first and last time I was ever on a cayman's back. Should it be asked how I managed to keep my seat, I would answer, I hunted some years with Lord Darlington's fox hounds.

The cayman, killed and stuffed, was, like the python's skin, added to the curiosities of Walton Waterton's next work was Essays on Hall Natural History, chiefly Ornithology, with an Autobiography of the Author (three series, 1838-57, ed. by J G Wood, 1878) count of his family-an old Roman Catholic line that had suffered persecution from the days of Henry VIII downwards-is a quaint, amusing chronicle, and the notes on the habits of birds show minute observation and vivid characterisa tion (sometimes after the manner of White of Selborne), as well as the kindly, genial spirit of the eccentric squire. The ancient wanderer died from a fall when carrying a log in his own grounds (as Abyssinian Bruce from a fall down his own staircase), and was buried with all the ceremony prescribed by himself between two favourite oaks beside a lake in his own park. There is a Life of him by Richard Hobson (1865)

Ann and Jane Taylor were members of an English Nonconformist family so distinguished through five generations in literature and art as to have been made the subject of researches in heredity by Mr Gulton Their father, Isaac Taylor (1759–1829), the second of four Isaacs, was, like his father before him, an engraver of some eminence. He had an uncle, Charles Taylor (1756-1821), who edited Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, and another, Josiah, who became eminent as a publisher of architectural works The father of Ann and Jane, besides his engraving business, took a warm interest in the affairs of the 'meeting-house,' and in 1796 became pastor of an Independent congregation at Colchester, in 1811 at Ongar-whence the famous kin became known as 'the Taylors of Ongar' (as distinguished from 'the Taylors of Norwich,' see Vol II p 712) His wife (born Ann Martin) had literary impulses, and published Maternal Solicitude (1814), The Family Mansion (1819), and other tales, and a series of educational works The daughters, Ann (1782-1866) and Jane (1783-1824), were born in London, but brought up from 1786 at Lavenham in Suffolk, where their father had, for the sake of economy, taken up his residence. His daughters assisted in the engraving, working steadily at their allotted tasks from their thirteenth or fourteenth year, and paying their share of the family expenses They began their literary career in 1798 by contributing to a cheap annual, The Minor's Pocket-Book, the publishers of which induced them to undertake a volume of verses for children. Accordingly in 1804-5 there appeared Original Poems for Infant Minds, which were followed by Rhymes for the Nursery (1806), Hymns for Infant Minds (1810), Rural Scenes, City Scenes, &c. The hymns, somewhat analogous to Dr Watts's, were highly popular, were praised by men as eminent and as unlike one another as Dr Arnold and Archbishop Whately, and are still familiar-'My Mother' and 'Twinkle, Twinkle, little Star,' can surely never become obsolete in the nursery Jane Taylor was authoress of a tale, Display (1815), and of Essays in Rhyme (1816) and Contributions of Q Q. Ann married in 1813 a Congregational minister, the Rev Joseph Gilbert (1779-1852), who settled at Nottingham in 1825, and published The Christian Atonement, &c., a memoir of him was written by his widow. When she also was removed, her son, Josiah Gilbert, an accomplished artist, and author of The Dolomite Mountains, Cadore, or Titian's Country, &c., published in 1874 Autobiography and other Memorials of Mrs Gilbert (Ann Taylor) Each of the accomplished sisters has bequeathed to the Christian Church at least one hymn of universal acceptation, Mrs Gilbert having written 'Great God, and wilt thou condescend,' Jane Taylor's best known is 'Lord, I would own thy tender care.' brother, Isaac Taylor (1787-1865), became still more distinguished as an author, a notice of him will be found at page 244 For a recent notice of

From 'The Song of the Tea-Kettle'
By ANN TALLOR

Since first began my ominous song,
Slowly have passed the ages long
Slow was the world my worth to glean,
My visible secret long unseen '
Surly, apart the nations dwelt,
Nor yet the magical impulse felt,
Nor deemed that charity, science, art,
All that doth honour or wealth impart,
Spell bound, till mind should set them free,
Slumbered, and sung in their sleep—in me'
At length the day in its glory rose,
And off on its speed—the Engine goes!

On whom first fell the amazing dream? Watt woke to fetter the giant Steam, His fury to crush to mortal rule, And wield Leviathan as his tool! The monster, breathing disaster wild, Is tamed and cheeked by a tutor child, Ponderous and blind, of rudest force, A pin or a whisper guides its course, Around its sinews of iron play. The viewless bonds of a mental sway, And triumphs the soul in the mighty dower, To knowledge, the plighted boon—is Power!

Hark! 'tis the din of a thousand wheels
At play with the fleeces of England's fields,
From its bed upraised, 'tis the flood that pours
To fill little cisterns at cottage doors,
'Tis the many fingered, intricate, bright machine,
With its flowery film of lace, I ween!
And see where it rushes, with silvery wreath,
The span of you arched cave beneath,
Stupendous, vital, fiery, bright,
Trailing its length in a country's sight,
Riven are the rocks, the hills give way,
The dim valley rises to unfelt day,
And man, fitly crowned with brow sublime,
Conqueror of distance reigns, and time.

Lone was the shore where the hero mused, His soul through the unknown leagues transfused, His perilous bark on the ocean strayed, And moon after moon, since its anchor weighed, On the solitude strange and drear, did shine. The untracked ways of that restless brine, Till at length, his shattered sail was furled, Mid the golden sands of a western world! Still centuries passed with their measured tread, While winged by the winds the nations sped, And still did the moon, as she watched that deep, Her triple task o'er the voyagers keep, And sore farewells, as they hove from land, Spake of absence long, on a distant strand

She starts—wild winds at her bosom rage, She laughs in her speed at the war they wage, In queenly pomp on the surf she treads, Scarce waking the sea things from their beds Fleet as the lightning tracks the cloud, She glances on, in her glory proud,

A few bright suns, and at rest she lies, Glittering to transatlantic skies! Simpleton man! why, who would have thought To this, the song of a tea kettle brought!

> The Squire's Pew By Jane Taylor.

A slanting ray of evening light
Shoots through the yellow pane,
It makes the faded erimson bright,
And gilds the fringe again
The window's Gothie framework falls
In oblique shadow on the walls

And since those trappings first were new,
How many a cloudless day,
To rob the velvet of its hue,
Has come and passed away!
How many a setting sun hath made
That curious lattice work of shade?

Crumbled beneath the hillock green
The cunning hand must be That carved this fretted door, I ween—
Acorn and fleur de lis,
And now the worm hath done her part
In minucking the chisel's art

In days of yore—that now we call—
When James the First was king,
The courtly knight from yonder hall
His train did hither bring,
All seated round in order due,
With broidered suit and buckled shoe.

On damask cushions, set in fringe,
All reverently they knelt
Prayer book with brizen hasp and hinge,
In ancient English spelt,
Each holding in a hily hand,
Responsive at the priest's command

Now streaming down the vaulted aisle,
The sunbeam, long and lone,
Illumes the characters awhile
Of their inscription stone,
And there, in marble hard and cold,
The knight and all his train behold

Outstretched together are expressed He and my lady fair, With hands uplifted on the breast, In attitude of prayer, Long visaged, elad in armour, he, With ruffled arm and bodiec, she.

Set forth in order as they died,
The numerous offspring bend,
Devoutly kneeling side by side,
As though they did intend
For past omissions to atone
By saying endless prayers in stone.

Those mellow days are past and dim,
But generations new,
In regular descent from him,
Have filled the stately pew,
And in the same succession go
To occupy the vault below

And now the polished, modern squire
And his gay train appear,
Who duly to the hall retire,
A season every year—
And fill the seats with belle and beau,
As 'twas so many years ago

Perchance, all thoughtless as they tread
The hollow sounding floor
Of that dark house of kindred dead
Which shall, as heretofore,
In turn, receive to silent rest
Another and another guest—

The feathered hearse and sable train,
In all its wonted state
Shall wind along the village lane,
And stand before the gate,
Brought many a distant county through
To join the final rendezvous.

And when the race is swept away
All to their dusty beds,
Still shall the mellow evening ray
Shine gaily o'er their heads
Whilst other faces, fresh and new,
Shall occupy the squire's pew

Mary Russell Mitford, the graphic and sympathetic portrayer of English country life in its happiest aspects, was born at Alresford, Hampshire, 16th December 1787 Her father, a selfish, extravagant physician (without practice), for her tenth birthday bought her a lottery-ticket, which drew a prize of £20,000, hereupon she was sent to a good school at Chelsea, and Dr Mitford built himself a big house near Reading Hither Mary returned in 1802, and here in 1810 she, long an omnivorous reader, produced her first volume, Miscellaneous Poems Christina, Blanche of Castile, and Poems on the Female Character followed, but attracted little notice. Meanwhile she and all about him were suffering for her handsome and accomplished father's reckless and selfish extravagance and high play 'His wife's large fortune, his daughter's, his own patrimony all passed through his hands in an incredibly short space of time, but his wife and daughter were never heard to complain of his conduct, nor appeared to admire him less? In 1820 the family had to move to a cottage at Three-Mile Cross, and Miss Mitford had now to write for its support, she was content to slave that her unconscionable father might have utterly useless luxuries—and he took them without scruple, she overtaxed her strength and literary gift by her perverse and blameworthy devotion to the reprobate, and her selfdenial was even misunderstood and misjudged as grasping and miserly. In 1823 was produced her tragedy of Julian, dedicated to Macready, 'for the zeal with which he befriended the production of a stranger, for the judicious alterations which he suggested, and for the energy, the pathos, and the skill with which he more than embodied its principal character? But Julian ran only eight nights, Foscari ran fifteen, and Rienzi, her best and most successful play, was acted forty-five times, and was sold to the number of four thousand copies. Charles I and other dramatic pieces had their vogue, but Miss Mitford's triumph was to be won on other fields. Her best work began as a serial in 1819 in a magazine, and in 1823 appeared in volume form as Our Village, Sketches of Rural Character and Scenery, to which four other volumes were added, the fifth and last in 1832 one,' said Henry Chorley, 'now knows Our Village, and every one knows that the nooks and corners, the haunts and the copses, so delightfully described in its pages will be found in the immediate neighbourhood of Reading, and more especially around Three-Mile Cross, a cluster of cottages on the Basingstoke Road, in one of which our authoress resided for many years so little were the peculiar and original excellence of her descriptions understood, in the first instance, that, after having gone the round of rejection through the more important periodicals, they at last saw the light in no worthier publication than the Lady's Magazine But the series of rural pictures grew, and the venture of collecting them into a separate volume was tried. The public began to relish the style, so fresh, yet so finished -to enjoy the delicate humour and the simple pathos of the tales, and the result was that the popularity of these sketches outgrew that of the works of loftier order proceeding from the same pen, that young writers, English and American, began to imitate so artless and charming a manner of narration, and that an obscure Berkshire hamlet, by the magic of talent and kindly feeling, was converted into a place of resort and interest for not a few of the finest spirits of the age.' The book, as Chorley said, has become really a classic, has 'created a school of minute home landscape painters in pen and ink analogous to that of the Cuyps and Holbeins of the Low Countries,' and founded a fashion in literature, Charles Lamb, Christopher North, and Harriet Martineau recognised in Our Village a new and delightful branch of art, and Mrs S C Hall took thence her impulse for the Sketches of Irish Character Mrs Richmond Ritchie speaks of Our Village as 'one of the books that are part of everybody's life as a matter of course' Miss Mitford's intimate friend, Miss Barrett, called her 'a sort of prose Crabbe in the sun.' Her keen observation and shrewdness, her generous and gentle wisdom, her humour, her original turns of thought and expression, the singular clearness and purity of her style, are all equally apparent in her work. Mrs Richmond Ritchie admires it less for 'its actual descriptions and pictures of intelligent villagers and greyhounds' than for 'the more imaginative things, the sense of space and nature and progress which she knows how to convey, the sweet and emotional chord she strikes with so true a touch' Belford Regis (1835) is a novel with much work cognite to Our Village, and passed through three editions In 1837 Miss Mitford received a pension of £100, in 1842 she was at last relieved of the burden (which, though she never said so, she must have felt was no light one) of her father Though suffering from ill-health for many years, she continued her literary pursuits In 1852 she published Recollections of a Literary Life, largely autobiographical, and full of delightful glimpses of her contemporaries, famous or unknown, in 1854 canie her last book, Atherton and other Tales A plainlooking little woman with a 'wonderful wall of forchead, she knew nothing of the mysteries of cress and was wholly indifferent on the subject, so that it at times needed the charm of her dear and venerable face, her genial smile and lovable ways, to make her visitors forget the extraordinary simplicity of her attire She died on the 10th of January 1855 in her little house at Swallowfield, whither she had moved in 1851

A Sunset

What a sunset! how golden! how beautiful! The sun just disappearing, and the narrow liny clouds which a few minutes ago lay like soft vapoury streaks along the horizon lighted up with a golden splendour that the eve can scarcely endure, and those still softer clouds which floated above them wreathing and curling into a thousand fantastic forms as thin and changeful as summer smoke, now defined and decpened into grandeur and edged with ineffable, insufferable light! Another minute and the brilliant orb totally disappears, and the sky above grows every moment more varied and more beautiful as the dazzling golden lines are mixed with glowing red and gorgeous purple, dappled with small dark specks and mingled with such a blue as the egg of the hedge To look up at that glorious sky, and then to sparrow see that magnificent picture reflected in the clear and lovely Loddon water, is a pleasure never to be described and never forgotten My heart swells and my eyes fill as I write of it, and think of the immeasurable majesty of nature, and the unspeakable goodness of God, who has spread an enjoyment so pure, so peaceful, and so intense before the meanest and the lowliest of His creatures

(From 'The Dell in the second volume of Our Village)

Tom Cordery the Poacher

This human oak grew on the wild North of Hamp shire country, a country of heath and hill and forest, partly reclaimed, enclosed, and planted by some of the greater proprietors, but for the most part uncultivated and uncivilised, a proper refuge for wild animals of every species. Of these the most notable was my friend Tom Cordery, who presented in his own person no unfit emblem of the district in which he lived—the gentlest of savages, the wildest of civilised men calling rat catcher, hare finder, and broom maker, a triad of trades which he had substituted for the one grand profession of poaching which he followed in his younger days with unrivalled talent and success, and would undoubtedly have pursued till his death had not the bursting of an overloaded gun unluckily shot off his left hand As it was, he still contrived to mingle a little of his old unlawful occupation with his honest callings, was a reference of high authority amongst the young aspirants, an adviser of undoubted honour and secrecy—suspected, and more than suspected, as being one 'who, though he played no more, o'erlooked the cards' 'Net he kept to windward of the law, and indeed contrived to be on such terms of social and even friendly intercourse with the guardians of the gaine on M—— Common as may be said to prevail between reputed thieves and the myrmidons of justice at Bow Street

Never did any human being look more like that sort of sportsman commonly called a poacher. He was a tall, finely built man, with a prodigious stride, that cleared the ground like a horse, and a power of con tinuing his slow and steady speed that seemed nothing less than miraculous Neither man, nor horse, nor dog could out tire him He had a bold, undauated presence, and an evident strength and power of bone and muscle You might see, by looking at him, that he did not know In his youth he had fought more what fear meant battles than any man in the forest. He was as if born without nerves, totally insensible to the recoils and dis I have known him take up a huge gusts of humanity adder, cut off its head, and then deposit the living and writhing body in his brimless hat, and walk with it coiling and wreathing about his head, like another Mednsa, till the sport of the day was over, and he carried it home to secure the fat. With all this iron stubbornness of nature, he was of a most mild and gentle demeanour, had a fine placedity of countenance, and a quick blue eye beaming with good humour His face was sunburnt into one general pale vermilion line that overspread all his features, his very hair was Everybody liked Fom Cordery sunburnt too He had himself an aptness to like, which is certain to be repaid in kind, the very dogs knew him, and loved

Wrs Hemans was born at Liverpool, Felicia Dorothea Browne, on the 25th of September 1793. Her father was a merchant, who after some reverses removed in 1800 with his family to Gwrych near Abergele in North Wales, and there Felicia was inspired by a new love of nature. A volume of Poems (1808) proved far from successful, but was followed that same year by England and Spain, or Valour and Patriotism, which called forth more than one letter from Shelley In 1812 she published The Domestic Affections, and other Poems, and the same year was married to Captain Hemans, an Irish officer who had served in Spain continued her studies, acquiring several languages and still cultivating poetry In 1818, after she had borne him five sons, Captain Hemans went off to Italy, and they never met afterwards Mrs Hemans obtained a prize of £50 offered by a patriotic Scotsman for the best poem on the subject of Sir William Wallace. Next year she produced a poem on The Sceptic In June 1821 she secured the prize awarded by the Royal Society of Literature for a poem upon Dartmoor Her next effort was a tragedy, the Vespers of Palermo, which when produced at Covent Garden in December 1823 was not successful, though supported by the admirable acting of Kemble and Young 1826 appeared what was generally accounted her best poem, The Forest Sanctuary, and in 1828 Records of Woman, later collections were Lays of Leisure Hours and National Lines In 1829 she paid a visit to Scotland, and received a warm welcome from Sir Walter Scott, Jeffrey, and the Scottish literati, Scott's parting words 'There are some whom we are memorable meet and should like ever after to claim as kith and kin, and you are one of these' In 1830 appeared her Songs of the Affections The same year she visited Wordsworth, and, deeply impressed by the beauty of Rydal Lake and Grasmere, heartily sympathised with Wordsworth's own enthusiasm 'I would not give up the mists that spiritualise our mountains for all the blue skies of Italy' From 1809 to 1827 she had lived near St Asaph, and then for four years at Wavertree, Liverpool, now, in 1831, she went to reside in Dublin, where one of her brothers, Major Browne, was chief commissioner of police. The education of her five boys occupied much of her time and attention, ill health pressed heavily on her, and she soon fell into premature decay In 1834 ap peared her little volume of Hymns for Childhood and a collection of Scenes and Hymns of Life, Thoughts during Sickness were in the form of Her last, dictated to her brother on a Sunday three weeks before her death, was this

Sunday in England.

How many blessed groups this hour are bending, Through England's primrose meadow paths, their way Toward spire and tower, 'midst shadowy elms ascending, Whence the sweet chimes proclaim the hallowed day, The halls, from old heroic ages gray,
Pour their fair children forth, and hamlets low,
With whose thick orchard blooms the soft winds play,
Send out their inmates in a happy flow,
Like a freed vernal stream I may not tread
With them those pathways—to the feverish bed
Of sickness bound, yet, O my God! I bless Thy mercy, that with Sabbath peace hath filled
My chastened heart, and all its throbbings stilled
To one deep calm of lowliest thankfulness

She died on 16th May 1835, aged forty-one, and was buried in St Anne's Church, Dublin On her tomb are these lines from one of her own dirges

Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair spirit! rest thee now!
Even while with us thy footsteps trod,
His seal was on thy brow
Dust to its narrow house beneath!
Sonl to its place on high!
They that have seen thy look in death,
No more may fear to die

Mrs Hemans was not a profound or subtle poet, but had the true poet's gifts of grace, sweetness, and tenderness Her poems, as Scott hinted, 'have too many flowers for the fruit,' the longer poems, and especially the tragedies, are unquestionably insipid and tedious But some of her shorter pieces and lyrics are perfect in sentiment and pathos, 'The Child's First Grief' ('O call my brother back to me'), 'The Better Land,' 'The Treasures of the Deep,' the pieces quoted below, and 'Casabianca,' which belongs to a somewhat different category, are still found in school books, and will keep her memory green while the language endures One of her hymns, 'He knelt, the Saviour knelt,' is in common use, and 'Lowly and solemn,' from a poem on Sir Walter Scott's funeral day, is frequently sung as a hymn

From 'The Voice of Spring'

I come, I come! ye have called me long, I come o'er the mountains with light and song, Ye may trace my step o'er the wakening earth, By the winds which tell of the violet's birth, By the primrose stars in the shadowy grass, By the green leaves opening as I pass

I have breathed on the South, and the chestnut flowers By thousands have burst from the forest bowers And the ancient graves, and the fallen fanes, Are veiled with wreaths on Italian plains. But it is not for me, in my hour of bloom, To speak of the ruin or the toinb!

I have looked on the hills of the stormy North,
And the larch has hung all his tassels forth,
The fisher is out on the sunny sea,
And the reindeer bounds o'er the pastures free,
And the pine has a fringe of softer green,
And the moss looks bright where my foot hath been

I have sent through the wood paths a glowing sigh, And called out each voice of the deep blue sky, From the night bird's lay through the starry time, In the groves of the soft Hesperian clime, To the swan's wild note by the Iceland lakes, When the dark fir bough into verdure breaks

From the streams and founts I have loosed the chain, They are sweeping on to the silvery main, They are flashing down from the mountain brows, They are flinging spray on the forest boughs, They are bursting fresh from their sparry caves, And the earth resounds with the joy of waves

Come forth, O ye children of gladness, come '
Where the violets lie may now be your home.
Ye of the rose lip and dew bright eye
And the bounding footstep, to meet me fly,
With the lyre, and the wreath, and the joyous lay,
Come forth to the sunshine—I may not stay

MRS HI MANS
From the Bust by Angus Fletcher in the National Portrait Gallery

Away from the dwellings of careworn men, The waters are sparkling in grove and glen, Away from the chamber and dusky hearth, The young leaves are dancing in breezy mirth. Their light stems thrill to the wild wood strains, And Youth is abroad in my green domains.

The summer is hastening, on soft wings borne, I e may press the grape, ye may bind the corn, For me I depart to a brighter shore—
Ye are marked by care, ye are mine no more
I go where the loved who have left you dwell,
And the flowers are not Death's—fare ye well, farewell!

The Homes of England.

The stately Homes of Lngland,
How beautiful they stand '
Amidst their tall ancestral trees,
O'er all the pleasant land.
The deer across their greensward bound
Through shade and sunny gleam,
And the swan glides past them with the sound
Of some rejoicing stream

The merry Homes of Ingland '
Around their hearths by night,
What gladsome looks of household love
Meet in the ruddy light!
There woman's voice flows forth in song,
Or childhood's tale is told,
Or lips move timefully along
Same glorious page of old.

The blessed Homes of Ingland!

How softly on their bowers

Is laid the holy quietness

That breathes from Sabbath hours!

Solemn, yet sweet, the church bell's chine
Floats through their woods at morn

All other sounds, in that still time,

Of breeze and leaf are born

The cottage Homes of England the By thousands on her plains,
They are smiling o'er the silvery brooks.
And round the hamlet fanes
Through glowing orchards forth they people Lach from its nook of leaves
And fearless there the lowly sleep.
As the bird beneath their eaves.

The free, fair Homes of I nglan!

Long, long, in list and hall,

May hearts of native proof he reared

To guard each hallowed wal!

And green for ever be the grove,

And hight the flowery sod,

Where first the child's glad spirit loves

Its country and its God!

The Graves of a Household.

They grew in hearity, side by side,
They filled one home with glec.
Their graves are severed far and wide,
By mount, and stream, and sea

The same fond mother bent at night
O or each fur sleeping brow
She had each folded flower in sight—
Where are those dreamers now?

One, 'midst the forest of the West, By a dark stream is laid— The Indian knows his place of rest, Far in the cedar shade

The sea, the blue lone sea, hath one,
He lies where pearls he deep
He was the loved of all, yet none
O'er his low bed may weep

One sleeps where southern vines are dressed Above the noble slain He wrapt his colours round his breast, On a blood red field of Spain

And one—o'er her the myrtle showers
Its leaves, by soft winds fanned,
She faded 'midst Italian flowers—
The last of that bright band.

And parted thus they rest, who played Beneath the same green tree, Whose voices mingled as they prayed Around one parent knee They that with smiles lit up the hall,
And cheered with song the hearth—
Alas for love, if thou wert all,
And nought beyond, O earth!

Besides her sister's Memoir of Mrs Hemans in the seven volume edition of her works published in 1839, there are Memorials by H F Chorley (1836), recollections by Mrs Laurence (1836), the Poetical Remains, with a Memoir by Delta (1836), and the Poetical Works with Memoir by W M Rossetti (1873) See also Espinasse's Lancashire Worthies (1874) Mrs C. J Hamilton's Women Writers (1892), and Mrs L. B Walford's Twelve English Authoresses (1892).

Letitia Elizabeth Landon (1802-38), better known as 'L E L,' from the initials which were her nom de guerre, is reputed to have been, with the possible exception of Moore only, the most popular English poet in the period between Byron's decline and Tennyson's rise. But at the present day the most approved anthologies of English Lyrics and English Verse give no specimen of her work, and there are histories of modern English literature that do not even mention her name, to hardly any English writer has Fame proved so fickle. Among her poetical works were The Fate of Adelhide (1821), The Improvisatrice (1824), The Troubadour (1825), The Golden Violet (1827), The Venetian Bracelet (1829), and The Vow of the Peacock (1835) She wrote two or three novels, beginning with Romance and Reality (1830), Ethel Churchill (1837) was her most successful There was also a tragedy on Castruccio Castracam (1837), but 'L E L' was perhaps best known and beloved for her innumerable contributions to the Literary Gazette, edited by her warm friend Jerdan, and other magazines and She was born at Hans Place, Chelsea, and was the daughter of an army-agent Lively, susceptible, and romantic, she early commenced writing poetry, and after her father's death she not only maintained herself but assisted her re lations by her literary labours Unkind tongues caused the breaking off of an engagement (said to have been with John Forster), and in 1838 she was married to George Maclean, the governor of what is now part of the Gold Coast Colony, and in the same year she sailed for Cape Coast Castle with her husband She had spent barely two months in her African home, but had resumed her literary work, when one morning, after writing overnight some cheerful and affectionate letters to her friends in England, she was found dead in her room, having in her hand a bottle from which she was reported to have swallowed an overdose of poison as a relief from spasms Her friends at home did not all accept this, the official verdict. It was known that she was disappointed in her husband's character (though as an administrator he was energetic and successful), and she felt lonely and unhappy in her married life. The doubt has never been dispelled Athenaum obituary of 'Mrs Maclean' in the first week of January 1839 recognised that her ceaseless composition had 'necessarily precluded the thought and cultivation essential to the production of poetry of the highest order Hence, with all her fancy and feeling, her principal works strong family likeness to each other in their recurrence to the same sources of allusion and the same veins of imagery-in the conventional rather than natural colouring of their descriptions, and in the excessive though not unmusical carelessness of their versification' The critic greeted her last published verses, 'The Polar Star,' printed after her death in Colburn's New Monthly Magazine, as an earnest of deeper seriousness, wider knowledge, and more careful technique Her novels resemble her poems in being stories of sentiment, 'and reflect in some degree the conversation of their authoress, which sparkled always brightly with quick fancy and a badinage which astonished those matter-of fact persons who expected to find in the manners and discourse of the poetess traces of the weary heart, the broken lute, and the disconsolate willow-tree which were so frequently her themes of song' Her fluency was a truly fatal gift, the very variety of her subjects and of her measures is suspicious, the sentiment, whether poetically far-fetched or commonplace, is usually conventional, and in her Troubadours and Laras, her Hindoo Brides and Bayadères, her Lays of Scottish and Spanish minstrels and German minnesingers, there are echoes of Scott, Byron, Southey, and Moore, along with notes that suggest her less popular contemporary, Mrs Hemans, and anticipations of Longfellow She remains a landmark in the history of popular taste in literature and its vagaries Her poems are seldom bought and seldomer studied, but 'L E L' is still largely represented in quotation books, and fragments of her verse still float about disembodied, such as

> Dreams of truth, The Eden birds of early youth That make the loveliness of love

Genius, like all heavenly light, Can blast as well as bless the sight

It is deep happiness to die, Yet live in love's dear memory

O, silence is Love's own peculiar eloquence of bliss

How often woman's heart must turn To feed upon its own excess Of deep yet passionate tenderness! How much of grief the heart must prove That yields a sanctuary to love!

Farewell, my lute!—and would that I Had never waked thy burning chords!
Poison has been upon thy sigh,
And fever has breathed in thy words

Yet wherefore, wherefore should I blame
Thy power, thy spell, my gentlest lute?
I should have been the wretch I am,
Had every chord of thine been mute

It was my evil star above,

Not my sweet lute, that wrought me wrong,
It was not song that taught me love,
But it was love that taught me song

If song be past, and hope undone,
And pulse, and head, and heart are flame,
It is thy work, thou faithless one '
But, no '—I will not name thy name,

Sun god! lute, wreath are vowed to thee!

Long be their light upon my grave—
My glorious grave—yon deep blue sea
I shall sleep calm beneath its wave!

A Poetical Portrait

Ah! little do those features wear The shade of grief, the soil of care, The linir is parted o'er a brow Open and white as inountrin snow, And thence descends in many a ring, With sun and summer glistening Yet something on that brow has wrought A moment's cast of passing thought, Musing of gentle dreams, like those Which tint the slimbers of the ro c Not love, -love is not yet with thee, -But just a glimpse what love may be A memory of some last night sight When flitting blush and drooping eye Answer'd some youthful cavalier, Whose words sank pleasant on thine car, To stir, but not to fill the heart -Dreaming of such, fair girl, thou art -Thou blessed season of our spring When hopes are angels on the wing, Bound upwards to their heavenly shore, Alas ' to visit earth no more Then step and laugh alike are light. When, like a summer morning bright, Our spirits in their mirth are such As turn to gold whate'er they touch The past '-'tis nothing-childhood's day Has roll'd too recently away, For youth to shed those mournful tears That fill the eye in older years, When Care looks back on that bright leaf Of ready smiles and short lived gricf The future '- 'tis the promised land, To which Hope points with prophet hand, Telling us fairy tales of flowers That only change for fruit-and ours Though false, though fleeting, and though vain, Thou blessed time, I say again -Glad being, with thy downcast eyes, And visionary look that lies Beneath their shadow, thou shalt share A world where all my treasures are-My lute's sweet empire, fill'd with all That will obey my spirit s'eall, A world lit up by fancy's sun! Ah! little like our actual one

On the Picture of a Child screening a Dove from a Hawk.

Ay, screen thy favourite dove, fair child,
Ay, screen it if you may —
Yet I misdoubt thy trembling hand
Will scare the hawk away

That dove will die, that child will weep,—
Is this their destine?
Ever amid the sweets of life
Some evil thing must be

Ay, moralise,—is it not thus

We've mourn door hope and love?

Alt there are tears for every eye,

A hawl for every dove

The Polar Star

A star has left the kindling of v—
A lovely northern light,
How many planets are on high,
But that has left the night

I miss its bright familiar face It was a friend to me, Associate with my native place, And those beyond the sea

It rose upon our 1 nglish sky,
Shone o'er our English land
And brought back many a loving eye,
And many a gentle hand

It seemed to answer to my thought,
It called the past to mind
And with its welcome presence brought All I had left behind.

The voyage it lights no longer ends Soon on a foreign shore, How can I but recall the friends That I may see no more?

Fresh from the pain it was to part—
How could I hear the pain?
Yet strong the omen in my heart
That says, We meet again—

Meet with a deeper, dearer love,
For absence shows the vorth
Of all from which we then remove,
Friends, home, and native earth.

Thou lovely polar star, mine eyes
Still turned the first on thee,
Till I have felt a sail surprise
That none looked up with me

But thou hast sunk upon the wave,
The radiant place unknown.
I seem to stand beside a grave,
And stand by it alone

Farewell' ah, would to me were given A power upon thy light' What words upon our English heaven Thy loving rays should write Kind messages of love and hope Upon the rays should be Thy shining orbit should have scope Scareely enough for me.

Oh, finey vain, as it is foud,
And little needed too
My friends, I need not look beyond
My heart to look for you

*L. E. L. s. Life and Remains, published by Laman Blanchard in two volumes in 1841, reached a second edition in 1855, and William Bell Scott brought out an edition of her poems, with a Memor in 1873. A French estimate of her may be found in Le Fèvre Deumier's Cellbritts Anglasses (1895)

Anna Jameson (1794-1860), art critic, the eldest of the four daughters of Brownell Murphy, miniaturist, was born at Dublin and brought up in England at Whitehaven, at Newcastle, and in or near London From sixteen a governess, in 1825 she married Robert Jameson, a barrister, who from 1829 held appointments in Dominica and Canada They never got on well together, and from that date, with the exception of a dismal visit to Canada (1836-38), she lived apart from him Her numerous writings include The Diary of an Ennuyée (1826), memoranda made during a tour in France and Italy, Loves of the Poets (1829), Lives of Celebrated Female Sovereigns (1831), Characteristics of Women (1832), Beauties of the Court of Charles II (1833), Visits and Sketches at Home and Abroad (1834), Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada (1838), Pictures of the Social Life of Germany, as represented in the Dramas of the Princess Amelia of Saxony (1840) Works so various cannot all be of like temper or equal interest, but there was good ground for Professor Wilson's warm eulogium on Mrs Jameson as 'one of the most eloquent of our female writers, full of feeling and fancy, a true enthusiast with a glowing soul' Her most famous contributions to literature were in the department of art criticism, and her Handbook to the Public Galleries of Art (1842) and Companion to Private Galleries of Art in and near London (1844) were long standard works Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters and Memoirs on Art, Literature, and Social Morals (1845 and 1846) gave more scope to her literary gifts and artistic sympathies But she is now mainly remembered as authoress of Sacred and Legendary Art (2 vols 1848), dealing with the evangelists, apostles, and other scriptural characters, with the early saints and doctors, as represented in art. To this succeeded Legends of the Monastic Orders (1850), practically a second series, Legends of the Madonna (1852), a third, and The History of Our Lord as exemplified in Works of Art, a fourth, which was finished after her death by Lady Eastlake So that her magnum opus constituted a history of Christian art, and of the Church through art, down to the seventeenth century Her Commonplace Book was issued in 1854, and her niece, Geraldine Macpherson, published Memoirs of the Life of Anna Jameson in 1878 She took a keen interest in philanthropic enterprises, warmly supported the Sisters of Mercy, promoted the training of nurses, and, before most of her contemporaries, advocated the thorough education of women so as to qualify them for various employment.

Mrs Jameson's work has not quite lost either its value or its popularity, though new art canons have had their vogue and Raphael has yielded the palm to Botticelli. Her criticism is some of it out of date, and at her best and even for her own day her technical knowledge of art was very defective. She was an art critic of the pre-Ruskinian period, and of quite pre Morellian methods and principles

Her legends she took from the obvious sources, quite uncritically, as in duty bound-from the Legenda Aurea, from Ribadeneyra, or from Alban Butler, as was most convenient or picturesque, her historical equipment was that of an accomplished, sympathetic, well read, and industrious but not profoundly or really learned woman Her sensibilities often ran away with her judgment, or she wandered off into the history of the picture and then talked of all it suggested to her rather than of the picture itself Therein lies part of her charm, she wrote out of the fullness of her heart, and became one of the most popular and attractive teachers on subjects for which the movement associated with Tractarianism had prepared the English public. Her technical weakness in nowise affects the beauty of her stories, her work was for many much more than a history Longfellow wrote 'God bless you for this book! How very precious it is to me! Indeed, I can hardly try to express to you the feelings of affection with which I have cherished it from the first moment it reached us It most amply supplies the cravings of the religious nature'

Sir Gerard Noel.

Our Chef de Voyage-for so we chose to entitle him who was the planner and director of the excursion-was one of the most accomplished and most eccentric of human beings even courtesy might have termed him old at seventy, but old age and he were many miles asunder, and it seemed as though he had made some compact with Time, like that of Faust with the Devil and was not to surrender to his inevitable adversary till Years could not quench his vivacity the last moment nor 'stale his infinite variety' He had been one of the Prince's wild companions in the days of Sheridan and Fox, and could play alternately blackguard and gentle man, each in perfection, but the high born gentleman ever prevailed He had been heir to an enormous in come, most of which had slipped through his fingers unknownst, as the Irish say, and had stood in the way of a coronet, which somehow or other had passed over his head to light on that of his eldest son. He had lived a life which would have ruined twenty iron constitutions, and had suffered what might well have broken twenty hearts of common stuff, but his self complacency was invulnerable, his animal spirits inexhaustible, his activity The eccentricities of this singular man ındefatıgable. have been matter of celebrity, but against each of these stories it would be easy to place some act of benevolence, some trait of gentlemanly feeling, which would at least neutralise their effect He often told me that he had early in life selected three models after which to form his own character and conduct-namely, Dc Grammont, Hotspur, and Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and he cer tainly did unite, in a greater degree than he knew him self, the characteristics of all three On looking round after Donna Anna's song, I was surprised to see our Chef de Voj age bathed in tears, but, no whit disconcerted, he merely wiped them away, saying, with a smile, 'It is the very prettiest, softest thing to cry to one's self!' Afterwards, when we were in the carriage, he expressed his surprise that any man should be ashamed of tears 'For my own part,' he added, 'when I wish to enjoy the very high sublime of luxury, I dine alone, order a mutton cutlet cutte à point, with a bottle of Burgundy on one side and Ovid's Epistle of Penelope to Ulysses on the other And so I read, and eat, and cry to myself' And then he repeated with enthusiasm—

'Hane tua Penelope lento tibi mittit, Ulysse Nil milu rescribas, attamen ipse veni,' his eyes glistening as he recited the lines

(From the Memoirs of Mrs Jameson )

It was shortly after her husband's departure for the West Indies that Mrs Jameson made a tour on the Coatment with her father and her father's patron, the Sir Gerard of the above reminiscence

From the 'Commonplace Book.'

It is a common observation, that girls of lively talents are apt to grow pert and satirical. I fell into this danger when about ten years old. Sallies at the expense of certain people, ill looking, or ill-dressed, or ridiculous, or foolish, had been laughed at and applauded in company, until, without being naturally malignant, I ran some risk of becoming so from sheer vanity

The fables which appeal to our high moral sympathies may sometimes do as much for us as the truths of So thought our Saviour when He traight the multitude in parables A good elergyman who lived near us, a famous Persian seholar, took it into his head to teach me Persian-I was then about seven years oldand I set to work with infinite delight and earnestness All I learned was soon forgotten, but a few years after wards, happening to stumble on a volume of Sir William Janes's works-his Persian Grammar-it revived my Orientalism, and I began to study it eagerly the exercises given was a Persian fable or poem-one of those traditions of our Lord which are preserved in the East The beautiful apologue of 'St Peter and the Cherries,' which Goethe has versified or imitated, is a well known example. This fable I allude to was some thing similar, but I have not met with the original these forty years, and must give it here from memory

'Jesus,' says the story, 'arrived one evening at the gates of a certain city, and He sent His disciples forward to prepare supper, while He Himself, intent on doing good, walked through the streets into the market place And He saw at the corner of the market some people gathered together looking at an object on the ground. and He drew near to see what it might be. It was a dead dog, with a halter round his neck, by which he appeared to have been dragged through the dirt, and a viler, a more abject, a more unclean thing never met the eyes of man And those who stood by looked on "Faugh " said one, stopping his with abhorrence nose, "it pollutes the air" "How long," said another, "shall this foul beast offend our sight?" "Look at his torn hide," said a third, "one could not even cut a shoe out of it" "And his ears," said a fourth, "all draggled and bleeding!" "No doubt," said a fifth, "he hath been hanged for thieving !" And Jesus heard them, and looking down compassionately on the dead creature, He said, "Pearls are not equal to the white ness of his teeth 1" Then the people turned towards Him with amazement, and said among themselves "Who is this? This must be Jesus of Nazareth, for only He could find something to pity and approve even in a dead dog," and being ashamed, they bowed their heads before Him, and went each on his way'

I can recall at this hour the vivid yet softening and pathetic impression left on my fancy by this old Eastern story It struck me as exquisitely humorous, as well as exquisitely beautiful. It gave me a pain in my conscience, for it seemed thenceforward so easy and so vulgar to say saturical things, and so much nobler to be beingo and merciful, and I took the lesson so home that I was in great danger of falling into the opposite extreme—of seeking the beautiful even in the midst of the corrupt and the repulsive.

From the 'Legends of the Madonna'

Of the pictures in our galleries, public or private-of the architectural adornments of those majestic edifices which spring up in the Middle Ages (where they have not been despoiled or descerated by a zeal as fervent as that which reared them), the largest and most beautiful portion line reference to the Madonna-her character, her person, her history. It was a theme which never tired her votaries-whether, as in the hands of great and sincere artists, it became one of the noblest and loveliest, or, as in the hands of superficial, unbelies ing, time serving artists, one of the most degraded that human genius, inspired by faith, could achieve of best-all that fanatieism, sensualism, atheism, could perpetuate of worst, do we find in the cycle of those representations which have been dedicated to the glory of the Virgin. And, indeed, the ethics of the Madonna worship, as evolved in art, might be not unaptly likened to the ethics of human love so long as the object of sense remained in subjection to the moral idea-so long as the appeal was to the best of our faculties and affections-so long was the image grand or refined, and the influences to be ranked with those which have helped to humanise and civilise our race but so soon as the object became a mere idol, then worship and worshippers, art and artists, were together degraded

From 'The Loves of the Poets'

The theory which I wish to illustrate, as far as my limited powers permit, is this, that where a woman lins been evalted above the rest of her sex by the talents of a lover, and consigned to enduring fame and perpetuity of praise, the passion was real, and was mented, that no deep or lasting interest was ever founded in fancy or in fiction, that truth, in short, is the basis of all excellence in amatory poetry as in everything else, for where truth is, there is good of some sort, and where there is truth and good, there must be beauty, there must be durability of fame. Truth is the golden chain which links the terrestrial with the celestial, which sets the seal of Herven on the things of this earth, and stamps them to immortality. Poets have risen up and been the mere fashion of a day, and have set up idols which have been the idols of a day If the worship be out of date and the idols east down, it is because those adorers wanted sincerity of parpose and feeling, their raptures were feigned, their incense was bought or adulterate. In the brain or in the fancy, one beauty may eelipse another-one coquette may drive out another, and, tricked off in airy verse, they float away unregarded like morning vapours, which the beam of genius has tinged with a transient hrightness, but let the heart be once touched, and it is not only wakened but inspired, the lover kindled into the poet presents to her he loves his cup of ambrosial praise, she tastes—and the woman is transmuted into a divinity When the Grecian sculptor carved out his deities in marble, and left us wondrous and godlike shapes, impersonations of ideal grace unapproachable by modern skill, was it through such mechanical superiority? No, it was the spirit of faith within which shadowed to his imagination what he would represent. In the same manner, no woman has ever been truly, listingly defied in poetry, but in the spirit of truth and love.

Venice

It is this all perviding presence of light, and this suffusion of rich colour glowing through the déepest shadows, which make the very life and soul of Venice, but not all who have dwelt in Venice, and breathed her air and lived in her life, have felt their influences, it is the want of them which renders so many of Canaletti's pietures false and nnsatisfactory—to me at least. the time I was at Venice I was in a rage with Canaletti I could not come upon a palace, or a church, or a corner of a canal which I had not seen in one or other of his At every moment I was reminded of him But how has he painted Venice 1 Just as we have the face of a beloved friend reproduced by the daguerreotype. or by some bad conscientious painter-some fellow who gives ns eyes, nose, and mouth by measure of compass, and leaves out all sentiment, all countenance, we can not deny the identity, and we cannot endure it. Where in Canaletti are the glowing evening skies-the trans parent gleaming waters-the bright green of the vine shadowed Traghetto-the freshness and the glory-the dreamy, aerial, fantastie splendour of this city of the sea? Look at one of his pictures—all is real, opaque, solid, stony, formal, even his skies and water-and is that Venue? 'But,' says my friend, 'if you would have Venice, seek it in Turner's pictures! True, I may seek it, hut shall I find it? Venice is like a dream-but this dream upon the canvas, do you call this Venice? The exquisite precision of form, the wondrous beauty of detail, the clear, delicate lines of the flying perspective -so sharp and defined in the midst of a flood of bright ness-where are they? Canaletti gives us the forms without the colour or light, Timer, the colour and light without the forms. But if you would take into your soul the very soul and inward life and spirit of Venice-breathe the same air-go to Titim there is more of Venice in his 'Cornaro Family' or his 'Pesaro Madonna' than in all the Canalettis in the corridor at Windsor Beautiful they are, I must needs say it, but when I think of enchanting Venice, the most beautiful are to me like prose translations of poetry-petrifae tions, materialities 'We start, for life is wanting there!' I know not how it is, but certainly things that would elsewhere displease, delight us at Venice been said, for instance, 'Put down the church of St Mark anywhere but in the Piazza, it is barbarous? here, where east and west have met to blend together, it is glorious. And again, with regard to the sepulchral effigies in our churches, I have always been of Mr Westmacott's principles and party, always on the side of those who denounce the intrusion of monuments of human pride insolently paraded in God's temple, and surely cavaliers on prancing horses in a church should seem the very aeme of such irreverence and impropriety in taste, but here the impression is fir different. O those awful, grim, mounted warriors and doges, high over our heads against the walls of the San Giovanni e Paolo and the Fran !- man and horse in panoply of state, colossal, lifelike-suspended, as it were, so far above us that we cannot concern how they came there, or are kept there, by human means alone. It seems as though they had been lifted up and fixed on their airy pedestals as by a spell At whatever hour I visited those churches-and that was almost daily-whether at morn, or noon, or in the deepening twilight, still did those marvellous effigies-man and steed, and trampled Turk, or mitred doge, upright and stiff in his saddlefix me as if faseinated, and still I looked up at them, wondering every day with a new wonder, and scarce repressing the startled exclamation, 'Good heavens! how came they there?' And not to forget the great wonder of modern times-I hear people talking of a railway across the Lagune, as if it were to unpoetise Venice, as if this new approach were a malignant invention to bring the siren of the Adriatic into the 'dull catalogue of common things,' and they call on me to join the outcry, to echo sentimental denunciations, quoted out of Murray's Hand book, but I cannot-I To me that tremendous have no sympathy with them bridge, spanning the sea, only adds to the wonderful one wonder more, to great sources of thought one yet Those persons, methinks, must be strangely greater prosaie au fond who can see poetry in a Gothie pin nacle, or a crumbling temple, or a gladiator's circus, and in this gigantic canseway and its seventy five arches, traversed with fiery speed by dragons, brazen winged, to which neither alp nor ocean can oppose a barrier, nothing but a commonplace. I must say I pity them I see a future fraught with hopes for Venice-

> 'Twining memories of old time With new virtues more sublime!'

To the last extract, which is from 'The House of Titian in her Memoirs and Essays (1846), Mrs Jameson adds in a foolnote Guardi gives the local colouring of Venice better than Canaletti Bonnington better than either, in one or two examples that remain to us.' See also the Commonplace Book (1854) and the Life of her by her niece above mentioned The series of the Sacred and Legindary Art volumes were republished in handsome form in 1889 and 1890.

Mary Somerville (1780-1872) was a worthy younger contemporary of Caroline Herschel, and was perhaps the most remarkable woman of her time She attained to all but the very highest proficiency in physical science, was a member of various learned societies at home and abroad, received the approbation and esteem of Laplace, Humboldt, Wollaston, Playfair, Herschel, and other eminent contemporaries, and at the age of ninetytwo was still engaged in solving mathematical problems! Born in her uncle's manse of Jedburgh, she was the daughter of Sir William George Fairfax, Vice-Admiral of the Red, Lord Duncan's captain at the battle of Camperdown in 1797 Brought up at Burntisland, she had before she was fourteen studied Euclid and Algebra, but concealed as much as possible her acquirements In 1804 she was married to her cousin, Captain Samuel Greig, son of a Russian admiral, and himself Russian consul in London Captain Greig died two years after their union, and in 1812 his widow married another cousin, Dr William Somerville (1769-1860), Inspector of the Army Medical His father, the minister of Jedburgh, was author of two historical works-histories of the Revolution and of the reign of Queen Anne, and of memoirs of his own Life and Times, in which the old man records with pride that Mary Fairfax had been born and nursed in his house, her father being at that time abroad on public service, and that she had long lived in his family and was occasionally his pupil Somerville, whose second husband warmly fostered her studies, attracted notice by experiments on the magnetic influence of the violet rays of the solar spectrum Lord Brougham then asked her to prepare for the Society for Diffusion of Useful Knowledge a popular summary of the Mécanique Céleste of Laplace When her manuscript was submitted to Sir John Herschel, he pronounced it a book for posterity, and quite above the class for which Lord Brougham's course was intended Mrs Somerville herself modestly said of it, 'I simply translated Laplace's work from algebra into common language.' When she consented to publish it as an independent work, her version of The Mechanism of the Heavens (1831) fixed her reputation The Royal Society admitted her a member, and commissioned a bust of her When Mrs Somerville met Laplace by Chantrey in Paris, the great geometer (who did not live to see the English version of his great work) is reported to have said, 'There have been only three women who have understood me-yourself, Caroline Herschel, and a Mrs Greig, of whom I have never been able to learn anything' 'I was Mrs Greig,' said the modest little woman 'So, then, there are only two of youl' exclaimed Laplace. In 1834 Mrs Somerville published The Connection of the Physical Sciences, giving a sum mary of the phenomena of the universe, which in her lifetime reached a ninth edition Physical Geography (1848) was chiefly written in Rome. Eighteen years after her Physical Geography, Mrs Somerville published two volumes On Molecular and Microscopic Science (1866) She still continued her scientific studies, and in January 1872 a visitor wrote 'She is still full of vigour, and working away at her mathematical researches, being particularly occupied just now with the theory of quaternions, a branch of transcendent mathematics which very few, if anv, persons of Mrs Somerville's age and sex have ever had the wish or power to study' For many years she lived with her family at Florence, where slie was as assiduous in the cultivation of her flower garden and of music as of mathematics Robert Peel - of all Prime-Ministers since the days of Halifax the most attentive to literary and scientific claims—had in 1835 placed her on the pension list for £300 per annum. In her old age Mrs Somerville had amused herself by writing her reminiscences, which were published in 1873 by her daughter as the Personal Recollections of Mary Somerville, admirable like her scientific writings not merely from the interest of the matter, but for their clear and lively style. She thus describes the twelvemonth that she passed at Musselburgh

School Methods in 1790

At ten years old I was sent to a boarding school kept by a Miss Primrose at Musselburgh, where I was utterly The change from perfect liberty to perpetual restraint was in itself a great trial, besides, being natu rally shy and thmid, I was afraid of strangers, and although Miss Primrose was not unkind she had an habitual frown, which even the elder girls dreaded My future companions, who were all older than I, came round me like a swarm of bees, and asked if my father had a title, what was the name of our estate, if we kept a carriage, and other such questions, which made me first feel the difference of station However, the girls were very kind, and often bathed my eyes to prevent our stern mistress from seeing that I was perpetually in tears A few days after my arrival, although perfectly straight and well made, I was enclosed in stiff stays with a steel busk in front, while, above my frock, bands drew my shoulders back till the shoulder blades met. Then a steel rod, with a semicircle which went under the chin, was clasped to the steel busk in my stays. In this constrained state I, and most of the younger girls, had; to prepare our lessons. The chief thing I had to do was to learn by heart a page of Johnson's Dictionary, not only to spell the words, give their parts of speech and meaning, but as an exercise of memory to remember their order of succession Besides I had to learn the first principles of writing, and the rudiments of French and English grammar The method of teaching was extremely tedious and inefficient Our religious duties were attended to in a remarkable way. Some of the girls were Presbyterians, others belonged to the Church of England, so Miss Primrose cut the matter short by taking us all to the kirk in the morning and to church in the afternoon. In our play hours we amused our selves with playing at balls, marbles, and especially at 'Scotch and English,' a game which represented a raid on the debatable land, or Border between Scotland and England, in which each party tried to rob the other of their playthings. The little ones were always com pelled to be English, for the bigger girls thought it too degrading

A Recollection of the Campagna

I had very great delight in the Campagna of Rome, the fine range of Apennines bounding the plain, over which the fleeting shadows of the passing clouds fell, ever changing and always beautiful, whether viewed in the early morning or in the glory of the setting sun, I was never tired of admiring, and whenever I drove out, preferred a country drive to the more fashionable Villa Borghese. One day Somerville and I and our daughters went to drive towards the Tavolato, on the road to We got out of the carriage and went into a field, tempted by the wild flowers. On one side of this field ran the aqueduct, on the other, a deep and wide ditch full of water I had gone towards the aqueduct, leaving the others in the field All at once we heard a loud shouting, when an enormous drove of the beautiful Campagna gray cattle, with their wide spreading horns, came rushing wildly between us, with their heads down and their tails erect, driven by men with long spears, mounted on little spirited horses at full gallop so sudden and so rapid that only after it was over did we perceive the danger we had run. As there was no possible escape, there was nothing for it but standing still, which Somerville and my girls had presence of mind to do, and the drove, dividing, rushed like a whirl wind to the right and left of them. The danger was not so much of being gored as of being run over by the excited and terrified animals, and round the walls of Rome places of refuge are provided for those who may be passing when the cattle are driven. Near where this occurred there is a house with the inscription, 'Casa Dei Spiriti,' but I do not think the Italians believe in either ghosts or witches, their chief superstition seems to be the 'Jettatura' or evil eye, which they have inhented from the early Romans and, I believe, Etruscans consider it a bad omen to meet a monk or priest on first going out in the morning. My daughters were engaged to ride with a large party, and the ineet was at our house. A Roman, who happened to go out first, saw a friar, and rushed in again laughing, and waited till lic was out of sight Soon after they set off, this gentleman was thrown from his horse and dueked in a pool, so the Jettatura was fulfilled. But my daughters thought his bad seat on horseback enough to account for his fall without the cval eye.

Eliza Fletcher (1770-1858) was the daughter of a Yorkshire yeoman and land-surveyor at Oxton near Tadcaster, and against her father's wish married Archibald Fletcher (1746-1828), a Perthshire Highlander, who as an advocate in Edinburgh was conspicuous amongst the early reformers-was indeed called 'the father of burgh reform'-and acted as counsel for some of 'the Friends of the People' tried for sedition The Fletchers were intimates of Henry Erskine, Jeffrey, Cockburn, Brougham, and the Edinburgh Review set, and Mrs I letcher's Autobiography gives interesting glimpses of them, of the poets Campbell and Grahame, of Mrs Barbauld and Joanna Baillie, and other literary personages of the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century was not published till 1875 Thus she records her impressions when a friend brought her 'to read for the first time Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads '

Never shall I forget the charm I found in these poems It was like a new era in my existence. They were in my waking thoughts day and night. They had to me all the vivid effects of the finest pictures, with the enchantment of the sweetest music, and they did much to tranquillise and strengthen my heart and mind, which bodily indisposition had somewhat weakened. My favourites were the 'Lines on Tintern Abbey,' the 'Lines left on a Yew Tree at Esthwaite Lake,' 'The Brothers,' and 'Old Michael,' and I taught my children to recite 'We are Seven' and several others.

Anne Marsh-Caldwell (1791-1874), the daughter of James Caldwell, Recorder of Newcastle-under-Lyme, and born at Linley Wood, Staffordshire, married in 1817 the junior partner of the forger Fauntleroy, and in 1834-57 produced a score of novels—the best Two Old Men's Tales, Enulia Wyndham (1846, new ed 1888), and Norman's Bridge In 1858 she succeeded a brother in the Linley Wood property, and resumed the name Caldwell

Thomas Chalmers (1780-1847), the greatest of Scottish nineteentli-century divines, was the son of a shipowner and general merchant at Anstruther in Fife, and at the age of twelve was sent to the college at St Andrews, where he showed a strong predilection for mathematical studies In 1803 he was ordained minister of Kilmany, a rural parish in his native county. In addition to his parochial labours, he lectured in the different towns on chemistry and other subjects, he became an officer of a Volunteer corps, he wrote a book on the Resources of the Country, besides pamphlets on some of the topics of the day, and his interests lay elsewhere than in religious work. Bereavement and severe illness brought about a change of temper, and in preparing the article 'Christianity' for the Edinburgh Encyclopædia, he for the first time saw the incalculable importance of realising the vital truths of the Christian faith Kilmany Chalmers, now heart and soul a minister of the Word, removed to Glasgow, to the Tron Church in 1815, and to St John's in 1819. Here his principal sermons were delivered and pub lished, and his fame as a preacher and author spread over Europe and to America His appearance and manner were not prepossessing ncute observers-John Gibson Lockhart and Henry Cockburn—described his peculiarities minutely His voice was neither strong nor nielodious, his gestures were awkward, his pronunciation broadly provincial, he also read his sermons from the manuscript, so that one wondered wherein lay the charm of his oratory 'The magic,' says Cockburn in the Memorials of his Time, 'hies in the con centrated intensity which agitates every fibre of the man, and brings out his meaning by words and emphasis of significant force, and rolls his magnificent periods clearly and irresistibly along, and kindles the whole composition with living He no sooner approaches the edge of his high region than his animation makes the commencing awkwardness be forgotten, and then converts his external defects into positive advantages, by showing the intellectual power that overcomes them, and getting us at last within the flame of his enthusiasm Jeffrey's description, that he "buried his adversaries under the fragments of burning mountains," is the only image that suggests an idea of his eloquent imagination and terrible energy' A writer in the London Magazine give a graphic account of Chalmers's appearance in London 'When he visited London the hold that he took on the minds of men was unprecedented It was a time of strong political feeling, but even that was unheeded, and all parties thronged to hear the Scottish preacher The very best judges were not prepared for the display that they heard Cunning and Wilberforce went together, and got into a pew near the door The elder in attendance stood close by the pew Chalmers began in his usual unpromising way, by stating a few nearly self evident propositions neither in the choicest language nor in the most "If this be all," said Canning impressive voice to his companion, "it will never do" Chalmers went on-the shuffling of the congregation gradu-He got into the mass of his ally subsided subject, his weakness became strength, his hesitation was turned into energy, and, bringing the whole volume of his mind to bear upon it, he poured forth a torrent of the most close and conclusive argument, brilliant with all the exuberance of an imagination which ranged over all nature for illustrations, and yet managed and applied each of them with the same unerring dexterity, as if that single one had been the study of a whole life. "The tartan beats us," said Mr Canning, "we have no preaching like that in England", In Glasgow Chalmers laboured incessantly to combat the appalling ignorance and immorality of his parishioners, and he organised a system of Sabbathschools and pauper management which attracted great attention He believed the ideal system was to 'revivify, remodel, and extend the old parochial economy of Scotland,' so fruitful of good in rural He was strongly opposed to the English system of a legal provision for the poor, and in his own district of Glasgow voluntary contributions, well managed, were for many years found to be sufficient, but as a law of residence could not be established between the different parishes of the city, to prevent one parish becoming burdened with a pauperism which it did not create, his voluntary system was ultimately abandoned In 1823 Chalmers removed to St Andrews, as Professor of Moral Philosophy in the United College, and in 1828 he was appointed Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh In 1843 the evil consequences of patronage brought about the crisis that had long been preparing between the 'moderate' and 'evangelical' parties in the Church of Scotland Chalmers resigned his chair, and with nearly five hundred ministers left the Established Church to form the Free Church of Scotland, of which he was the main organiser and leader As Principal of the New College, the Divinity hall of the Free Church, he wielded a powerful influence for the last four years of his life

His collected works fill thirty four volumes (nine of them posthumously published) Amongst them are volumes devoted to Natural Theology, Evidences of Christianity, Moral Philosophy, Commercial Discourses, Astronomical Discourses, Congregational Sermons, Sermons on Public Occasions, Tracts and Essays, Christian and Economic Polity of a Nation, On Church and College Endowments, On Church Extension, Political Leonomy, The Sufficiency of a Parochial System without a Poorrate, Lectures on the Romans, Institutes of Theology, Prelections on Butler's Analogy In all Chalmers's writings there is great energy, earnestness, copiousness, reiteration, with a vast variety of illustration The style is far from being correct or elegantit is often turgid, loose, and declamatory, vehement beyond the bounds of good taste, and disfigured by a singular and by no means attractive phraseology, though these blemishes are more than redeemed by his burning zeal, the originality of many of his views, and the astonishing vigour of his mind But the charm of the spoken word has not survived on the printed page, Chalmers's work cannot be said to have endured as literature

On Cruelty to Animals

These sufferings are really felt. The beasts of the fields are not so many automata without sensation, and just so constructed as to give forth all the natural signs and expressions of it. Nature hath not practised this universal deception upon our species. These poor animals just look, and tremble, and give forth the very indications of suffering that we do Theirs is the distinct cry of pain Theirs is the unequivocal physiognomy of They put on the same aspect of terror on the demonstrations of a menaced blow They exhibit the same distortions of agony after the infliction of it bruse, or the burn, or the fracture, or the deep incision or the herce encounter with one of equal or superior strength, just affects them similarly to ourselves. Their blood circulates as ours. They have pulsations in various parts of the body lile ours. They sicken, and they grow feeble with age, and, finally, they die just as we do They possess the same feelings, and, what exposes them to like suffering from another quarter, they possess the same instincts with our own species. The lioness robbed of her whelps causes the wilderness to ring aloud with the proclamation of her wrongs, or the bird whose little household has been stolen fills and saddens all the grove with melodies of deepest pathos. All this is palpable even to the general and unlearned eye, and when the physiologist lays open the recesses of their system by means of that scalpel under whose operation they just slirink and are convulsed as any living subject of our own species, there stands forth to view the same senticit apparatns, and furnished with the same conductors for the transmission of feeling to every minutest pore upon the surface. Theirs is unmixed and inmitigated painthe agonies of martyrdom without the alleviation of the hopes and the sentiments whereof they are incapable. When they lay them down to dic, their only fellowship is with suffering, for in the prison house of their beset and bounded faculties there can no relief be afforded by communion with other interests or other things. attention does not lighten their distress as it does that of man, by carrying off his spirit from that existing pungency and pressure which might else be overwhelming There is but room in their mysterious economy for one inmate, and that is, the absorbing sense of their own single and concentrated anguish. And so in that bed of torment whereon the wounded animal lingers and expires, there is an unexplored depth and intensity of suffering which the poor dumb animal itself cannot tell, and against which it can offer no remonstrance—an untold and unknown amount of wretchedness of which no articulate voice gives utterance. But there is an eloquence in its silence, and the very shroud which disguises it only serves to aggravate its horrors.

Insignificance of this Earth

Though the earth were to be burnt up, though the trumpet of its dissolution were sounded, though you sky were to pass away as a scroll, and every visible glory which the finger of the Divinity has inscribed on it were extinguished for ever-an event so awful to us, and to every world in our vicinity, by which so many suns would be extinguished, and so many varied scenes of life and population would rush into forgetfulness-what is it in the high scale of the Almighty's workmanship? a mere shred, which, though scattered into nothing, would leave the universe of God one entire scene of greatness and of majesty Though the earth and the heavens were to disappear, there are other worlds which roll afar, the light of other suns shines upon them, and the sky which mantles them is garnished with other stars Is it presumption to say that the moral world extends to these distant and unknown regions? that they are occupied with people? that the charities of home and of neighbourhood flourish there? that the praises of God are there lifted up, and His goodness rejoiced in? that there piety has its temples and its offerings? and the richness of the divine attributes is there felt and admired by intelligent worshippers?

And what is this world in the immensity which teems with them, and what are they who occupy it? universe at large would suffer as little in its splendour and variety by the destruction of our planet as the verdure and sublime magnitude of a forest would suffer by the fall of a single leaf The leaf quivers on the branch which supports it. It has at the mercy of the A breath of wind tears it from its slightest accident stem, and it lights on the stream of water which passes underneath In a moment of time, the life which we know by the microscope it teems with is extinguished, and an occurrence so insignificant in the eye of man, and on the scale of his observation, carries in it to the myriads which people this little leaf an event as terrible and as decisive as the destruction of a world the grand scale of the universe, we, the occupiers of this ball, which performs its little round among the suns and the systems that astronomy has unfolded—we may feel the same littleness and the same insecurity. We differ from the leaf only in this circumstance, that it would require the operation of greater elements to destroy us But these elements exist. The fire which riges within may lift its devouring energy to the surface of our planet, and transform it into one wide and wasting volcano The sudden formation of elastic matter in the bowels of the earth-and it lies within the agency of known substances to accomplish this-may explode it into frag The exhalation of noxious air from below may impart a virulence to the air that is around us, it may affect the delicate proportion of its ingredients and the whole of animated nature may wither and die under the malignity of a tainted atmosphere. A blazing comet may cross this fated planet in its orbit, and realise all the terrors which superstition has conceived of it cannot anticipate with precision the consequences of an event which every astronomer must know to lie within It may hurry our the limits of chance and probability globe towards the sun, or drag it to the outer regions of the planetary system, or give it a new axis of revolution -and the effect, which I shall simply announce without explaining it, would be to change the place of the ocean and bring another mighty flood upon our islands and

These are changes which may happen in a single anstant of time, and against which nothing known in the present system of things provides us with any security. They might not annihilate the earth, but they would unpeople it, and we, who tread its surface with such firm and assured footsteps, are at the mercy of devouring elements, which, if let loose upon us by the hand of the Almighty, would spread solitude and silence and death over the dominions of the world

Now, it is this littleness and this insecurity which make the protection of the Almighty so dear to us, and bring with such emphasis to every pious bosom the holy lessons of humility and gratitude. The God who sitteth above, and presides in high authority over all worlds, is mindful of man, and though at this moment His energy is felt in the remotest provinces of creation, we may feel the same security in His providence as if we were the objects of His undivided care.

It is not for us to bring our minds up to this mysterious But such is the incomprehensible fact, that the same Being whose eye is abroad over the whole universe gives vegetation to every blade of grass, and motion to every particle of blood which circulates through the veins of the minutest animal, that though His mind takes into His comprehensive grasp immensity and all its wonders, I am as much known to Him as if I were the single object of His attention, that He marks all my thoughts, that He gives birth to every feeling and every movement within me, and that, with an exercise of power which I can neither describe nor comprchend, the same God who sits in the highest heaven, and reigns over the glones of the firmament, is at my right hand to give me every breath which I draw and every comfort which I enjoy

Chaliners 5 son in law Dr Hanna, prepared the Memoirs (4 vols. 1849-52), with a Selection from his Correspondence (1853) and there are smaller books by Dr Fraser (1881) Mrs Oliphant (1893) and Professor W G Blaikle (1897).

Lord Brougham was one of the most voluminous and versatile contributors to the Edinburgh Review Like Jeffrey, he was born in Edinburgh, but his father was a north of Eng land man, Henry Brougham of Brougham Hall in Westmorland, who, sojourning in Edinburgh, lodged with a widowed sister of Dr Robertson the historian, and married her daughter eldest son, Henry, born 19th September 1778, was sent to the High School of Edinburgh, and his contemporary, Lord Cockburn, tells a characteristic story about him 'Brougham made his first public explosion in Fraser's (the Latin) class to differ from Fraser, a hot but good natured old fellow, on some small bit of Latinity The master, like other men in power, maintained his own in fullibility, punished the rebel, and flattered himself But Brougham re that the affair was over appeared next day loaded with books, returned to the charge before the whole class, and compelled honest Luke to acknowledge he had been This made Brougham famous throughwrong out the whole school' From the High School, Brougham entered the University of Edinburgh, and applied lumself so assiduously to mathematics that in 1796 he was able to contribute to the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh Experiments and Observations on the Inflection, Reflection, and Colours of Light In 1798 he published there a paper on porisms, and, as Campbell the poet recorded, the best judges were astonished at such papers from a youth of twenty Brougham studied law, and was admitted in 1800 to the Scottish Bar, at which he practised till 1807 1803, besides co operating zealously in the Edinburgh Review, he published an elaborate Inquiry into the Colonial Policy of the European Powers, in which he discussed the colonial systems of America, France, Spain, and England. As a Whig he was debarred from hopes of promotion in Scotland, and he therefore went south and scttled in London After a diplomatic mission to Lisbon, he joined the English Bar, where he was soon distinguished for unwearied application, fearlessness, and vehement oratory, and in 1810 he entered the House of Commons

In the course of his ambitious career Henry Brougham fell off from his early friends We have no trace of him in the genial correspondence of Horner, Sydney Smith, or Jeffrey, but though Brougham could not inspire affection, and was crratic and inconsistent in much of his conduct, amidst all his personal ambition, rashness, and indiscretion he was the steady friend of public improvement, of slave abolition, popular education, religious toleration, Free Trade, and law reform He carried a bill making the slavetrade felony, and another repealing the Orders He did much for the London in Council University, Mechanics' Institutes, the Society for Diffusing Useful Knowledge, and the Social His most famous pro-Science Association fessional appearance was his defence of Queen Caroline (1820), which lost him the favour of the Crown, but made him a popular idol not loved by the aristocratic Whigs, who, however, found him indispensable, and in 1830 he was made a peer and Lord Chancellor, and assisted greatly in carrying the Reform Bill arrogance, self-confidence, and eccentricity made him unpopular with his colleagues He went out with the Whigs in 1834, and on their return was shelved, never holding office again. He still laboured unceasingly as a law reformer, and carried on an amazing industry in writing books on mathematics, physics, metaphysics, history, theology, He wrote at least one novel (Albert and law Lunel, or The Château of Languedoc, a philoso phical romance, designed as a monument to his dead daughter), which he soon carefully suppressed, there is hardly a department of science or literature into which he did not make incursions But his works have little permanent value. As critic he ranks below his associates Jeffrey and Sydney Smith His liveliest contribution (which he never openly acknowledged) was his critique on Lord Byron's Hours of Idleness, in the first twenty numbers of the Review he wrote eighty articles His style is generally heavy, verbose, and inelegant, and his time vas afterwards too largely devoted to public affairs to enable him to keep pace with the age either in scientific knowledge or literary information, though in his sketches of modern statesmen were sometimes found new facts and lettersto which other writers had not access Rogers said of him, 'There goes Solon, Lycurgus, Demosthenes, Archimedes, Sir Isaac Newton, Lord Chesterfield, and a great many more in one post-chaise,' it was O'Connell who jeered, 'If Brougham knew a little of law, he would know a little of everything,' Mr John Morley has not scrupled to call him 'a man of encyclopædic ignorance.' He was a great orator and debater, but he carried declamation and invective beyond reasonable bounds Brougham died at Cannes (where he had built a villa and lived part of every year) on the 7th of May 1868 Seven years before this, in his eighty-fourth year, the veteran statesman commenced writing notices of his Life and Times, which were published in three volumes in 1871 These volumes abound in errors and inaccuracies, easily accounted for by the great age of the writer, he actually caused to be printed in full there, as his own production at the age of thirteen, what was immediately recognised as a verbal translation of Memnon, ou la Sagesse Humaine, a characteristic work of Voltaire in his prime! His vanity and prejudices are very conspicuous, but the work discloses many of the springs of political movements and includes valuable letters and other Some of his speeches were very carefully prepared the peroration of the speech at the end of Queen Caroline's trial he is said to have written and rewritten no less than fifteen times.

Peroration of the Last Speech for Queen Caroline.

Let me call on you, even at the risk of repetition, never to dismiss for a moment from your minds the two great points upon which I rest my attack upon the evidence first, that the accusers have not proved the facts by the good witnesses who were within their reach, whom they had no shadow of pretext for not calling, and, secondly, that the witnesses whom they have ventured to call are, every one of them, irreparably damaged in their credit How, I again ask, is a plot ever to be discovered except by the means of these twoprinciples? Nay, there are instances in which plotshave been discovered through the medium of the second principle, when the first had happened to fail venerable witnesses have been brought forward-v hen persons above all suspicion have lent themselves for a season to impure plans—when no escape for the guiltless seemed open, no chance of safety to remain-they have almost providentially escaped from the snare by the second of those two principles, by the cyidence break ing down where it was not expected to be sifted, by a weak point being found where no provision, the attack being unforeseen, had been made to support it Lordships recollect that great passage—I say great, for it is poctically just and eloquent, even were it not inspired—in the sacred writings where the Elders had joined themselves in a plot which had appeared to have succeeded, 'for that,' as the Book says, 'they had hardened their hearts, and had turned away their eyes, that they might not look at Heaven, and that they might do the purposes of unjust judgments. But they, though giving a clear, consistent, uncontradicted story, where disappointed, and their victim was rescued from their gripe by the trifling circumstance of a contradiction about a tamarish tree. Let not men call these contradictions or those falsehoods which false witnesses swear to from needless and heedless falsehood, not going to the main body of the case, but to the main body of the credit of the witnesses—let not men rashly and blindly call these things accidents. They are just rather than merciful dispensations of that Providence which wills not that the guilty should triumph, and which favourably protects the innocent

Such, my Lords, is the case now before you! Such is the evidence in support of the measure-evidence inadequate to prove a debt-impotent to deprive of a civil right-ridiculous to convict of the lowest offencemonstrous to ruin the honour, to blast the name of an English queen! What shall I say, then, if this is the proof by which an act of judicial legislation, a parlia mentary sentence, an ex post facto law, is sought to be passed against this defenceless woman? My Lords, I I do earnestly beseech you to take pray you to pause heed I You are standing upon the brink of a precipice, then beware 1 It will go forth your judgment, if sen tence shall go against the queen But it will be the only judgment you ever pronounced which, instead of reach ing its object, will return and bound back upon those who gave it Save the country, my Lords, from the horrors of this eatistrophe—save yourselves from this penl, rescue that country of which you are the orna ments, but in which you can flourish no longer when severed from the people than the blossom when cut off from the roots and the stem of the tree Save that country, that you may continue to adorn it save the Crown, which is in jeopardy, the Aristoeracy, which is shaken, save the Altar, which must stagger with the blow that rends its kindred Throne You have said, my Lords, you have willed-the Church and the King have willed-that the queen should be deprived of its soleimi service. She has, instead of that solemnity, the heartfelt prayers of the people. She wants no prayers of mine But I do here pour forth my humble supplications at the throne of mercy, that that mercy may be poured down upon the people in a larger measure than the ments of their rulers may deserve, and that your hearts may be turned to justice!

On Law Reform.

The course is clear before us, the rice is glorious to You have the power of sending your name down through all times, illustrated by deeds of higher fame and more useful import than ever were done within these walls. You saw the greatest warrior of the ageconqueror of Italy-humbler of Germany-terror of the North-saw him account all his inatchless victories poor, compared with the triumph you are now in a condition to win-saw him contemn the fickleness of Fortune, while, in despite of her, he could pronounce his memor 'I shall go down to posterity with the Code in my hand? You have vanquished him in the field, strive now to rival him in the sacred arts of Peace ' Outstrip him as a langiver, whom in arms you orerenne! The lustre of the Regeney will be celipsed by the more solid and enduring splendonr of the Reign The pruse which false courtiers feigned for our Lalwards and Harrys, the Justinians of their day, will be the just tribute of the wise and the good to that monarch under whose sway so mighty an undertaking shall be accomplished. Of a truth, the holders of scriptres are most chiefly to be envied for that they bestow the power of thus conquering and ruling. It was the boast of Augustus-it formed part of the glare in which the perfidies of his earlier years were lost-that he found Rome of briek and left it of marble, a praise not unworthy a great prince, and to which the present also has its claims. But how much nobler will be the sovereign's boast when he shall have it to say that he found law dear and left it cherp, found it a scaled book, left it a living letter, found it the patrimony of the rich, left it the inheritance of the poor, found it the two edged sword of eraft and oppression, left it the staff of honesty and the shield of innocence!

(Frem Speech in Parliament in 18 8)

Amongst his one hundred and thirty three works (11 vols 1855-61, without the Autobiography, 1871, and ed. 1873) are a Discourse on Natural Theology an edition of Paley, a translation of Demos thenes Peri ton Stephanou Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Time of George III, Political Philosophy, Lives of Men of Letters and Science of the Time of George III, History of Ingland and France under the House of I ancaster, besides select cases, speeches, and tracts on scientific subjects and law reform

John, Lord Campbell (1779–1861), Lord Chancellor of England, was a son of the parish minister of Cupar-Fife, but he could trace his descent from the Earl of Argyll who fell at Flodden, and, through his mother, from the fourteenth-century Regent Albany He studied for the ministry at St Andrews University, became (1798) a tutor in London, joined Lincoln's Inn (1800), read law and acted as reporter and dramatic critic to the Morning Chronich, and was called to the Bar in 1806 His mist prius 'Reports' (1808) brought him into notice, and by 1824 he was leader of the Oxford circuit A King's Counsel in 1827, Whig MP successively for Stafford and for Dudley, he was made Solicitor-General and knighted in 1832 Attorney General in 1834, he was defeated at Dudley, but returned for Edin-Created Lord Campbell (1841), he was for six weeks Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and became successively Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1846), Chief-Justice of the Queen's Bench (1850), and Lord Chancellor of England A courteous and painstaking judge, as a legislator he carried through Parliament statutes on defamation, compensation for death by accident, and against obscene publications. His I ives of the Chief-Justices (1849-57) and of the Lord Chancellors (1845-47) liave become, in spite of their notorious faults, a part of English literature, though readable and full of novel and entertain ing matter and good stories, they are disfigured by the obtrusion of himself, and in the later volumes by ungenerous misconstruction, the as signment of base motives and an inaccuracy convenient for his own arguments. He horrowed freely without acknowledgment, what looks like malice is probably at times only carelessness, and it has been argued in pallition of his unkindest cuts that he had become blunted in his own feel Professor Gardiner and Mr Bass Mullinger, speaking with deliberation in their Introduction to English History, say the Lives of the Chancellors is throughout 'wanting in a due sense of the obliga tions imposed by such a task, is disfigured by un blushing plagrarisms, and, as the writer approaches his own times, by much unscrupillous misrepre sentation.' No doubt the uncomplimentity thee dotes and stinging remarks added to the vivacity Repeating Arbuthnot's bon met on of the Lives Curll's biographies, Sir Charles Wetherell declared of Campbell that 'his noble and biographical friend had added a new terror to death? the supplementary volume of the Chancellors (vol. vii.), published after Campbell's death, his characteristic faults are seen at their vorst

The following from his Life of Brough im will show the tone which irritated the subjects of his biographies and their friends

As a specimen of his 'Introductions I give an extract from that to his 'Speech at the I werpool I lection in t812'. [In the extract a parliamentary colleague of Brougham's is said to have 'abhorted the spirit of intrigue which not rarely gave some inferior man or some busy meddling woman probably unprincipled a sway in the destiny of the party fatal to its success and all but fatal to its character'!

If all this were true, it surely comes very ungraciously from one who had been a member of the Whig party above twenty years and who, within two years had passionately wished to continue in it. The It's he so uncourteously refers to is evidently Lady Holland, the wife of his friend Lord Holland, his early patron on his first coming to London—at whose hospitable bould I have often met him. Although Lady Holland e reanily had considerable influence in Whig councils. I do not believe that it was ever exercised against Brougham. But he was of a different opinion, and he would never after wards speak to her, for although he could forgive Lord Melbourne, he could not forgive her, who was supposed to have been Lord Melbourne's adviser in excluding him

In the session of 1838 Brougham carried on serv active hostilities against Lord Melbourne's Government, still showing Radical colours, but more and more sympathising and coming to an implied understanding with the Duke of Wellington, Lord I yndhurst, and the Tornes. They accused us of a disposition to revolutionise both Church and State from the proposed measure about Church Rates, and the practical admission of Roman Catholies to a fair share of power and patronage in Ireland, whereas Brougham still denounced us as Reac tionaries, Finalists, and Moek Reformers because we resisted for the present any further organic change. Being taunted by Lord Melbourne for his bitter oppo i tion to those with whom he had so long aetcd, and whom he had so zealously patronised in the year 1835, when he was no longer in office and they were pursuing the same policy as at present, he insisted that they had diverged, while he was marching strught forward

It is possible that he had worked himself into the behef that he was acting consistently and from purely disinterested motives, but, if so, he stood alone in this belief, for all the rest of montand agreed the revenue was the mampring of his conduct, and that his only consideration was his vide might most spite at I damine those by whom he had been ill used. The Radicals making great play against the Covernment boths ones sition which Mini ers offered to the ballo -- although he was one of the framers of the Peform Bill who had peremptonly objected to the proposal of his collergies Lord Durham and Sir James Graham to almit the billot, and so late as his famous Scotti h 'Process,' complaining of the incressorable Ladients, Le Lad into mate I an opinion that rather 100 much had I een done su the way of mnovement-he is a expressly recommended the follot, and told the Lords that "unless that Lori ships inside up, their mirds either to this remove or some measure of the sort for the prote-ties of electors it would be entried again tallem. The great prectical increase of the session was the Pill for the Better Government of the Consider There had been an open rebellion in I ower Canada ar Las Legislative Assembly hall thrown of allegrance to the I ngh h Crown. The in argents had been defeated and tranquillity had been restored. But a climb, e in the male of ruling the colons valuations allowed to be onlike pensable, and there was a necessity for emferring extraordinary powers on Lord Darlean, who in the energet cr had patriotically agreed to great as Covernor Lives the Dake of Welling on and Lord Lyndhurst concurred in the principle of the bill, althou, It they easy ned some of its details. I at Broagham funously apposed the bill, and every clause of it-las animosits on this occasion being sharpened by a special printee for cred by him against Lord Darham who in the year 1874 had charged him with having become a very cool Keformer, and 'little better than a Conservative'. In a great speech upon the subject which, according to his custom he published as a painphlet, with a Preface praising him self and vilifying others, he gave a narrative of the measures of the Government at home to meet the spirit of insubordination in Canada, and lie thus censural, their maction in the summer of 1837 . This somewhat cumbrous jocularity may have been produced by pure patriotism, but I must confess it seems to me rather an cbullition of envy, and that the pseudo-patriot was resenting his own exclusion from the luximous banquet sprend for the famished Whigs at the accession of Queen Victoria

The I res have passed through many editions both in Pritain and in America. Lord Campbell's wife a daughter of Lord Abinger was created Baroness Stratheden (1839). There is a Life of the Chancellor by his daughter, the Hon. Mrs. Hard castle, containing autobiographical materials diary and letters (1831).

Henry Hallam (1777-1859), son of the Dean of Wells, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and was called to the Bar by the Inner Temple. He was early appointed a Commissioner of Stamps, a well paid office which, with his private means, secured him a sufficient income and allowed him to withdraw from legal practice and prosecute those studies on which his fame rests 'Classic Hallam, much renowned for Greek, as Byron called him, was an early and important contributor His View of the State to the Edinburgh Review of Europe during the Middle Ages (1818), a series of dissertations on European history from the fifth to the end of the fifteenth century, at once gave him a front rank amongst English historians, and procured for him the honours of D C L and F R S In 1827 he published The Constitutional History of Eugland, from the Accession of Henry VII to the Death of George II, and in 1837-38 an Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries With vast stores of knowledge and indefatigable application, Hallam possessed a clear and independent judgment, and a style grave and impressive, though somewhat lacking in vivacity, colour, warmth, and His Introduction to the Literature of Lurope is a great monument of his erudition, though it-is impossible for any man to be infallible on such a wide field, and his judgments on literature were less original and less permanently valuable than his epoch making work in constitutional history. He insisted on the necessity of studying the original sources of history, and helped to found an English historical school His works must still be consulted by the student, though they can hardly be popular with the general reader His views of political questions were those generally adopted by the Whig party, but though stated with calmness and moderation, they provoked Southey and all Tories and High-Churchmen to wrath, and, on the other hand, secured Macaulay's enthusiastic laudation was peculiarly a supporter of principles, not of men, and was eminently judicial and judicious in his estimates, though somewhat insular in his sympathies and outlook In the Literature of Europe, though there too we seem to deal with shades rather than with living men of like passions with ourselves, there is at times something more of feeling and imagination, a more sympathetic tone, than could have been anticipated from the calm, unimpas sioned tenor of Hallam's historic style. Hallam, like Burke, in his latter years 'lived in an inverted they who ought to have succeeded him had gone before him, they who should have been to him as posterity were in the place of ancestors' His eldest son, Arthur Henry Hallam-the subject of Tennyson's In Memoriam-died in 1833, and another son, Henry Fitzmaurice Hallam, was taken from him, shortly after he had been called to the Bar, in 1850 Hallam wrote a memoir of his eldest son, prefixed to a collection of his literary remains in prose and verse privately printed in 1833, the poems were republished in 1893. Sir Henry Maine wrote a memoir of the second son, ultimately published with the remains of his brother

Italy in 1492

All around, in Lombardy and Romagna, the lamp of liberty had long since been extinguished in blood. The freedom of Siena and Genoa was dearly purchased by revolutionary proscriptions that of Venice was only a name. The republic which had preserved longest and with greatest purity that vestal fire had at least no relative degradation to fear in surrendering herself to Lorenzo de Medici. I need not in this place expanse upon what the name instantly suggests, the patronage of science and art, and the constellation of scholars and poets, of architects and painters, whose reflected beams cast their radiance around his head. His political reputation, though far less durable, was in his own age as eonspieuous as that which he required in the history Equally active and sagacious, he held his way through the varying combinations of Italian policy, always with credit, and generally with success Florence, if not enriched, was upon the whole aggrandised during his administration, which was exposed to some severe storms from the unscrupulous adversaries, Sixtus IV and Ferdinand of Naples whom he was compelled to As a patriot, indeed, we never can bestow upon Lorenzo de' Mediei the meed of disinterested virtue He completed that subversion of the Florentine republic which his two immediate ancestors had so well prepared The two councils, her regular legislature he superseded by a permanent senate of seventy persons, while the gonfalonier and priors, become a mockery and pageant to keep up the illusion of liberty, were taught that in exercising a legitimate authority without the sanction of their prince, a name now first heard at Florence, they incurred the risk of punishment for their audicity. I ven the total dilapidation of his commercial wealth war repaired at the cost of the State and the republic disgracefully screened the bankruptes of the Mether In But, compared with the statesmen of his my . we can reproach I orenzo with no hemons einne. He had many enemies, his descendants had many more, but no unequivocal charge of treachers or assas mation has been substantiated against his memory By the side of Galeazzo or I udovico Sforza, of I ordinand or his on Alfonso of Naples, of the Pope Sixtus IV, he shine with unspotted listre. So much was lorenzo e teemed ly his contemporaries that his premature death has frequently been considered as the cause of the c unhappy revolutions that speedily ensued, and which his foreight would, it was imagined, linve been able to prevent an opinion which, whether founded in probability or otherwise, afters the common sentiment about his character

If indeed Lorenzo de Medici could not have changed the destines of Italy, however premature his death in appear if we consider the ordinary duration of human existence, it must be admitted that for his own welfare perhaps for his glory, he had hived out the full in a ure of his time. An age of new and uncommon revolutions was about to an elamony the earliest of which the temporary downfall of his family was to be recloued. The long contested succession of Naples was again to involve Italy in var. The ambition of strangers was once more to desolate her plants.

So long as the three great nations of I proper vere unable to put forth their natural strength thio igh internal separation or foreign war, the Italians lind so little to dread for their independence that their policy was altogether directed to regulating the domestic balance of power among themselves. In the latter part of the fifteenth century a more enlarged view of I urope would have manifested the necessity of reconciling petty animosities and sacrificing petty ambition in order to preserve the nationality of their governments, not by attempting to melt down Lombards and Neapolitans, principalities and republies, into a single monarchy, but by the more just and rational scheme of a common federation. The politicians of Italy were abundantly competent, as far as cool and clear understanding could render them, to perceive the interests of their country But it is the will of Providence that the highest and surest wisdom, even in matters of policy, should never be unconnected with virtue. In relieving hims If from an immediate danger, Ludovico Sforza overlooked the consideration that the presumptive heir of the Ling of France claimed by an ancient title that principality of Milan which he was compassing by usurpation and But neither Milan nor Naples was free from other claimants than Irance, nor was she reserved to enjoy unmolested the spoil of Italy A londer and a londer strain of warlike dissonance will be heard from the banks of the Danube and from the Mediterranean The dark and wily Terdinand, the rish and lively Maximilian, are preparing to hasten into the lists the schemes of ambition are assuming a more comprehensive aspect, and the controversy of Neapolitan succession is to expand into the long rivalry between the houses of I rance and Austria But here, while Italy is still untouched, and before as yet the first lances of France gleam along the defiles of the Alps, we close the lustory of the Middle Ages (From the State of Europe ) opinion, was entirely other in e. It is spine another question whether the parliament were just first in their tenstance to the ling's legal authority. In we now contend that when Hotham by their command shot the gates of Hull against his source a, when the militia was called out in different courses by an ordi nance of the two Houses, bolt of which preceded by several weeks my levying of force for the king, the bonds of our constitutional law were by them and their servents snapped asunder, and it would be the more pedantry and chicano of political exhibits to inquire, even if the fact could be better a certained, whether at I dgehill, or in the minor skirmishes that preceded, the first carbane was discharged by a cava her or a roundhead. The aggressor in a war is not the first who uses force, but the first who renders force

But, whether we may think this war to have originated in the king's or the parliament's aggression, it is still evident that the former had a fur eause with the nation a cause which it was no plain violation of justice to defend. He was supported by the greater part of the Peers by full one third of the Commons by the principal body of the gentry, and a large proportion of other classes. If his adherents did not form, as I think they did not, the majority of the people, they were at least more numerous, beyond comparison, than those who demanded or approved of his death. The steady, deliberate perseverance of so considerable a body in any cause takes away the right of punishment from the conquerors, beyond what their own safety or reasonable indemnification may require. The vanquished are to be judged by the rules of national, not of municipal law Hence, if Charles, after having by a course of victorics or the defection of the people prostrated all opposition, had abused his triumph by the execution of Lssex or Hampden, Fairfax or Cromwell, I think that later ages would have disapproved of their deaths as positively, though not quite as vehemently, as they have of his own. The line is not easily drawn, in abstract reason ing, between the treason which is justly punished and the social schism which is beyond the proper boundaries of law, but the civil war of England seems plainly to fall within the latter description. These objections strike me as unanswerable, even if the trial of Charles had been sanctioned by the voice of the nation through its legitimate representatives, or at least such a fair and full convention as might, in great necessity, supply the place of lawful authority But it was, as we all know, the act of a bold but very small minority, who, having forcibly expelled their colleagues from parliament, had usurped, under the protection of a military force, that power which all England reckoned illegal I cannot perceive what there was in the Imagined solemnity of this proceeding, in that insolent mockery of the forms of justice, accompanied by all unfairness and inhumanity in its circumstances, which can alleviate the guilt of the transaction, and if it be alleged that many of the regicides were firmly persuaded in their consciences of the right and duty of condemning the king, we may surely remember that private murderers have often had the same apology

In discussing each particular transaction in the life of Charles, as of any other sovereign, it is required by the truth of lustory to spare no just animadversion upon his faults, especially where much art has been employed by the writers most in repute to carry the stream of public prejudice in an opposite direction. But when we come to a general estimate of his character, we should act unfairly not to give heir full weight to those peculiar circumstances of his condition in this worldly seene which tend to account for and extenuate his failings station of kings is, in a moral sense, so unfavourable that those who are least prone to servile admiration should be on their guard against the opposite error of an uncandid There seems no fairer method of estimating the intrinsic worth of a sovereign than to treat him as a subject, and to judge, so far as the history of his life enables us, what he would have been in that more private and happier condition from which the chance of birth has excluded him I ried by this test, we cannot doubt that Charles I would have been not altogether an ammble man, but one deserving of general esteem, his firm and conscientious virtues the same, his devin tions from right far less frequent than upon the throne It is to be pleaded for this prince that his youth had breathed but the contaminated air of a profligate and servile court—that he had imbibed the lessons of arbi trary power from all who surrounded him-that he had been betrayed by a father's culpable blindness into the dangerous society of an ambitions, unprincipled favourite To have maintained so much correctness of morality as his enemies confess, was a proof of Charles's virtuous dispositions, but his advocates are compelled also to own that he did not escape as little injured by the poisonous adulation to which he had listened. Of a temper by nature, and by want of restraint, too pas sionate, though not vindictive, and, though not erucl, certainly deficient in gentleness and liumanity, he was entirely untit for the very difficult station of royalty. and especially for that of a constitutional king impossible to excuse his violations of liberty on the score of ignorance, especially after the Petition of Right, because his impatience of opposition from his council made it unsafe to give him any advice that thwarted His other great fault was want his determination of sincerity-a fault that appeared in all parts of his life, and from which no one who has paid the subject any nttention will pretend to exculpate him indeed who know nothing but what they find in Hume may believe, on Hume's authority, that the king's contemporaries never deemed of imputing to him any deviation from good faith, as if the whole conduct of the parliament had not been evidently founded upon a distrust which on many occasions they very explicitly declared. But, so for as this insucerity was shown in the course of his troubles, it was a failing which untoward circumstances are apt to produce, and which the extreme hypoensy of many among his ad versaries might sometimes palliate. Ten personages in lustory, we should recollect, have had so much of their actions revealed and commented upon as Charles, it is perhaps a mortifying truth that those who have stood highest with posterity have seldom been those who have been most accumtely known

Shakspeare's Self-retrospection.

There seems to have been a period of Shakspeare's life when his heart was ill at ease, and ill content with the world and his own conscience, the memory of hours misspent, the ping of iffection misplaced or unrequited, the experience of man's worser nature, which intercourse with unworthy associates, by choice or electimistances, peculiarly teaches these, as they sank into the depths of his great mind, seem not only to have inspired into a it the conception of Lear and Timon, but that of one primary character, the censurer of mankind is first seen in the philosophic melancholy of Jaques, gizing with an undiminished serenity, and with a gatety of faney, though not of manners, on the follies of the It assumes a graver cast in the exiled Duke of the same play, and next one rather more severe in the Duke of Measure for Measure In all these, however, it is merely contemplative philosophy. In Hamlet this is mingled with the impulses of a perturbed heart under the pressure of extraordinary encumstances, it shines no longer, as in the former characters, with a steady light, but plays in fitful coruscations amidst feigned guety and extravagance. In Lear it is the firsh of sudden inspiration neross the meongruous imagery of madness, in Timon it is obscured by the exaggerations of misanthropy These plays all belong to nearly the same period 1s You Like It being usually referred to 1600, Tirron to the same vent, Measure for Measure to 1603, and Lear to 1604. In the later plays of Shakspeare, especially in Macbeth and the Tenfest, much of moral speculation will be found by he has never returned to this type of character in the personages (From the Literature of Lurofe)

Blind Milton's Memories

In the numerous imitations, and still more numerous traccs, of older poetry which we perceive in Paradise Lost, it is always to be kept in mind that he had only his recollection to rely upon His blindness seems to have been complete before 1654, and I scarcely think he had begun his poem before the anxiety and trouble into a hich the public strife of the Commonwealth and Restoration had thrown him gave leisure for inimortal Then the remembrance of early reading occupations came over his darl and lonely path, like the moon emerging from the clouds Then it was that the Muse was truly his, not only as she poured her creative inspiration into his mind, but as the daughter of Memors, coming with fragments of ancient melodies, the voice of Lumpides, and Homer, and Tasso, sounds that he had loved in youth, and treasured up for the soluce of his age. They who, though not enduring the calamity of Milton, have known what it is, when afar from bools, in solitude or in travelling, or in the intervals of worldly care, to feed on poetical recollections, to murmur over the beautiful lines whose cadence has long delighted their ear, to recall the sentiments and images which retain by association the charm that early verrs once give them-they will feel the inestimable value of committing to the memory, in the prime of its pover, what it will easily receive and indebbly retain I know not, indeed, whether an elucation that deals much with poetry, such as is still usual in England, has any more solid argument among many in its favour than that it lays the foundation of intellectual pleasures at the other extreme of life. (From the Literature of Eurofe)

Hallam has no found a detailed biographer the facts of his life inult be sought for in the obstuary notices of the Times the Royal Society's Fransactions and Mignet's Volice Historique read to the French Academy of Sciences Harriet Martineau's Biographic call Sketones and similar brief articles. There have been many editions in Labridgments of his works

Richard Whately (1787-1863), Archbishop of Dublin, was born in London, fourth son of Dr Joseph Whately of Nonsuch Park, Surrey, who was vicar of Widford, prebendary of Bristol, and lecturer it Gresham College From a private school at Bristol, Richard in 1805 passed to Oriel College, at Oxford he gained the prize for the English essay (1810), and vas elected a Fellow of Oricl (1811), where Copleston, Davidson, Arnold, Keble, and Hawlins were already Fellows, and Newman and Pusey were to be ere long In his Apologia Nev man has recorded that it was Whately who opened his mind and taught him how to think and reason Become one of the college tutors (1815), he wrote for the Encyclopædia Metropolitana what he afterwards expanded into his popular treatises on Logic (1826) and Rhetoric (1828) He had in irried in 1821, and accepted the living of Haless orth in Suffoll, and he had already given the world the first proof of his characteristic humour in Historie Doubts relative to Napoteon Bonaparte (1819)—an ingenious attempt to redure to an absurdity Hume's position that no testimony is sufficient to prove a miracle. In 1822 he delivered the Bampton Lectures at Oxford, on the Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Religion

In 1825 he was appointed Principal of St Alban's Hall, and in 1829 Professor of Political Economy, but had only given a few lectures when in 1831 lie was made Archbishop of Dublin Whately, though a strong logician, had little of the speculative faculty, had no faith in metaphysics or dogmatic theology, read little but a few favourite authors, knew little French and no German, and contemned classical researches as much as he did modern art. But his acute intellect enlightened every subject that he touched, and his powers of exposition and illustration have hardly ever been surpassed A Liberal in religion and in politics, he may be counted one of the founders of the Broad Church party rational in temper, sober and impartial, he was a resolute opponent of the Tractarian movement, but to the Evangelicals he seemed little better than a Latitudinarian, for he supported Catholic emancipation and concurrent endowment, and laboured long, but in vain, to establish a system of unsec tarian religious instruction. Still worse, he was more than suspected of holding unsound views on future punishment and the Sabbath question, and of being somewhat Sabellian on the nature and attributes of Christ, he was always an outspoken denouncer of Calvinism His caustic wit, abrupt nianners, and fearless outspokenness brought him no little unpopularity, but the sterling honesty of his nature, his charity, justice, and sagacity, gained lum many friend-hips of unusual permanence and warmth, and conquered for him the respect of all Of his books may be named Essays on some of the Peculiarities of the Christian Religion (1825), Essays on some of the Difficulties in the Writings of St Paul (1828), Thoughts on the Sabbath (1830), Christian Lvidences (1837), Essays on some of the Dangers to Christian Faith (1839), The Kingdom of Christ Delineated (1841), and his edition of Bacon's Essays, with annotations not unworthy of the text (1856), as well as Paley's Evidences and Moral Philosophy

From the 'Historic Doubts'

Now this is precisely the point I am tending to, for the fact exactly accords with the above supposition, the dis cordance and mutual contradictions of these witnesses being such as would alone throw a considerable shade of doubt over their testimony It is not in minute circumstances alone that the discrepancy appears, such as. might be expected to appear in a narrative substantially true, but in very great and leading transactions, and such as are very intimately connected with the supposed hero For instance, it is by no means agreed whether Bona parte led in person the celebrated charge over the bridge of Lodi (for celebrated it certainly is, as well as the siege of Troy, whether either event ever really took place or no), or was safe in the rear, while Augereau performed the exploit the same doubt hangs over the charge of the French cavalry at Waterloo It is no less uncertain. whether or no this strange personage poisoned in Egypt a hospitalful of his own soldiers, and butchered in cold blood a garrison that had surrendered multiply instances, the battle of Borodino, v hich is represented as one of the greatest ever fought, is unequivocally claimed as a victory by both parties, nor is the question decided at this day. We have official accounts on both sides, circumstantially detailed, in the names of supposed respectable persons professing to have been present on the spot, yet totally irreconcilable. Both these accounts may be false, but since one of them must be false, that one (it is no matter which we suppose) proves incontro vertibly this important maxim that it is possible for a narrative, however circumstantial, ho cever steadily maintained, however public and however important the event it relates, however grave the authority on which it is published, to be nevertheless an entire fabrication.

Many of the events which have been recorded were probably believed much the more readily and firmly from the apparent caution and hesitation with which they were at first published—the vehement contradiction in our papers of many pretended French accounts, and the abuse lavished upon them for folsehood, exaggeration, and gasconade But is it not possible—is it not indeed perfectly natural—that the publishers of known falsehood should assume this cautious demeanour and this abhor rence of exaggeration in order the more easily to gain credit? Is it not also very possible that those who actu ally believed what they published may have suspected mere exaggiration in stories which were entire fictions? Many men have that sort of simplicity that they think themselves quite secure against being deceived provided they believe only part of the story they hear, when per haps the whole is equally false. So that perhaps these simple hearted editors, who were so vehement against lying bulletins and so wary in announcing their great news, were in the condition of a clown who thinks he has bought a great bargain of a Jew because he has beat down the price, perhaps from a guinea to a crown, for some article that is not really worth a groat

With respect to the character of Bonaparte, the dis sonance is, if possible, still grenter. According to some he was a wise, humane, magnanimous hero-others paint him as a monster of cruelty, meanness, and perfidy, some, even of those who are the most inveterate against him, speak very highly of his political and military abilityothers place him on the very verge of insanity allowing that all this may be the colouring of party prejudice (which surely is allowing a great deal), there is one point to which such a solution will hardly apply If there be anything that can be clearly ascertained in history, one would think it must be the personal courage of a military man, vet here we are as much at a loss as ever int the very same times and on the same occasions he is described by different writers as a man of undaunted intrepidity and as an absolute poltroon

What, then, are we to believe? If we are disposed to credit all that is told us, we must believe in the existence not only of one, but of two or three Bonapartes, if we admit nothing but what is well authenticated, we shall be compelled to doubt of the existence of any

It appears, then, that those on whose testimony the existence and actions of Bonaparte are generally believed ful in all the most essential points on which the credibility of witnesses depends first, we have no assurance that they have access to correct information, secondly, they have an apparent interest in propagating falsehood, and, thirdly, they palpably contradict each other in the most important points

Another erreumstance which throws additional sus picion on these tales is that the Wling party, as they are called—the warm advocates for liberty, and opposers of the encroachments of monarchical power-have for some time past strenuously espoused the cause and vindicated the character of Bonaparte, who is represented by all as having been, if not a tyrant, at least an absolute despot One of the most forward in this cause is a gentleman who once stood foremost in holding up this very man to public execution-who first published, and long maintained against popular incredulity, the accounts of his atrocities in Lgypt Now, that such a course should be adopted, for party purposes, by those who are aware that the whole story is a fiction, and the hero of it imaginary, seems not very incredible, but if they believed in the real existence of this despot, I cannot conceive how they could so forsake their principles as to advocate his cause and enlogise his character

After all, it may be expected that many who perceive the force of these objections will yet be loth to think it possible that they and the public at large can have been so long and so greatly imposed upon, and thus it is that the magnitude and boldness of a fraud become its best support the millions who for so many ages have believed in Mahomet or Brahma lean, as it were, on each other for support, and not having vigour of mind enough boldly to throw off vulgar prejudices and dare be wiser than the multitude, persuade themselves that what so many have acknowledged must be true. Put I call on those who boast their philosophical freedom of thought, and would fain tread in the steps of Hume and other inquirers of the like exalted and speculative genius, to follow up fairly and fully their own principles, and, throwing off the shackles of authority, to examine carefully the evidence of whatever is proposed to them, before they admit its That even in this enlightened age, as it is called, a whole nation may be egregiously imposed upon, even in matters which intimately concern them, may be proved (if it has not been already proved) by the following instance. It was stated in the newspapers that a month after the battle of Trafilgar an English officer, who had been a prisoner of war, and was exchanged, returned to this country from I rance, and, beginning to condole with his countrymen on the terrible defeat they had sus tained, was infinitely astonished to learn that the battle of Trufalgar was a splendid victory he had been assured, he said, that in that battle the English had been totally defeated, and the I rench were fully and universally persunded that such was the fact Now, if this report of the belief of the French nation was not true, the British public were completely imposed upon, if it were true, then both nations were at the same time rejoicing in the event of the same battle as a signal victory to themselves, and consequently one or other at least of these nations must have been the dupes of their Govern ment, for if the battle was never fought at all, or was not decisive on either side, in that case both parties were deceived. This instance, I conceive, is ab olutely demon strative of the point in question

'But what shall we say to the testimony of those many respectable persons who went to Plymouth on purpose, and saw Bonaparte with their own eyes? Must their not trust their senses?' I would not disparage either the everight or the veracity of these gentlemen. I am ready to allow that they went to Plymouth for the purpose of seeing Bonaparte—nay, more, that they actually rowed out into the harbour in a boat, and came alongside of a man-of war, on whose deck they saw a man in a coeled hat, who, they were told, was Bonaparte is the utmost point to which their testimony goes. How they ascertained that this man in the cocked hat had gone through all the marvellous and romantic adventures with which we have so long been amused we are not told did they perceive in his physiognomy his true name and nuthentic history? Truly this evidence is such as country people give one for a story of apparitions, if you discover any signs of incredulity, they triumplantly show the very house which the ghost haunted, the iden tical dark corner where it used to vanish, and perhaps even the tombstone of the person whose death it foretold Jack Cade's nobility was supported by the same irresistable land of evidence. Having asserted that the eldest son of Ldmund Mortimer, Farl of March, was stolen by a beggar woman, 'became a brief layer when he came to age,' and was the father of the supposed Incl Cide, one of his companions confirms the story by saying, 'Sir, he made a chimney in my father's house, and the bricks are alive at this day to testify it, therefore deny it not?

Much of the same kind is the testimony of our brave countrymen, who are ready to produce the sears they received in fighting against this terrible Bonaparte. That they fought and were vounded they may safely testify, and probably they no less firmly believe what they were told respecting the cause in which they fought, it would have been a high breach of discipline to doubt it, and they, I conceive, are men better skilled in hand high a musket than in sifting evidence and detecting imposture, but I defy any one of them to come forward and delare, on his one incordings, what was the cause in which he fought under whose commands the opposed generals acted, and whether the person who issued those commands did really perform the mighty achievements we are told of

There is one more circumstance which I cannot forbear mentioning, because it so much adds to the nir of fiction which pervades every part of this marvellous tale, and that is, the nationality of it

Bonaparte prevailed over all the hostile States in turn, except Englar d, in the zenith of his power his fleets were swept from the sea, by England, his troops always defeat an equal, and frequently even a superior, number of those of any other nation, except the Luglish, and with them it is just the reverse, twice, and tyrce only, he is personally engaged against an English commander, and both. times he is totally defeated, at Aere and at Waterloo, and, to crown all, England finally crushes this tremen dous power, which has so long kept the Continent in subjection or in alarm, and to the English he surrenders lumself prisoner! Thoroughly national, to be sure! It may be all very true, but I would only ask, if a story had been fabricated for the express purpose of amusing the English nation, could it have been contrived more ingeniously? It would do admirably for an epic poem, and indeed hears a considerable resemblance to the Iliad and the Ancid, in which Achilles and the Greeks, A neas and the Trojans (the ancestors of the Romans), are so studiously held up to admiration. Bonaparte's exploits seem magnified in order to chlinnee the glory of his conquerors, just as Hector is allowed to triumph during the absence of Achilles merely to give additional splendour to his overthrow by the arm of that invincible hero Would not this circumstance alone render a history rather suspicious in the eyes of an acute critic, even if it were not filled with such gross improbabilities, and induce him to suspend his judgment till very satisfactory evidence (far stronger than can be found in this case, should be produced?

William Whewell (1794-1866) was the son of a Lancaster joiner, who intended him to follow his own trade, but he was early distinguished for intellectual aptitudes, and after passing with honour through the grammar-school at I measter he qualified at Heversham School for an exhibition at Trinity College Cambridge. Entering Trinity College in 1812, he graduated as second wrangler in 1815, became a Fellow in 1817, and in 1819 published a Irentise on Mechanics - He vas ordained priest in 1826 In 1828-32 he was Professor of Mineralogy, in 1838-55 Professor of Moral Theology or Casuistical Divinity, and from 1841 till his death he was Master of Frinity At Cambridge, in the Royal Society, and at the British Association he was equally distinguished, while his scientific works gave him a European fime After contributing largely to reviews, in 1833 he published his learned and eloquent Bridgewater Treatise on Astronomy and General Physics considered with reference to Natural Theology But his greatest work vas his History of the Inductive Sciences (1837), followed in 1840 by The Philosophy of the Inductive In 1853 he issued anonymously Of the Plurality of Worlds an Lssay (doubtless one of the ablest of his worls), in which he opposed the now popular belief, maintaining that the earth alone among stars and planets is the abode of intellectual, moral, and religious creatures—long cherished convictions which, he said, had graduilly grown Like Clialmers and Brewster, his friend Sir James Stephen thought the plurality of worlds was a doctrine which supplied consolation and eomfort to a mind oppressed with the aspect of the sin and misery of the earth But Whewell replied 'To me the effect would be the contrary I should have no consolution or comfort in thinking that our earth is selected is the aspecial abode of sin, and the consolution which revealed religion offers for this sin and misery is, not that there are other worlds in the stars sinless and happy, but that on the earth an atonement and reconciliation Thus doctrine gives a peculiar were effected place to the earth in theology It is, or line been, in a peculiar manner the scene of God's agency and presence. This was the view on which I " orked ' In opposition to Dean Mansel, who held that a true knowledge of God is impossible for man, Dr Whenell said 'If we cannot know anything about God, revelation is in vain cannot have anything revealed to us if we have It is of no power of seeing what is revealed no use to take away the yeal when we are blind? George Grote (1794-1871), born at Clay Hill near Beckenham in Kent, was educated at the Charterhouse, and in 1810 became a clerk in the bank founded in 1766 by his grandfather (a native of Bremen) in Threadneedle Street. He remained there thirty-two vears, devoting all his leisure to literature and political studies, a 'philosophical Radical' and a friend of the two Vills, he threw himself ardently into the cause of progress and political freedom. In 1820 he married the highspirited Harriet Lewin, of Beylev, in 1822 concented the idea of his History of Greece, and in 1826 mercilessly dissected Mitford's History in the Westminster Review Head of his bank by 1830, in 1832 he was returned to Parliament for the City of London. During his first session he brought forward a motion for the adoption of the ballot, and continued to advocate the measure in keenly argumentative speeches until he retired from parliamentary life in 1841. In 1843 he retired from the hanking-house also, and devoted himself exclusively to literature, mainly to the great History of Greece (12 vols 1846-56) He was elected Vice-Chancellor of London University (1862), foreign associate of the French Academy (1864), and President of University College (1868) In 1865 he concluded an elaborate work on Plato and the other Companions of Sociates, which, with his (unfinished) Arastotle, was supplementary to the History His brilliant and accomplished wife was throughout his literary and political life a sympathetic and stimulating helpmate Grote was buried in Westminster Abbey

The History of Greece was hailed as a truly philosophical work. It commences with the early legendary history of Greece, and closes with the fall of 'free Hellas and Hellenism' under the immediate successor of Alexander the Great. The first two volumes were not published till 1846, but at least as early as 1827 Grote was engaged on the work. The primitive period of Greek history—the expedition of the Argonauts and the wars of Thebes and Troy-he treated as mere poetical inventions Of the Homeric poems, he held that the Odyssey is an original unity, 'a premeditated structure and a concentra tion of interest upon one prime hero under well defined circumstances,' whereas the Iliad 'presents the appearance of a house built upon a plan comparatively narrow, and subsequently enlarged by successive additions' Both poems he fixes at the same age, and that age anterior to the First Olympiad. In the region of authentic history, Grote endeavoured to realise the views and feelings of the Greeks, and not to judge of them by a modern and English standard constant aim-not always attained or attainable -was to penetrate the inner life of the Greeks, and to portray their social, moral, and religious condition, passing lightly over merely picturesque and romantic episodes He traced with elaborate minuteness the rise and progress of the Athenian democracy, of which he was an ardent admirer, and some of the Athenian institutions heretofore condemned he warmly defended Ostracism, hanish ment without accusation or trial, he conceived to have been necessary for thwarting the efforts of ambitious leaders, this exceptional measure was, he held, guarded from abuse by precautions such as that the concurrence of one fourth of all the citizens was required, and that those citizens voted by ballot Demagogues and sophists he vindicated. comparing the former to our popular leaders of the Opposition, and the latter to our teachers and professors Even Cleon, the greatest of the demagogues, he held to have been unfairly traduced by Thucydides and especially by Aristophanes, who indulged in all the license of a comic satirist. 'No man,' said Grote, 'thinks of judging Sir Robert Walpole, or Mr Fox, or Mirabeau from the numerous lampoons put in circulation against them, no man will take the measure of a political Englishman from Punch or of a Frenchman from Charivari' Even the story of the Retreat of the Ten Thousand is retold by Grote with surprising freshness, and his narrative of the Peloponnesian War contains novel and striking views of events, as well as of the characters of Pericles and Alcibindes-whom he insisted on spelling Periklés and Alkibiadês, a method somewhat pedantically applied throughout (as in Sôkratês, Aristeidês, and the like, though Dionysius and Klearchus retained the Roman -us) In the later volumes important sections deal with the career of Epaminondas, the struggles of Demosthenes against Philip, and the success of Timoleon From the epoch of Alexander the Great, Grote dates 'not only the extinction of Greenn political freedom and selfaction, but also the decay of productive genius, and the debasement of that consummate literary and rhetorical excellence which the fourth century before Christ had seen exhibited in Plato and Demosthenes' There was, however, one branch of intellectual energy which continued to flourish

'comparatively little impaired under the preponderance of the Macedonian sword'—the spirit of speculation and philosophy. Grote's learning was sound, his research extensive and minute, but he was somewhat too confident in his capacity to discover the causes of all things, too ready to apply to Greek life and speculation his universal Benth imite standard. And his sympathies were as pronouncedly democratic as Mitford's had been aristocratic. Sydney Smith sarcastically said. 'Mr Grote is a very worthy, honest, and able man, and if the world were a chess board, would be an important politician. His main historic achieve ment was the explanation and vindication of the Athenian democracy, which most former British historians had grossly misunderstood In his admiration of Athens, however, he was prone to underrate other Hellenic developments, and the in justice of his treatment of Alexander the Great has been noted by later writers like Professor Mahaffy His style, like his thought, is vigorous, his presentment lucid rather than sympathetic, and there is some lack of that geniality which draws one to a favourite author But the History shed much new and clear light on Greek history, marked an epoch in the study, and superseded the recently published and scholarly work by Thirlwall, it was careful, comprehensive, accurate, and not unfair in judgment, though not without constant and obvious bias

Constitutionalism.

The theory of a constitutional king, especially as it exists in England, would have appeared to Aristotle impracticable, to establish a ling who vill reign with out governing-in whose name all government is carried on, yet whose personal will is in practice of little or no effect-exempt from all responsibility, without making use of the exemption-receiving from every one un measured demonstrations of homage, which are never translated into act except within the bounds of a linox n law-surrounded with all the paraphernalia of power, yet acting as a passive instrument in the hands of ministers marked out for his choice by indications which he is not at liberty to resist. This remarkable combination of the fiction of superhuman grandeur and license with the reality of an invisible strait naistcoat is what an I nglishman has in his inind when he speaks of a constitutional king. When the Greel's thought of a man exempt from legal responsibility, they conecived him as really and truly such, in deed as well as in name, with a defenceless community expo ed to his oppressions, and their fear and hatred of him vas measured by their reverence for a povernment of equal law and free speech, with the ascendency of which their whole hopes of security were associated, in the democ racy of Athens more, perhaps, than in any other portion of Gre ce And this feeling, as it was one of the best in the Greel mind, so it was also one of the most widely spread, a point of unanimity highly valuable amidst so many points of di sension. We cannot construe or criticise at by reference to the feelings of modern Lurope, still less to the very peculiar feelings of Lingland respecting kingship, and it is the application, sometimes explicit and sometimes tacit, of this unsuitable standard which renders Mr Mitford's appreciation of Greek politics so often incorrect and unfair

Xenophon's Address to the Army

While their camp thus remained unmolested, every man within it was a prey to the most agonising apprehensions. Ruin appeared impending and inevitable, though no one could tell in what precise form it would come. The Greeks were in the inidst of a hostile country, ten thousand stadia from home, surrounded by enemies, blocked up by impressible mountains and rivers, without guides, without provisions, without cavalry to aid their retreat, without generals to give orders. A stupor of sorrow and conseious helplessness seized inponall, few came to the evening injuster, few lighted fires to cook their suppers, every innally down to rest where he was, yet no man could sleep for fear, anguish, and yearning after relatives whom he was never again to behold

Amidst the many causes of despondency which weighed down this forlorn army, there was none more serious than the fact that not a single man among them had now either authority to command or obligation to take the initiative. Nor was any ambitious candidate likely to volunteer his pretensions at a moment when the post promised nothing but the maximum of difficults as well as of hazard. A new, self lindled light and self originated stimulus was required to vivify the embers of suspended hope and action in a mass paralysed for the moment, but every way capable of effort, and the inspiration now fell, happily for the army, upon one in whom a full measure of soldierly strength and courage was combined with the education of an Athenian, a democrat, and a philosopher

Xenophon had equipped himself in his finest military costume at this his first official appearance before the army, when the scales seemed to tremble between life and death Taking up the protest of Kleanor against the treachery of the Persians, he insisted that any attempt to enter into convention or trust with such liars would be utter ruin, but that if energetic resolution were taken to deal with them only it the point of the sword, and punish their misdeeds, there was good hope of the favour of the gods and of ultimate preservation pronounced this last word one of the soldiers near him happened to sneeze, immediately the whole army around shouted with one accord the accustomed invocation to Zeus the Preserver, and Xenophon, taking up the accident, continued 'Since, gentlemen, this omen from Zeus the Preserver has appeared at the instant when we were talking about preservation, let us here vow to offer the preserving sacrifice to that god, and at the same time to sacrifice to the remaining gods as well as we can, in the first friendly country which we may reach every man who agrees with me hold up his hand' All held up their hands, all then joined in the vow, and shouted the pæan

This accident, so dexterously turned to profit by the rhetorical skill of Xenophon, was eminently beneficial in rusing the army out of the depression which weighed them down, and in disposing them to listen to his animating appeal. Repeating his assurances that the gods were on their side and hostile to their perjured enemy, he recalled to their memory the great invasions of Greece by Darius and Nerves-how the vast hosts of Persia had been disgracefully repelled. The army had shown themselves on the field of Kunaxa worthy of such forefathers, and they would, for the future, be yet bolder, knowing by that battle of what stuff the Persians were made As for Arreus and his troops, alike traitors and cowards, their desertion was rather a gain than a The enemy were superior in horsemen, but men on horseback were, after all, only men, half occupied in the fear of losing their seats, incapable of prevuling against infantry firm on the ground, and only better able to run away Now that the satrap refused to furnish them with provisions to buy, they on their side were released from their covenant, and would take provisions without buying. Then as to the rivers those were indeed difficult to be crossed in the middle of their course, but the army would march up to their sources, and could then pass them without wetting the Or, indeed, the Greeks might renounce the idea of retreat, and establish themselves permanently in the king's own country, defying all his force, like the Mysians and Pisidians 'If,' said Xenophon, 'we plant ourselves here at our ease in a rich country, with these tall, stately, and beautiful Median and Persian women for our companions, we shall be only too ready, like the Lotophagi, to forget our way home. We ought first to go back to Greece, and tell our countrymen that if they remun poor it is their own fault, when there are rich settlements in this country awaiting all who choose to come, and who have courage to seize them. Let us burn our baggage wagons and tents, and carry with us nothing but what is of the strictest necessity Above all things, let us maintain order, discipline, and obedience to the commanders, upon which our entire hope of safety depends Let every man promise to lend his hand to the commanders in punishing any displedient indi viduals, and let us thus show the enemy that we have ten thousand persons like Klearchus, instead of that one whom they have so perfidiously seized. Now is the time for action. If any man, however obscure, has any thing better to suggest, let him come forward and state it, for we have all but one object—the common safety?

It appears that no one else desired to say a word, and that the speech of Xenophon gave unqualified satisfaction, for when Cheirisophus put the question, that the meeting should sanction his recommendations, and finally elect the new generals proposed, every man held up his hand \enophon then moved that the army should break up immediately and march to some well stored villages, rather more than two miles distant, that the murch should be in a hollow oblong, with the baggage in the centre, that Cheirisophus, as a Lacedæmonian, should lead the van, while kleanor and the other senior officers would command on each flank, and himself with Timasion, as the two youngest of the generals, would lead the rear guard

Dion

Apart from wealth and high position, the personal character of Dion was in itself marked and prominent. He was of an energetic temper, great bravery, and very considerable mental capacities. Though his nature was haughty and disdainful towards individuals, yet as to political communion his ambition was by no means purely self seeking and egotistic, like that of the elder Dionysius. Animated with vehement love of power, he was at the same time penetrated with that sense of regulated polity and submission of individual will to fixed laws which floated in the atmosphere of Grecian talk and literature, and stood so high in Grecian morality. He was, moreover, capable of acting with enthusiasm, and braving every hazard in prosecution of his own convictions.

Born about the year 408 B C., Dion was twenty one years of age in 387 BC, when the elder Dionysius, liaving dismantled Rhegium and subdued Kroton, attained the maximum of his dominion, as master of the Sicilian and Italian Greeks Standing high in the favour of his brother in law Dionysius, Dion doubtless took part in the wars whereby this large dominion had been acquired, as well as in the life of indulgence and luxury which prevailed generally among wealthy Greeks in Sicily and Italy, and which to the Athenian Plato appeared alike surprising and repulsive That great philosopher visited Italy and Sicily about 387 B C was in acquaintance and fellowship with the school of philosophers called Pythagoreans, the remnant of the Pythagorean brotherhood, who had once exercised so powerful a political influence over the cities of those regions, and who still enjoyed considerable reputation, even after complete political downfall, through individual ability and rank of the members, combined with habits of recluse study, mysticism, and attachment among themselves. With these Pythagoreans Dion also, a young man of open mind and ardent aspirations, was naturally thrown into communication by the proceedings of the elder Dionysius in Italy Through them he came into intercourse with Plato, whose conversation made an epoch

The mystic turn of imagination, the sententious brevity, and the mathematical researches of the Pythagoreans produced doubtless an imposing effect upon Dion, just as Lysis, a member of that brotherhood, had acquired the attrchment and influenced the sentiments of Epami nondas at Thebes But Plato's power of worling upon the minds of young men was far more impressive and irresistible. He possessed a large range of practical experience, a inistery of political and social topics, and a charm of cloquence to which the Pythagoreans were strangers The stirring effects of the Sokratic tall, as well as of the democratical atmosphere in which Plato had been brought up, had developed all the communica tive aptitude of his mind, and great as that aptitude appears in his remaining dialogues, there is ground for believing that it was far greater in his conversation. greater perhaps in 387 BC, when he was still mainly the Sokratic Plato, than it became in later days after he had imbibed to a certain extent the mystieism of the Pythagoreans Brought up as Dion had been at the court of Dionysius, accustomed to see around him only slavish deference and luxurious enjoyment, unused to open speech or large philosophical discussion, he found in Plato a new man exhibited, and a new world opened before him

As the stimulus from the teacher was here put forth with consummate efficacy, so the predisposition of the learner enabled it to take full effect. Dion became an altered man both in public sentiment and in individual behaviour. He recollected that, twenty years before, his country, Syricuse, had been as free as Athens He learned to ablior the iniquity of the despotism by which her liberty had been overthrown, and by which subse quently the liberties of so many other Greeks in Italy and Sicily had been trodden down also. He was made to remark that Sicily had been half barbarised through the foreign mercenaries imported as the despots' instru ments. He conceived the sublime idea or dream of rectifying all this accumulation of wrong and suffering It was his first wish to cleans. Syracuse from the blot of slavery, and to clothe her anew in the brightness and dignity of freedom, yet not with the view of restoring the popular government as it had stood prior to the usurpation, but of establishing an improved constitu tional polity, originated by himself, with laws which should not only secure individual rights, but also educate and moralise the citizens. The function which he imagined to himself, and which the conversation of Plato suggested, was not that of a despot like Dionysius, but that of a despotie legislator like Lykurgus, taking advantage of a momentary omnipotence, conferred npon him by grateful citizens in a state of public confusion, to originate a good system which, when once put in motion, would keep itself alive by fushioning the minds of the citizens to its own intrinsic excellence

Grote's minor works were published by Professor Bun in 1873 and Fragments on Ethical Subjects in 1876—Mrs Grote (1793-1873) wrote a Memoir of Ars Scheffer (1860) a volume of Collected Papers in Prose and Verse (1862) books on the Philosophical Radicals of 1832 (especially Molesworth) and on the political events of 1831-32, and The Personal I ife of George Grote (1873).

Adam Sedgwick (1785-1873), born at Dent vicarage in north-west Yorkshire, after being a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, became Woodwardian Professor of Geology (1818), canon of Norwich (1834), and vice master of Trinity (1847). His best work was on British Palacocic Fossils (1854), he trenchantly attacked The Vestiges of Creation and Darwin's Origin of Species. See his Life and Letters by Clark and Hughes (2 vols 1890).

D1 Thomas Arnold of Rugb, (1795-1842), who in many ways influenced the thought and life of England, holds his place in literature mainly in virtue of his History of Rome A native of East Cowes in the Isle of Wight, where his father was collector of customs, he was educated at Winchester, and afterwards it Oxford, being elected a scholar of Corpus in 1811 and a Tellow of Oriel in 1815. He remained at Oxford four more years, teaching pupils, and in his twenty fifth year he settled at I alcham near Strines in Middleses where he tool pupils, married, and spent nine vears of happiness and study He took priest's orders in 1828, and in the same year he was appointed to the headmastership of Rught School He longed to 'try whether our public school system has not in it some noble elements which may produce fruit even to life eternal,' and his exertions not only rused Rughy School to exceptional eminence and success but introduced an inestimable change and improvement into all the public schools in England. He trusted much to the 'sixth form,' or elder boys, who evercised a recognised authority over the junior pupils and these he inspired with love, reverence, and confi-His interest in his pupils was that of a parent, and it was unccasing. On Sunday he prenched to them, 'he was still the instructor and the schoolmaster, only teaching and educating with increased solemnity and energy! His firmness, his sympathy, his fine manly character and devotion to duty, in time bound all good hearts to him Out of doors Arnold had also his battles to fight He was a Liberal in politics, and a keen Church reformer To the High Church party he was strenuously opposed, the Church, he said meant not the priesthood, but the body of believers Nothing could save the Church but a union with the Dissenters, and the civil power was more able than the clergy not only to govern but to fix the doctrines of the Church These Erastian views, propounded with his usual zeal and earnestness, offended and alarmed many of Arnold's own friends. His liberalism shocked the mass of the devout, and his reverent religious spirit puzzled those more 'advanced' than he was In 1841 he was nomi nated Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford His inaugural lecture was attended by a vast concourse of students and friends, for the popular tide had now turned in his favour, and his apparently robust health promised a long succession of professorial triumphs, as well as of general usefulness He had purchased For How, in one of the most beautiful parts of the Lake country, spending all his spare time there, and he was preparing to return thither in the summer of 1842, when one night he had an attack of angina pectoris, and died next morning (12th June)

Arnold's works give but a faint idea of what he accomplished—he was emphatically a man of action, but his writings are characteristic of the man—earnest, clear in conception and style, and independent in thought. His History of Rome, which he intended to carry down to the fall of the Western Empire, was completed only to the end of the Second Punic War (3 vols 1838-42), his Oxford Litures on Modern History, and a history of the later Roman commonwealth (reprinted from the Encyclopædia Metropolitana), were published after his death, and he edited Thucydides Six volumes of his Sermons, chiefly delivered to the Rugby boys, were also printed, with a volume of tracts on social and political topics In the History of Rome -the first two volumes especially-he very closely follows Niebuhr, expanding the theory that the commonly received history of the early centuries of Rome was in great part fabulous, as being founded on popular songs or lays chanted by minstrels or recited by imaginative chroniclers at Roman banquets His strong moral feeling and hatred of tyranny in all its shapes occasionally break forth, and he gave animation to his narrative by contrasting ancient with modern events, thereby giving later historians an example apt to prove dangerous to the historic spirit.

Scipio

A mind like Scipio's, working its way under the peculiar influences of his time and country, cannot but move irregularly—it cannot but be full of contradictions I'wo hundred years later the mind of the dictator, Cæsar, acquiesced contentedly in epicureanism, he re tained no more of enthusiasin than was inseparable from the intensity of his intellectual power and the fervour of his courage, even amidst his utter moral degrada tion. But Scipio could not be like Cresar His mind rose above the state of things around him, his spirit was solitary and kingly; he was cramped by living among those as his equals whom he felt fitted to guide as from some higher sphere, and he retired at last to Liternum, to breathe freely, to enjoy the simplicity of his childhood, since he could not fulfil his natural calling to be a hero king. So far he stood apart from his countrymen-admired, reverenced, but not loved But he could not shake off all the influences of his time the virtue, public and private, which still existed at Rome, the reverence paid by the wisest and best men to the religion of their fathers, were elements too congenial to his nature not to retain their hold on it they cherished that nobleness of soul in him, and that faith in the invisible and divine, which two centuries of growing unbelief rendered almost impossible in the days of Cresar Yet how strange must the conflict be when faith is combined with the highest intellectual power, and its appointed object is no better than paganism! Longing to beheve, yet repelled by palpable folsehood -crossed inevitably with snatches of unbelief, in which hypocrist is ever close at the door-it breaks out desperitely, as it may seem, into the region of dreams and visions, and mysterious communings with the invisible, as if longing to find that food in its own creations which no outward objective truth offers to it. The proportions of belief and unbelief in the human mind in such cases no human judgment can determine—they are the wonders of history, characters inevitably misrepresented by the vulgar, and viewed even by those who, in some sense, have the key to them as a mystery not fully to be comprehended, and still less explained to others genius which conceived the incomprehensible character of Hamlet would alone be able to describe with intuitive truth the character of Scipio or of Cromwell With all his greatness there was a waywardness in him which seems often to accompany genius, a self idolatry, natu ral enough when there is so keen a consciousness of power and of lofty designs, a self-dependence, which feels even the most sacred external relations to be un essential to its own perfection. Such is the Achilles of Homer, the highest conception of the individual hero relying on himself, and sufficient to himself same poet who conceived the character of Achilles has also drawn that of Hector, of the truly noble, because unselfish, hero, who subdues his genius to make it minister to the good of others who lives for his rela tions, his friends, and his country. And as Scipio lived in himself and for himself like Achilles, so the virtue of Hector was worthily represented in the life of his great rival Hannibal, who, from his childhood to his latest hour, in war and in peace, through glory and through obloquy, nmid victories and amid disappointments, ever remembered to what purpose Lis father had devoted him, and withdrew no thought or desire or deed from their pledged service to his country

Hannibal.

If Hannibal's genius may be likened to the Homeric god, who, in his hatred of the Trojans, rises from the deep to rally the fainting Greeks, and to lead them against the enemy, so the calm courage with which Hector met his more than human adversary in his country's cause is no unworthy image of the unyielding magninimity displayed by the aristocracy of Rome- As Hannibal utterly eclipses Carthage, so, on the contrary, Fabius, Marcellus, Claudius Nero, even Scipio limself, are as nothing when compared to the spirit and wisdom and power of Rome. The senate, which voted its thanks to its political enemy, Varro, after his disastrous defeat, because he had not despaired of the common wealth, and which disdained either to solicit, or to reprove, or to threaten, or in any way to notice the twelve colonies which had refused their accustomed supplies of men for the army, is far more to be honoured than the conqueror of Zama This we should the more carefully bear in inind, because our tendency is to ad mire individual greatness far more than national; and as no single Roman will bear comparison with Hannibal, we are apt to murmur at the event of the contest, and to think that the victory was awarded to the least worthy of the combatants. On the contrary, never was the wisdom of God's providence more manifest than in the issue of the struggle between Rome and Carthage It was clearly for the good of mankind that Hannibal should be conquered his triumph would have stopped the progress of the world For great men can only nct permanently by forming great nations, and no one man, even though it were Hannibal himself, can in one generation effect such a work. But where the nation has been merely enhandled for a while by a great man's spirit, the light passes away with him who communi cated it, and the nation when he is gone is like a dead body to which magic power had for a moment given an unnatural life, when the charm has ceased the body is cold and stiff as before. He who grieves over the battleof Zama should carry on his thoughts to a period thirty years later, when Hannibal must, in the course of nature, have been dead, and consider how the isolated Phoenician city of Carthage was fitted to receive and to consolidate the civilisation of Greece, or by its laws and institutions to bind together barbarians of every rice and language into an organised empire, and prepare them for becoming when that empire was dissolved, the free members of the commonwealth of Christian Lurope.

The Siege of Genoa

In the autumn of 1799 the Austrians had driven the French out of Lombardy and Piedmont, their list victory of Possano or Genola had won the fortress of Com or Cuneo, close under the Alps, and at the vers extremity of the plain of the Po, the I rench ching to Italy only by their hold of the Riviers of Genoa, the narrow strip of coast between the Apennines and the sea, which extends from the frontiers of France almost to the mouth of the Arno Hither the remains of the French force were collected, commanded by General Massena, and the point of chief importance to his defence was the city of Genor Napoleon had just returned from I gypt, and was become larst Consul, but he could not be expected to take the field till the following spring, and till then Massena was hopeless of relief from without-everything was to depend on his The strength of his army made it im own pertinacity possible to force it in such a position as Genoa, but its very numbers, added to the population of a great city, held out to the enemy a hope of reducing it by famine, and as Genoa derives most of its supplies by sea, Lord Keith, the British naval commander in chief in the Mediterranean, lent the assistance of his naval force to the Austrians, and by the vigilance of his cruisers, the whole coasting trade right and Lft along the Riviera was effectually cut off . It is not at once that the in habitants of a great city, accustomed to the duly sight of well stored shops and an abundant market, begin to realise the idea of scarcity, or that the wealthy classes of society, who have never known any other state than one of abundance and luxury, begin seriously to conceive of famine But the shops were emptied, and the store houses began to be drawn upon, and no fresh supply or hope of supply appeared Winter passed away, and spring returned, so early and so beautiful on that garden like coast, sheltered as it is from the north winds by its belt of mountains, and open to the full range of the southern sun Spring returned, and clothed the hill sides with its fresh verdure. But that verdure was no longer the mere delight of the careless eye of luxury, refreshing the citizens with its liveliness and softness when they rode or walked up thither from the city to enjoy the surpassing beauty of the prospect. The green hillsides were now visited for a very different object ladies of the highest rank might be seen cutting up every plant which it was possible to turn to food, and bearing home the common weeds of our roadsides as a most precious treasure. The French general pitied the dis tress of the people, but the lives and strength of his gurison seemed to him more important than the lives of the Genoese, and such provisions as remained were reserved, in the first place, for the French army Scarcity became utter want, and want became famine. In the most gorgeous palaces of that gorgeous city, no less than in the humblest tenements of its humblest poor, death was busy, not the momentary death of buttle or massiere, nor the speedy death of pestilence, but the lingering death of familie. Infants died before their parents' eyes, husbands and whee lay down to expire together. A man whom I saw at Genoa in 1825 told me that his father and two of his brothers had been started to death in this fatal siege. So it went on till, in the month of June, when Napoleon had niready de scended from the Alps into the plains of Lombardy, the misery became unendurable, and Massena surrendered. But before he did so, twenty thousand innocent persons, old and young, women and children, had died by the most horrible of deaths which humainty can endure!

An Edinburgh reviewer said all Arnold's works were 'proofs of his ability and goodness' yet the story of his hie is worth them all and that story has been told to admiral to purpo e by Dean Stauley in his I tie of Arnold (1845) 12th ed. with additions 1881, newed 1900). See also Findlay's Arnold of Kingly (1897), Sir Joshua Fisch on Thomas and Matthew Arnold and their Influence on Finglat Education (1897) and the Riggly idyll Tom Brevius Schoollays by Thomas Hughes Charles H Pearson has somewhat trenchantly criticised the 'Arnold tradition, and insisted on certain defects in the Riggly system, see his I tie by Stebbing (1900). Matthew Arnold the poet and critic, was Dr Arnold's eldest son his second, Thomas, father of Mrs Humphry Ward wrote on his torical subjects and literature and as a good Catholic helped to edit a Catholic Dictiviary.

He was called to the Bar in 1825, but in 1827 took orders, having two years before translated Schleiermacher's Lisas on St Luke, then re garded as alarmingly 'rationalistic' His return to Cambridge was marked by the translation, with his friend Julius Hare, of Niebulie's His tory of Rome (1828-32), and their Philological Museum (1831-33) contained some remarkable papers, among them Thirlwall's 'On the Irony of Sophocles' He petitioned and wrote (1834) in favour of the admission of Dissenters to degrees. The Master of Trinity, Dr Wordsworth, called on him to resign his assistant tutorship, which he did under protest Almost immediately lie was presented by Broughani to the Yorkshire hving of Kirby-Underdale Here lie wrote for Lardner's Cyclopædia his History of Greice (1835-47, improved ed 1847-52) Scholarly, learned, and accurate, as well as dignified in style, the work marks an enormous advance on Matford and ranks amongst English classics, but it was in large measure superseded for the general public by Grote's (published in 1846-56) In 1840 I ord Melbourne rused Thirlwall to the see of St For thirty four years-till his resigna-David's tion-he laboured with the utmost diligence in his diocese, building churches, parsonages, and schools, and augmenting poor livings. His eleven Charges remain an enduring monument of breadth of view - the first a catholic apology for the Tractarians He joined in censuring Lssays and Reviews, but was one of the four bishops who refused to inhibit Colenso, and he was as a Latitudinarian regarded with suspicious alarm, alike by High Churchmen and Evangelicals He supported the Maynooth grant, the admission of Jews to Parliament, and alone amongst the bishops the disestablishment of the Irish Church Perowne edited his Romains, Literary and Theological (1877-78), Perowne and Stokes his Letters, Literary and Theological (1881), and Dean Stanley the beautiful series to a young lady—the Letters to a Friend (1881)

Aristophanes against Socrates

Euripides, however, occupies only a subordinate place among the disciples and supporters of the sophistical school, whom Aristophanes attacked | The person whom he selected as its representative, and on whom he endeavoured to throw the whole weight of the charges which he brought against it, was Sorrates Clouds, a comedy exhibited in 423, a year after the knights had been received with so much applause, Socrates was brought on the stage under his own name, as the arch sophist, the master of the freethinking school. The story is of a young spendthrift, who has involved his father in debt by his passion for horses, and having been placed under the care of Socrates, is enabled by his instructions to defraud his ereditors, but also learns to regard filial obedience and respect, and piety to the gods, as groundless and antiquated prejudices, and it seems hardly possible to doubt that under this character the poet meant to represent Alcibiades, whom it perfectly suits in its general out line, and who may have been suggested to the thoughts of the spectators in many ways not now perceived by the reader It seems at first sight as if, in this work, Aristophanes mitst stand convicted either of the foulest motives or of a gross mistake. For the character of Soemtes was in most points directly opposed to the principles and practice which he attributes here and elsewhere to the sophists and their followers. Socrates was the son of a sculptor of little reputation, and him self for some time practised the art with inoderate success. But he abandoned it that he might give himself up to philosophy, though his income was so scanty that it scareely provided him with the means of subsistence. In his youth he had made himself master of every kind of knowledge then attainable at Athens which his narrow fortune permitted him to acquire, and he purchased the lessons of several of the learned men who came to sojourn there at a price which he was never well able to spare. Let when his own talents had attracted a crowd of admirers, and among them some of the wealthiest vonths he not only demanded no reward for his instructions, but rejected all the offers which they made to relieve his poverty already seen some specimens of the manner in which he discharged the duties of a soldier and a citizen how he brived the fury of the multitude and the resentment of the tyrants in the cause of justice. It is not my intention here to speak of the place which he holds in the history of Greek philosophy. But we have already had occasion to mention his contests with the sophists, and we have ample evidence that his discourses as well as his life were uniformly devoted to the furtherance of piety and virtue. Let in the Clouds this excellent person appears in the most odious as well as ridiculous aspect, and the play ends with the preparations made by the father of the misguided youth to consume him and his school. The wrong done to him appears the more flagrant on account of its fatal consequences. The wish which the poet intimates at the close of his play, with an carnestness which almost oversteps the limits of comedy, was fulfilled, though not till above twenty years later, after the restoration of the democracy (B.C. 399), when Socrates was prosecuted and put to denth on a charge which expressed the substance of the imputations east on him in the Clouds, and Aris tophanes was believed by their contemporaries to have contributed mainly to this result there are two points with regard to the conduct of Aristophanes which appear to have been placed by recent investigations beyond doubt. It may be considered as certain that he was not animated by any personal malevolence toward Socrates, but only attacked him as an enemy and corrupter of religion and morals, but, on the other hand, it is equally well established that he did not merely borrow the name of Socrates for the representative of the sophistical school, but designed to point the attention and to excite the feelings of his andienec against the real individual The only question which seems to be still open to controversy on this subject concerns the degree in which Aristophanes was acquainted with the real character and aims of Socrates as they are known to us from the uniform testimony of his intimate friends and disciples. We find it difficult to adopt the opinion of some modern writers, who contend that Aristophanes, notwithstanding a perfect knowledge of the difference between Socrates and the sophists, might still have looked upon him as standing so completely on the same ground with them that one description was applicable to them and him true, as we have already observed, that the poet would willingly have suppressed all reflection and inquiry on many of the subjects which were discussed both by the sophists and by Socrates, as a presumptions encrorch ment on the province of authority But it scenis in eredible that if he had known all that makes Sociates so admirable and amiable in our eyes, he would have assailed him with such vehement bitterness, and that he should never have qualified his satire by a single word indicative of the respect which he must then have felt to be due at least to his character and his intentions.

But if we suppose what is in itself much more con sistent with the opinions and pursuits of the comic poet, that he observed the philosopher attentively indeed, but from a distance which permitted no more than a superficial acquaintance, we are then at no loss to understand how he might have confounded him with a class of men with which he had so little in common, and why he singled him out to represent them. He probably first formed his judgment of Socrates by the society in which he usually saw him have known that his early studies had been directed by Archelaus, the disciple of Anaxagoras, that he had both himself received the instruction of the most eniment sophists, and had induced others to become their hearers that Furipides, who had introduced the sophistical spirit into the drama, and Alcibiades, who illustrated it most completely in his life, were in the number of his most intimate friends. Socrates never willingly stirred beyond the walls of the city, and lived almost wholly in public places which he seldom entered without forming a circle round him mid opening some discussion connected with the objects of his philosophical researches, he readily accepted the invitations of his friends, especially when he expected to meet learned and inquisitive guests, and probably never fuled to give a speculative turn to the conversation Aristophnies himself may have been more than once present, as l'Into represents him, on such occasions but it was universally notorious that where ever Socrates appeared some subtle disputation was likely to ensue, the method by which he drew out and tried the opinions of others without directly delivering his own, and even his professions-for he commonly described himself as a seeker who had not yet dis covered the truth-might easily be mistal in for the sophistical scepticism which denied the possibility of finding it Aristophanes might also, either immediately or through hearsny, have become acquainted with expres sions and arguments of Socrates apparently contrary to the established religion. And, indeed, it is extremely difficult to determine the precise relation in which the opinions of Socrates stood to the Greek polytheisin He not only spole of the gods with reverence, and conformed to the rites of the national worship, but testified his respect for the oracles in a manner which seems to imply that he believed their pretensions to have some real ground. On the other hand, he acknowledged one Supreme Being as the framer and preserver of the universe, used the singular and the plural number indicriminately concerning the object of his adoration, and when he endeavoured to reclaim one of his friends who scoffed at sacrifices and divination, it was, according to Nenophon, by an argument drawn exclusively from the worls of the one Creator We are thus tempted to imagine that he treated many points to which the vulgar attached great importance as matters of indifference, on which it was neither possible nor very desirable to arrive at any certain conclusion that he was only careful to exclude from his notion of the gods all aitri butes which were inconsistent with the moral qualities of the Supreme Being, and that, with this restriction, he considered the popular mythology as so harmless that its language and rites might be innocently adopted The observation attributed to him in one of Plato's carly works seems to throw great light on the nature and extent of his conformity to the State religion Being asked whether ac believes the Attic legend of Boreas and Orithuia, he replies that he should indeed only be following the example of many ingenious men if he rejected it and attempted to explain it away, but that such speculations, however fine, appeared to him to betoken a mind not very happily constituted, for the subjects furnished for them by the marvellous beings of the Greek mythology were endless, and to reduce all such stories to a probable form was a task which required much leisure. This he could not give to it, for he was fully occupied with the study of his own nature. He therefore let the e stories alone, and acquiesced in the common belief about them

The motives which induced Aristophanes to bring Socrates on the stage in preference to any other of the sophistical teachers are still more obvious than the causes through which he was led to confound them together. Socrates, from the time that he abandoned his hereditary art, became one of the most conspicuous and notorious persons in Athens. There was perhaps hardly a mechanic who had not at some time or other been puzzled or diverted by his questions. His features were so formed by nature as to serve with scarcely any exaggeration for a highly laughable mast. His usual mien and gait were no less remarkably adapted to the comic stage. He was subject to fits of absence which seem now and then to have involved him in ludierous mistakes and disasters. Altogether his exterior was such as might of itself have tempted another poet to find a place for him in a coincidy.

(1 rom the History of Greece)

Sir George Cornewall Lewis (1806-63) was the son of Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, a Radnorshire baronet, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and having studied at the Middle Temple, was called to the Bir in 1831 Entering into public life, he filled various govern ment offices, and was MP for Herefordshire, and afterwards for the Radnor boroughs. He served on several commissions, and in 1839 succeeded his fither is Poor Liw Commissioner in a time of keen controversy on poor law methods succeeded Mr Glidstone is Chancelior of the Exchequer under Pilmerston in 1855-58, when he showed much resource in meeting defects and outlays caused by the Crimean war, and in Lord Palmerston's second administration (1859) he wanted his claims in favour of Mr Gladstone, becoming Home Secretary in 1859-61, and then, sore against his own wishes, War Secretary was for about three years (1852-55) editor of the Edinburgh Review In accomplished classical and German scholar, Sir George (who succeeded to the bironetcy on his father's death in 1855) investigated the early history of Greece and Rome along with the views of the German commen tators, and in reviewing the theory of Niebuhr in An Inquiry into the Credib lity of Early Roman History (2 vols 1855), attacked tilke Niebulir's method and its results All attempts to extract real history from the picturesque narratives of the early centuries of Rome (largely based, as Nichular held, on ballad and poetised legends) he concerned to be nugritory, and he examined anew the primitive history of the nations of Italy Dionysius, Livy, and the other ancient historians had no authentic materials for the primitive ethnology and the early national movements of Italy, and modern inquirers have still less chance of arriving at sife conclusions on the subject. Hence, with perhaps too sweeping scepticism, he dismissed the results not only of the uncritical older historians, but those of the learned and sagacious Germans, Niebuhr and 'The legends are mere shifting Otfried Muller clouds of mythology, which may at a distance deceive the mariner by the appearance of solid land, but disappear as he approaches and examines them by a close view? But it cannot be said that modern research accepts all Niebuhr's contentions or maintains his theory in fall, and in so far at least Cornewall Lewis's criticism has been justified

Lewis was a shrewd and sober minded politican of great administrative ability, a laborious student, and a voluminous writer. It is difficult to realise how he found time, in the midst of official and public duties, and within the space of a comparatively short life, for such varied and profound studies-for he was not merely acute and critical, but indefatigable in research and widely read was more gifted as a conversationalist than as a writer, his style being rather sensible than distinguished Among his works are treatises on the Romance Language, on the Use and Abuse of Political Terms, on the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, on the Method of Observation and Reasoning in Politics, on the Irish Church Question, on the Government of Dependencies, on the Astronomy of the Ancients, and a Dialogue on the Best Form of Government He was a frequent contributor to the Edinburgh Review, Fraser's Magazine, the Philological Museum, the Law Magazine, and Notes and Queries His most unlucky literary enterprise was an edition in 1846-59 of a collection of fragments palmed off on the British Museum as lost fibles of the third-century Greek fabulist Babrius, almost immediately proved to be spurious He was not a secker after populanty, was perhaps a little paradoxical, and was the inventor of the mot that 'life would be tolerable if it were not for its amusements.'

On Niebuhr

He [Niebuhr] divides the Roman history into three periods. I The purely mythical period, including the foundation of the city and the reigns of the first two kings. 2 The mythico historical period, including the reigns of the last five kings and the first fourteen years of the republic. 3 The historical period, beginning with the first secession. The poems, however, which he supposes to have served as the origin of the received history, are not peculiar to any one of these periods, they equally appear in the reigns of Romulus and Numa, in the time of the Tarquins, and in the narratives of Coriolanus and of the siege of Veil. If the history of periods so widely different was equally drawn from a poetical source, it is clear that the poems must have arisen under wholly dissimilar circumstances, and that they can afford no sure foundation for any historical inference.

I or solving the problem of the early Roman Instory the great desideratum is to obtain some means of separating the truth from the fiction, and, if any parts be true, of explaining how the records were preserved with fidelity until the time of the earliest historians, by whom they were adopted, and who, through certain intermediate stages, have transmitted them to us

For example, we may believe that the expulsion of the Tarquins, the creation of a dictator and of tribines, the adventures of Coriolanus, the Decemvirate, the expedition of the Tabii and the battle of the Cremera, the siege of Ven, the capture of Rome by the Gauls, and the disaster of Caudium, with other portions of the Sam nite wars, are events which are indeed to a considerable extent distorted, obscured, and corrupted by fiction, and encrusted with legendary additions, but that they never theless contain a nucleus of fact, in varying degrees if so, we should wish to know how far the fact extends and where the fiction begins, and also what were the means by which a general historical tradition of events, as they really happened, was perpetuated. This is the question to which an answer is desired, and therefore we are not assisted by a theory which explains how that part of the narrative which is not historical originated

Charles Merivale (1808–93) was the son of John Herman Merwale, translator, poet, and Commissioner of Bankruptcy, he was born in London, studied at Harrow, Haileybury, and St John's College, Cambridge, and was successively rector of Lawford, Essex (1848-70), chaplain to the Speaker of the House of Commons (1863-69), and Dean of Ely (from 1869) At Cambridge he was an athlete and oarsman, as well as a prize poet and one of the 'npostles' commemorated by Tennyson He took orders in 1833, by which time he had developed a keen interest in his life work, the study of Roman At this subject he worked industriously while he remained at Cambridge, but it was not till after he had settled in his country rectory that he began to publish, in 1850, a History of the Romans under the Empire, which he completed in 1862 'Mr Merivale's undertaking,' said a critic in the Edinburgh Review, 'is nothing less than to bridge over no small portion of the interval between the interrupted work of Arnold and the commencement of Gibbon He comes, therefore, between "mighty opposites"; 'A man of infinite dry humour and quaint fincy,' according to Edward FitzGerald, lie was a scholar and Churchman of the older school, and his History was a sound and solid piece of work. It would have been improved had its author relied less exclusively on printed documents and taken ad vantage of numismatics, epigraphy, and cognate The main defect of the work, according to some critics, is that it is throughout too fixourable to the emperors and to Imperialism, but compared with the Cæsarism of Mommsen and his school it is mild and fair The same tendency somewhat mars the historical value of the brilliant sketch The Tall of the Roman Republic (1853), perhaps the most popular of all the Dean's writings, among which are also comprised a one volume school history of Rome and some lectures on early Church Instory, including his two courses of Boyle Lectures (1864-65) on the conversion of the Roman Empire and of the northern nations He edited Sallust, contributed to the Saturday Review, and was a most accomplished writer of Latin verse His translation of Homer into English rhymed verse was not one of his successes

On the Emperor Augustus

In stature Augustus hardly exceeded the middle height, but his person was lightly and delicately formed, and its proportions were such as to convey a favourable and even a striking impression. His countenance was pale, and testified to the weakness of his health and almost constant bodily suffering, but the hardships of military service had imparted a swarthy tinge to a complexion naturally fair, and his eyebrows meeting over a sharp and aquiline nose gave a serious and stern expression to his countenance. His liair was light, and his/cyes blue and piercing, he was well pleased if any one on approaching him looked on the ground and affectéd to be unable to meet their dazzling brightness It was said that his dress concealed many imperfections and blemishes on his person, but he could not disguise all the infirmities under which he laboured The weak ness of the forefinger of his right hand and a lameness in the left hip were the results of wounds he incurred in a battle with the Iapyde in early life, he suffered repeated attacks of fever of the most scrious kind, especially in the course of the campaign of Philippi and that against the Cantabrians, and again two years afterwards at Rome, when his recovery was despaired of From that time, although constantly hable to be affected by cold and heat, and obliged to nurse himself throughout with the care of a valetudinarian, he does not appear to have had any return of illness so serious as the preceding, and dying at the age of seventy four, the rumour obtained popular currency that he was prematurely cut off by poison administered by the empress. As the natural consequence of this bodily weakness and sickly constitu tion, Octavian did not attempt to distinguish himself by active exertions or feats of personal prowess splendid examples of his uncle the dictator and of Antonius his rivil, might have early discouraged him from attempting to shine as a warrior and hero he had not the vivacity and natural spirits necessary to carry him through such exploits as theirs and, although he did not shrink from exposing himself to personal danger, he prudently declined to allow a comparison to be in stituted between lumself and rivals whom he could not hope to equal Thus necessarily thrown back upon other resources, he trusted to caution and circumspec tion, first to preserve his own life, and afterwards to obtain the splendid prizes which had hitherto been carried off by during adventure, and the good fortune which is so often its attendant. His contest, therefore, with Antonius and Sextus Pompeius was the contest of cunning with bravery, but from his youth upwards he was accustomed to overreach, not the bold and reckless only, but the most considerate and wily of his contemportries, such as Cicero and Cleopatra, he succeeded in the end in deluding the senate and people of Rome in the establishment of his tyranny, and finally deceived the expectations of the world, and falsified the lessons of the Republican history in reigning himself forty years in disguise, and leaving a throne to be claimed without a challenge by his successors for fourteen centuries.

But although emperor in name, and in fact absolute master of his people, the manners of the Cresar, both in public and private life, were still those of a simple On the most solemn occasions he was distin guished by no other dress than the robes and insigma of the offices which he exercised, he was attended by no other guards than those which his consular dignity ren dered customary and decent In his court there was none of the etiquette of modern monarchies to be recog nised, and it was only by slow and gradual encroachment that it came to prevail in that of his successors. Augustus was contented to take up his residence in the house which had belonged to the orator Liennus Calvus, in the neighbourhood of the Forum, which he afterwards abandoned for that of Hortensius on the Palatine, of which Suetonius observes that it was remarkable neither for size nor splendour. Its halls were small, and lined, not with marble, after the luxurions fashion of many patrician palaces, but with the common Alban stone, and the pattern of the pavement was plain and simple. Nor when he succeeded Lepidus in the pontificate would be relinquish this private dwelling for the regia or public residence assigned that honourable office.

Many anecdotes are recorded of the moderation with which the emperor received the opposition, and often the rebukes, of individuals in public as well as in private These stones are not without their importance, as showing how little formality there was in the tone of addressing the master of the Roman world, and how entirely dif ferent the ideas of the nation were with regard to the position occupied by the Cresar and his family from those with which modern associations have imbued us. We have already noticed the rude freedom with which Tiberius was attacked, although step son of the emperor and participating in the eminent functions of the tribuni tian power, by a declaimer in the schools at Rhodes, but Augustus himself seems to have suffered almost as much as any private citizen from the general coarseness of behaviour which characterised the Romans in their public assemblies, and the rebukes to which he patiently submitted were frequently such as would lay the courtier of a constitutional sovereign in modern Europe under perpetual disgrace.

On one occasion, for instance, in the public discharge of his functions as corrector of manners, he had brought a specific charge against a certain knight for having The accused proved that he squandered his patrimony had, on the contrary, augmented it. 'Well,' answered the emperor, somewhat annoyed by his error, 'but you are at all events living in celibacy, contrary to recent enactments.' The other was able to reply that he was married, and was the father of three legitimate children, and when the emperor signified that he had no further charge to bring, added aloud 'Another time, Cresar, when you give ear to informations against honest men, take care that your informants are honest themselves? Augustus felt the justice of the rebuke thus publicly administered, and submitted to it in silence.

Dean Merivale's nephew Herman Charles, son of the permanent Under Secretary for India, was a successful playwright and novelist See the Dean's privalely printed Autohography (a fragment) and letters, edited by his daughter Judith (1899)

Henry Hart Milman (1791-1868) was the third son of an eminent London physician, Sir Francis Milman, and, educated at Greenwich, Eton, and Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1812 he gained the Newdigate with his Belinders Apollo, best of Oxford In 1815 a Fellow of his college, prize poems in 1816 he became vicar of St Marv's, Reading, in 1821-31 Professor of Poetry at Oxford, in 1835 rector of St Margaret's, Westminster, and a canon of Westminster, and in 1849 Dean of St Paul's His tragedy of Fazio, with a Florentine plot, was published in 1815, and was afterwards acted with success at Covent Garden In 1820 he published a dramatic poem, The Fall of Jerusalem, and to this succeeded three other dramas, Belshazzar (1822), The Martyr of Antioch (1822), and Anne Boleyn (1826), but none of these was designed for the stage. For his 'heroic' or narrative poem on the defence of Britain against the Saxons, Samor, Lord of the Bright City (1818), he took the plot from Holmshed and Harrison, Hengist and Horsa, Vortigern and Rowena, Emrys and Uther, Druids and Vikings, are amongst the characters of a poem with many fine passages In virtue of Nala and Damayanti and other Poems translated from the Sanskrit (1834), he has claims to be remembered as an early interpreter of Indian thought and life to Englishmen Dean Milman published also an edition of Gibbon's Decline and Fall, with notes and corrections, which remained the standard one till the publication of Mr Bury's (see Vol II p 552), and as against Gibbon, the editor seemed more conservative and orthodox than in some of his own historical methods and results also produced an excellent edition of Horace, with a Life of the poet. He undertook to assist his friend Bishop Heber in arranging a series of hymns for the Christian year, and besides giving other valuable assistance, contributed several of the most admirable from his own pen, such as 'Ride on, ride on in majesty,' and 'When our heads are bowed with woe' When Heber received the first mentioned he wrote to Milman 'A few more such hymns and I shall need not to wait for the aid of Scott and Southey! In his hymns and other poems Milman showed abundance of pregnant thought, taste, dignity, tenderness, and metrical skill, but he lacks the dramatic spirit, the warmth of passion and imagination, necessary to vivify his classical or historical lore into tragedy or epic of perennial charm His fame rests on his historical writings, the earliest of which, the History of the Jews, was originally published in Murray's 'Family Library' (1829, 4th edition, 1866), and created consternation among the ortho dox as being rationalistic

Milman in his own words, had been able to follow out 'all the marvellous discoveries of science, and all the hardly less marvellous, if less certain, conclusions of historical, ethnological, linguistic criticism, in the serene confidence that they are utterly irrelevant to the truth of Christianity, to the truth of the Old Testament as far as concerns its distinct and perpetual authority, and its indubitable meaning? He took up ground much less usual in the first half of the nineteenth than in the first decade of the twentieth century, the History of the Jews was, according to Dean Stanley, the first decisive inroad of German theo logy, the first indication that the Bible could be studied like another book 'If on such subjects some solid ground be not found on which highly educated, reflective, reading, reasoning men may find firm footing, I can foresee nothing but a wide, a widening, I fear an irreparable breach between the thought and the religion of England prehensive, all-embracing, truly Catholic Christi anity, which knows what is essential to religion, what is temporary and extraneous to it, may defy the world. Obstinate adherence to things antiquated, and irreconcilable with advancing knowledge and thought, may repel, and for ever, how many, I know not, how far, I know still less Avertat omen Deus' Milman's History of Christianity to the Abolition of Paganism (1840) nas followed by the magnum opus, The History of Latin Christianity to the Pontificate of Nicholas V (6 vols 1854-56) 'No such work,' it was truly said, 'has appeared in English ecclesiastical literature - none which combines such breadth of view with such depth of research, such high literary and artistic eminence with such patient and elaborate investigation' This high praise has been echoed by a host of critics from Prescott to Lecky The book has been called 'a complete epic and philosophy of medieval Christendom,' and is really a great work in most of the essentials of history, though modern research has mentably modified many of its conclusions Macrulry, agreeing that the matter was excellent, somewhat hypercritically voted the style 'very much the reverse. Yet the very candour, catholicity, and frank application of honest and reverent critical method, hitherto too rare in the sphere of Church history, again provoked in some quarters the charge of 'rationalism' The last work of Dean Milman was his St Paul's Cathedral (1854-56, completed by his son and published in 1868), the church over which he had presided for nearly twenty years, and in which he was buried Articles on Erasmus, Savonarola, and other subjects contributed to the Quarterly were published as a volume in 1870

The Burning of the Temple

It was the 10th of August, the day already darkened in the Jewish calendar by the destruction of the former temple by the king of Babylon, that day was almost past Titus withdrew again into the Antonia, intend ing the next morning to make a general assault. The quiet summer evening came on, the setting sun shone for the last time on the snow white walls and glistening pinnacles of the Temple roof Titus had retired to rest, when suddenly n wild and terrible ery was heard, and a man came rushing in, announcing that the Temple was on fire Some of the besieged, notwithstanding their repulse in the morning, had sallied out to attack the men who were busily employed in extinguishing the fires about the cloisters The Romans not merely drove them back, but, entering the sacred space with them, forced their way to the door of the Temple. A soldier, without orders, inounting on the shoulders of one of his comrides, threw a blazing brand into a small gilded door on the north side of the chambers, in the outer building or porch The flames sprang up at once Jews uttered one simultaneous shriek, and grasped their swords with a furious determination of revenging and perishing in the ruins of the Temple Titus rushed down with the utmost speed he shouted, he made signs to his soldiers to quench the fire, his voice was drowned, and his signs unnoticed, in the blind confusion The legionaries either could not or would not hear, they rushed on, trampling each other down in their furious haste, or stumbling over the crumbling ruins, perished with the enemy Each exhorted the other, and each hurled his blazing brand into the inner part of the edifice, and then hurned to his work of carnage. The unarmed and defenceless people were slain in thousands, they lay heaped like sacrifices round the altar, the steps of the Femple ran with streams of blood, which washed down the bodies that lay about.

Titus found it impossible to check the rage of the soldiery, he entered with his officers, and surveyed the interior of the sacred edifice. The splendour filled them with wonder and as the flames had not yet penetrated to the Holy Place, he made a last effort to save it, and springing forth, again exhorted the soldiers to stay the progress of the conflagration The centurion Liberalis endeavoured to force obedience with his staff of office, but even respect for the emperor gave way to the furious animosity against the Jews to the fierce excitement of battle, and to the insatlable hope of plunder The soldiers saw everything around them radiant with gold, which shone dazzlingly in the wild light of the flames, they supposed that incalculable treasures were laid up in the sanctuary A soldier, unperceived, thrust a lighted torch between the hinges of the door, the whole hulding was in flames in an iustaut. The blinding smoke and fire forced the officers to retreat, and the noble edifice was left to its fate

It was an appalling spectacle to the Roman-what was it to the Jew? The whole summit of the hill which commanded the city blazed like a volcano another the buildings fell in, with a tremeudous crash, and were swallowed up in the fiery abyss The 100fs of cedar were like sheets of flame, the gilded pinnacles shone like spikes of red light, the gate towers sent up tall columns of flame and smoke. The neighbouring hills were lighted up and dark groups of people were seen watching in horrible anxiety the progress of the destruction the walls and heights of the upper city were crowded with faces, some pale with the agony of despair, others seewling unavailing vengeance shouts of the Koman soldiery as they ran to and fro, and the howlings of the insurgents who were perishing in the flames, mingled with the roaring of the conflagra tion and the thundering sound of falling timbers echoes of the mountains replied or brought back the shrieks of the people on the heights, all along the walls resounded screams and wailings, men who were expiring with famine rallied their remaining strength to utter a cry of anguish and desolation

The slaughter within was even more dreadful than the spectacle from without. Men and women, old and young, insurgents and priests, those who fought and those who entreated mercy, were hewn down in indis criminate carnage The number of the slain exceeded that of the slayers The legionaries had to clamber over heaps of dead to carry on the work of extermina John, at the head of some of his troops, cut his way through, first into the outer court of the Temple, afterwards into the upper city. Some of the priests upon the roof wrenched off the gilded spikes, with their sockets of lead, and used them as missiles against the Afterwards they fled to a part of the Romans below wall, about fourteen feet wide, they were summoned to surrender, but two of them, Mur, son of Belga, and Joseph, son of Dalar plunged headloug into the flames.

No part escaped the fury of the Romans. The trea suries, with all their wealth of money, jewels, and costly robes—the plunder which the Zealots had laid np—were totally destroyed. Nothing remained but a small part of the outer closster, in which about six thousand unarmed and defenceless people, with women and children, had taken refuge. These poor wretches, like multitudes of others, had been led up to the Temple by a false prophet, who had proclaimed that God com manded all the Jews to go up to the Temple, where He would display His almighty power to save His people The soldiers set fire to the building every soul perished The whole Roman army entered the sacred precincts, and pitched their standards among the smoking ruins, they offered sacrifice for the victory, and with loud ncclamations saluted Titus as Emperor Their joy was not a little enlianced by the value of the plunder they obtained, which was so great that gold fell in Syria to half its former value (From the History of the Jews)

The Emperor Henry IV at Canossa.

On a dreary winter morning, with the ground deep in snow, the King, the heir of a long line of emperors, was permitted to enter within the two outer of the three walls which girded the castle of Canossa He had laid aside every mark of royalty or of distinguished station, he was elad only in the thin white linen dress of the penitent, and there, fasting, he awaited in humble patience the pleasure of the Pope But the gates did not unclose. A second day he stood, cold, hungry, and mocked by vain hope. And yet a third day drugged on from morning to evening over the unsheltered head of the discrowned King Every heart was moved except that of the representative of Jesus Christ Even in the pre sence of Gregory there were low, deep murmurs against his unapostolic pride and inhumanity. The patience of Henry could endure no more, he took refuge in an adjacent chapel of St Nicholas, to implore, and with tears, once again the intercession of the aged Abbot of Clugny Matilda was present, her womanly heart was melted, she joined with Henry in his supplications to the Abbot 'Thou alone canst accomplish this,' said the Abbot to the Countess. Henry fell on his knees, and in a passion of grief entreated her merciful interference. To female entreaties and influence Gregory at length yielded an ungracious permission for the King to approach his presence. With bare feet, still in the garb of penitence, stood the King, a man of singularly tall and noble person, with a countenance accustomed to flish command and terror upon his adversaries, before the Pope, a grey haired man, bowed with years, of small unimposing stature.

The terms exacted from Henry, who was far too deeply humiliated to dispute anything, had no redeeming touch of gentleness or compassion. He was to appear in the place and at the time which the Pope should name to answer the charges of his subjects before the Pope him self, if it should please him to preside in person at the If he should repel these charges, he was to receive his kingdom back from the hands of the Pope. If found guilty, he was peaceably to resign his kingdom, and pledge himself never to attempt to seek revenge for his deposition. Till that time he was to assume none of the ensigns of royalty, perform no public act, appropriate no part of the royal revenue which was not necessary for the maintenance of himself and of his attendants, all his subjects were to be held released from their oath of allegance, he was to banish for ever from his court Rupert Bisbop of Bamberg and Ulric Count of Cosheim, with his other evil advisers, if he should recover his kingdom, he must rule henceforward according to the counsel of the Pope, and correct whatever was contrary to the ecclesiastical laws. On these conditions the Pope condescended to grant absolution, with the further provision that, in case of any prevarication on the part of the King on any of these articles, the absolution was null and void, and in that case the princes of the empire were released from all their oaths, and might immediately proceed to the election of another king

The oath of Henry was demanded to these conditions, to his appearance before the tribunal of the Pope, and to the safe conduct of the Pope if he should be pleased to cross the Alps. But the King's oath was not deemed sufficient, who would be his compurgators? The Abbot of Clugny declined, as taking such oath was inconsistent with his monastic vows. At length the Archbishop of Bremen, the Bishops of Vercelli, Osnaburg, and Zeitz, the Marquis Azzo, and others of the princes present, ventured to swear on the holy reliques to the King's faithful fulfilment of all these hard conditions

But even yet the unforgiving Hildebrand had not forced the King to drink the dregs of humiliation. He had degraded Henry before men, he would degrade him in the presence of God, he had exalted himself to the summit of earthly power, he would appeal to Heaven to ratify and to sanction this assumption of unapproachable superiority.

After the absolution had been granted in due form, the Pope proceeded to celebrate the awful mystery of the Euclianist He called the King towards the altar, he lifted in his hands the consecrated host, the body of the Lord, and spoke these words 'I have been accused by thee and by thy partisans of having usurped the Apostolic See by simoniacal practices-of having been guilty, both before and after my elevation to the Episcopate, of crimes which would disqualify me for my sacred office. I might justify myself by proof, and by the witness of those who have known me from my youth, whose suffrages have rused me to the Apostolic See. But to remove every shadow of suspicion, I appeal from human testimony to divine. Behold the Lord's body, be this the test of my innocence acquit me by His judgment this day of the crimes with which I am charged, if guilty, strike me dead at once,' He then took and ate the consecrated wafer ensued, he stood unscathed in calm assurance sudden burst of admiration thrilled the whole eongrega-When silence was restored he addressed the King 'Do thon, my son, as I have done! The Princes of the German Empire have accused thee of crimes hemous and capital, such as in justice should exclude thee not only from the administration of public affairs, but from the communion of the Church and all intercourse with the futhful to thy dying day. They eagerly demand a solemn trial But human decisions are liable to error, falschood, dressed out in eloquence, enslaves the judgment, truth, without this artificial aid, meets with contempt. As thou hast implored my protection, act according to my counsel. If thou art conscious of thy innocence, and assured that the accusations against thee arc false, by this short course free the Church of God from scandal, thyself from long and doubtful trial Take thou too the body of the Lord, and if God avouches thy innocence, thou stoppest for ever the mouths of thy accusers I shall become at once the advocate of thy cause, the assertor of thy guiltlessness, thy nobles will be reconciled to thee, thy kingdom restored, the fierce tumult of civil war which destroys thy empire be allayed for ever ' (From Latin Christianity)

Jerusalem before the Siege

And yet it moves me, Romans! It confounds
The counsel of my firm philosophy
That Ruin's merciles, ploughshare must pass o'er
And barren salt be sown on yon proud city
As on our olive crowned hill we stand,
Where Kedron it our feet its scanty waters
Distils from stone to stone with gentle motion,
As through a valley sacred to sweet place,
How boldly doth it front us! how majestically!
Like a luxurious vineyard, the hillside
Is hung with marble fabrics, line o'er line,
Terrace o'er terrace, nearer still, and nearer
To the blue heavens. Here bright and sumptuous palaces,

With cool and verdant gardens interspersed, Here towers of war that frown in massy strength, While over all hangs the rich purple eve, As conscious of its being her last farewell Of light and glory to that fated city And, as our clouds of battle dust and smoke Are melted into air, behold the Temple In undisturbed and lone serenity, Finding itself a solemn sanctuary In the profound of heaven! It stands before us A mount of snow, fretted with golden pinnacles! The very sun, as though he worshipped there, Lingers upon the gilded cedar roofs, And down the long and branching porticoes, On every flowers sculptured capital. Glitters the homage of his parting beams By Hercules I the sight might almost win The offended majesty of Rome to mercy

Summons of the Destroying Angel to Babylon.

The hour is come ' the hour is come ' With voice Heard in thy inmost soul, I summon thee, Cyrus, the Lord's anointed! And thou river, That flowest exulting in thy proud approach To Babylon, beneath whose shadows walls, And brazen gates, and gilded palaces, And groves, that gleam with marble obelisks, Thy azure bosom shall repose, with lights Fretted and chequered like the starry heavens I do arrest thee in thy stately course, By Him that poured thee from thine ancient fountain, And sent thee forth, even at the birth of time, One of His holy streams, to lave the monnts Of Paradise. Thou hear st me thou dost check Abrupt thy waters as the Arab chief His headlong squadrons Where the unobserved Yet toiling Persian breaks the ruining mound, I see thee gather thy tumultuous strength, And, through the deep and roaring Naharmalcha, Roll on as proudly conscious of fulfilling The omnipotent command ! While, far away, The lake, that slept but now so calm, nor moved, Save by the rippling moonshine, heaves on high Its foaming surface like a whirlpool gulf, And boils and whitens with the inwonted tide

But silent as thy billows used to flow, And terrible, the hosts of Elam move, Winding their darl some way profound, where man Ne'er trod, nor light e'er shone, nor ur from hewen Breathed Oyc secret and unfathomed depths, How are ye now a smooth and royal way For the army of God's vengeance! Fellow slaves And ministers of the Eternal purpose, Not guided by the treacherous, injured sons Of Babylon, but by my mightier arm, Ye come, and spread your binners, and display Your glittering arms as ye advance, all white Beneath the admiring moon Come on the gates Are open-not for banqueters in blood Like you! I see on either side o'erflow The living deluge of armed men, and ery, 'Begin, begin ! with fire and sword begin The work of wrath ' Upon my shadowy wangs I pause, and float a little while, to see Mine human instruments fulfil my task Of final rain Then I mount, I fly, And sing my proud song, as I ride the clouds, That stars may hear, and all the hosts of worlds, That live along the interminable space, Take up Jehovnh's everlasting triumph ! (From Belshazzar)

A Fair Recluse

Sunk was the sun, and up the eastern heaven, Lake maiden on a louely pilgrimage, Moved the meck star of eve, the wandering air Breathed odours, wood and waveless lake, like man, Slept, wear, of the garish, babbling day

But she the while from human tenderness Lstranged, and gentler feelings that light up The check of youth with rosy joyous smile, like a forgotten lute, played on nlone By chance earessing airs, anid the wild Beauteously pale and sadly playful grew, A lonely child, by not one human heart Beloved, and loving none nor strange if learned Her native fond affections to embrace Things senscless and inanimate, she loved All flowerets that with rich embroidery fair Lnamel the green earth—the odorous thyme, Wild rose, and roving eglantine, nor spared To mourn their fading forms with childish tears. Gray birch and aspen light she loved, that droop I ringing the crystal stream, the sportive breeze that wantoned with her brown and glossy locks, The sunbeam chequering the fresh bank, ere dawn Wnndering, and wandering still at dewy eve, By Glenderamakin's flower empurpled marge, Derwent's blue lal e, or Greta's wildering glen

Rare sound to her was human voice, scarce heard Save of her aged nurse or shepherd maid Soothing the child with simple tale or song Hence all she knew of earthly hopes and fears, I fie's sins and sorrows better I nown the voice Beloved of lark from misty morning cloud Blithe earolling, and wild melodious notes Heard mingling in the summer wood, or plaint By moonlight, of the lone might warbling bird Nor they of love inconscious, all around Fearless, familiar they their descants sweet Tuned emulous. Her knew all living shapes That tenant wood or rock, dun roc or deer,

Sunning his dappled side, at moontide erouched, Courting her fond caress, nor fled her gaze The brooding dove, but murmured sounds of joy

Apostrophe to Britain

Land of my birth, O Britnin ' and inv love, Whose air I breathe, whose earth I tread, whose tongue My song would speak, its strong and solemn tones Most proud, if I abase not Beauteous isle, And plenteous! what though in thy atmosphere Float not the taintless luxury of light, The dazzling azure of the southern skies? Around thee the rich orb of thy renown Spreads stainless and unsulfied by a cloud Though thy hills blush not with the purple vine, And softer climes excel thee in the line And fragrance of thy summer fruits and flowers, Nor flow thy rivers over golden beds, Thou in the soul of man, thy better wealth, Art richest nature's noblest produce thou, The immortal mind in perfect height and strength, Bear'st with a prodigal opulence, this thy right, Thy privilege of chunte and of soil, Would I assert nor, save thy fame, invoke, Or nymph, or muse, that oft 'twas dream'd of old By falls of waters under haunted shades, Her cestasy of inspirition pour'd O'er poet's soul, and flooded all his powers With liquid glory so may thy renown Burn in my heart, and give to thought and word The aspiring and the radiant hue of fire

(From Samor)

Reginald Heber (1783-1826), Bishop of Calcutta, was son of the rector of Malpas in Cheshire, and half-brother of Richard Heber the famous bibliophile, whose collection numbered nearly 150,000 volumes. In 1800 he went up to Brasenose College, Oxford, and in his first year won the university prize for Latin hexameters In 1803 he secured the Newdigate by his poem of Palestine, pronounced the best prize poem the university had produced, parts of it were set to music by Dr Crotch Before reciting it in the theatre of the university Heber read it to Sir Walter Scott, then on a visit to Oxford When Scott, praising the verses on Solomon's Temple, said he had not noted that no tools were used in building it, Heber retired for a few minutes to the corner of the room, and returned with the famous lines

No hammer fell, no ponderous axes rung, Like some tall palm the mystic fabric sprung Majestle silence '

In 1805 he grined the prize for the English essay, and was elected to a fellowship at All Souls', soon after he went abroad, travelling over Germany, Russia, and the Crimea, and on his return in 1807 he became rector of Hodnet in Shropshire. He appeared again as a poet in 1809 with Europe, or Lines on the Present IVar (in Spain) He discharged the duties of a parish priest with unostentatious fidelity and application, published a volume of poems in 1812, and in 1815 was Bampton Lecturer on the Personality and Office of the Comforter He was an occasional contributor to the Quarterly Review, and in 1822 wrote a Life of Jeremy Taylor Contrary to the advice of friends, he accepted in 1823 the difficult post of Bishop of Calcutta, in 1826 at Trichinopoly he died suddenly of apoplery in his bath, but he had already had ample time to prove his enthusiasm, his energy, and his discretion and tact as administrator The lively, witty, and lovable bishop did much to promote the use of hymns in the Church of England, which had heretofore adhered mainly to the metrical psalms, and left hymns to Methodists and Independents With Dean Milman's help he arranged the hymns in a series adapted to the Church service of the year, and of his own hymns, which he had begun to publish in a religious journal in 1811, several are known by heart to millions of English 'From Greenland's icy mountains,' Christians 'Brightest and best of the sons of the morning,' 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty,' 'Lord of mercy and of might,' 'By cool Siloam's shady rill,' and 'The Son of God goes forth to war' The pathetic elegy on his child, 'Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee,' is only less well known than Heber's hymns, which are usually much more ornate in diction than those of Watts and Cowper His works comprised fragments of a poem on The World before the Flood, and of a masque, Gwendolen, three cantos of a Morte d'Arthur, and (included in the first collected edition of the Poetical Works, 1841, but omitted in most reprints) a 'serio comic oriental romance' in verse-practically a panto nume—on Blue-beard, in 1902 described in the Edinburgh Review as 'the best comic poem, after the Ingoldsby Legends, ever written by a clergyman' It opens by Fadlallali, Fatima's ambitious father, saying

Good neighbour, be quiet 1 my word is a law,
I have said that my daughter shall wed the Bashaw

And at sight of the presents Ayesha is converted to the same side, and thus persuades her sister

Do look at the things the Bashaw has sent! Such silks, and such kincobs, such collars of pear!! She looks like a Pen far more than a gir!, And I, her poor bride maid, by all am confess'd As sweetly though not so expensively dress'd Come keep up your spirits! do, Fatima, do! I don't think his whishers so frightfully blue

The following is one of several 'Bow-Meeting Songs,' and was 'sung at Hawarden Castle in Flintshire, the seat of Sir Stephen Glynne, Bart.'

The Bow-Meeting

By you castle wall, 'mid the breezes of morning,
The genius of Cambria stray'd pensive and slow,
The oak wreath was wither d her tresses adorning,
And the wind through its leaves sigh'd its murmur of woe.

She grzed on her mountains with filial devotion,
She gazed on her Dec as he rolled to the ocean,
And, 'Cumbria! poor Cambria!' she cried with emotion,
'Thou jet hast thy country, thy harp, and thy bow!

'Sweep on, thou proud stream, with thy billows all heary,
As proudly my warriors have rushed on the foe
But feeble and funt is the sound of their glory,

For time, like thy tide, has its obb and its flow Even now, while I watch thee, thy beauties are fading, The sands and the shallows thy course are invading, Where the sail swept the surges the sea bild is wading, And thus hath it fared with the land of the bow!

'Sinile, smile, ye dear hills, 'mid your woods and your flowers,

Whose heather hes dark in the morn s dewy glow!

A time must await yow of tempests and showers,

An autumn of mist, and a winter of snow!

For me, though the whirlwind has shivered and eleft me,

Of wealth and of empire the stranger bereft me,

Yet Saxon—proud Saxon—thy fury has left me

Worth, valour, and beauty, the harp and the bow!

'Ye towers, on whose rampire, all ruined and riven,
The wallflower and woodbine so lavishly blow,
I have seen when your banner waved broad to the heaven,

And kings found your faith a defence from the foe, O loyal in grief, and in danger unshaken,
For ages still true, though for ages forsaken,
Yet, Cambria, thy heart may to gladness awaken, Since thy monarch has smiled on the harp and the bow!

Palestine Fallen

Reft of thy sons, amid thy foes forlorn, Mourn, widowed queen! forgotten Sion, mourn! Is this thy place, sad city, this thy throne, Where the wild desert rears its eraggy stone? While suns unblest their angry lustre fling, And wayworn pilgrims seek the scanty spring? Where now thy pomp, which kings with entry viewed? Where now thy might, which all those kings subdued? No martial myriads muster in thy gate, No suppliant nations in this temple wait, No prophet bards, the glittering courts among, Wake the full lyre, and swell the tide of song But lawless Force and meagre Want are there, And the quick-darting eye of restless Fear, While cold Oblivion, 'mid thy ruins hid, Tolds his dank wing beneath the try shade.

Ganora at Carduel.

So was she pleased herself who sought to please,
Till on a day when all the court would ride
To drink in Cattrieth's woods the cooler breeze,
And rouse the dun deer from Terwathlin's side,
It chanced the queen within her bower to bide,
As one in boisterous pastime rarely seen,
Who little loved the hunter's eruel pride,
Or maddening shout that rends the forest green,
Or their poor quarry's groan the bugle notes between.

Loth was her lord to miss, that livelong day,
Her soft sweet glances and her converse sweet,
Yet cared he not to cross her purposed stay,
And forth he fared, but still with ling'ring feet

And back vard look, and 'Oh, when lovers meet

How bless'd,' he thought, 'the evening's tranquil hour,

I rom care and cumbrous pomp a glad retreat ''

Not since his youth first quaff'd the cup of power,

Had Arthur praised before the calm sequester'd bower

And forth he fared, while from her turret high

That smiling form beheld his hunter crew,

Pleased she beheld, hose unacquainted eye

Found in each varying scene a pleasure new

Nor yet had pomp fatigued her sated view,

Nor custom pall d the gloss of royalty

Like some gay child, a simple bliss she drew

From every gaud of feudal pageantry,
And every broider'd garb that swept in order by
And sooth it was a brave and antic sight,
Where plume, and crest, and tassel vildly blending
And bended bow, and javelin flashing bright,
Mark dithe gay squadron through the copse descending,
The greyhound, with his silken leash contending Wreathed the lithe neck, and, on the falconer's hand,
With restless perch and pinions broad depending,
Lach hooded goshav k kept her cager stand,
And to the courser's tramp loud rang the hollow land

And over all, in accents sadly sweet,

The mellor bugle pour'd its plaintive tone,
That echo joy'd such numbers to repeat,

Who, from dark glade or rock of pumice stone,
Sent to the woodland nymphs a softer moan
While histening far from forth some fallow brown,
The symbol ploughman left his work undone,
And the glad schoolboy from the neighbouring town Sprang o er each prisoning rail, nor reck'd his master s froy n

Her warm cheek pillow'd on her wory hand,
Her long hair waving o'er the battlement,
In silent thought Ganora lep her stand,
Though feebly now the distant bugle sent
Its fading sound, and, on the brown hill's bent,
Nor horse, nor hound, nor hunter's pomp was seen
Yet still she gazed on empty space intent,
As one yho, spell bound, on some hunted green Beholds a faery show, the twilight elms between

That plaintive bugle's well remember d tone
Could search lice inmost heart with magic sway,
To her it spoke of pleasures past and gone,
And village hopes, and friends far, far away,
While busy memory's scintillating play
Moel d her weak heart with visions sadly dear,
The shining lakelet, and the mountain grey
And who is he, the youth of merriest cheer,
Who waves his eagle plume and grasps his hunting spear?

As from a feverish dream of pleasant sin,
She, starting, trembled, and her mantle blue,
With golden border bright, and silver pin,
Round her wet check and heaving bosom drew,
Yet still with heavy cheer and downcast view,
From room to room she wander'd to and fro,
Till chance or choice her careless glances threw Upon an iron door, whose archivay low,
And valves half open flung, a gorgeous sight might show
It was a hall of cos best garniture,

With arras hung in many a purple fold,
Whose glistening roof was part of silver pure,
And sill en part, and part of twisted gold,

With arms embroider'd and achievements old,
Where that rich metal caught reflected day,
As in the hours of harvest men behold
Amid their sheaves a lurking adder play,
Whose burnish'd back peeps forth amid the stubble grey

And, in the midst, an altar richly dight
With ever burning lamps of silver pale,
And silver cross, and chalice heavenly bright,
Before whose beam a sinful heart might quill,
And sinful cye to bear its beauty fail.
It was, I ween, that gracious implement
Of heavenly love, the three times hallow'd Grayle
To Britain's realm awhile in mercy lent,
I'll sin defiled the land, and lust incontinent

Strange things of that time honour'd urn were told,
For youth it vout in aged limbs renev,
And I indle life in corpses deadly cold,
Vea, palsy varmth, and fever coolness drew,
While faith knelt gazing on its heavenly live.
For not with day's reflected beam it shone,
Vor fiery radiance of the taper's blue,
But from its hollow rim around was thrown
A soft and sunny light, eternal and its own

And many a riven lielin around was liung,
And many a shield reversed, and shiver'd spear,
And armour to the passing footsteps rung,
And crowns that paymini kings were wont to wear,
Rich crowns, strange arms, but shatter'd all and sere,
Lo' this the chapel of that table round,
And shrine of Arthur and his warriors dear,
Where vent'rous knights by secret oaths were bound,
And, bless'd by potent prayers, their foemen to confound.

Nor less the scene such solemn use became,

Whose every wall in freshest colours dight,
Display'd in form, in feature, and in name,
The lively deeds of many a faithful knight,
And told of many a hardly foughten fight Against the heathen host in gory field,
Of those who reap renown with falchion bright,
Or list in war the ponderous axe to wield,
Or press the courser's flank with spear and shield

(From Morte d Arthur)

From Heber's Journal.

If thou wert by my side, my love, How fast would evening fail In green Bengala's palmy grove, Listening the nightingale 1

If thou, my love, vert by my side,
My babies at my knee,
How gaily would our pinnace glide
O'er Gunga's mimic sea!

I miss thee at the dawning gray,
When on our deck reclined,
In carcless ease my limbs I lay,
And woo the cooler wind

I miss thee when by Gungr's stream
My twilight steps I guide,
But most beneath the lamp's pale beam
I miss thee from my side.

I spread my books, my pencil try, The lingering noon to cheer, But miss thy kind approving eye, Thy meck attentive ear

But when of morn or eve the star Belields me on my I nec. I seel, though thou art distant far, The prayers ascend for me

Then on! then on! where duty leads, My course be one and still. O'er broad Hindostan's sultry meads, O'er bleak Almorah's hill

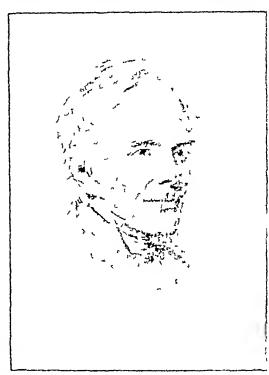

That course, nor Delhu's kingly gates, Nor wild Malwah detain, For sweet the bliss us both awaits By yonder western main

Thy towers, Bombay, gleam bright, they say, Across the dark blue sea, But ne cr were hearts so light and gay As then shall meet in thee '

This greeting to his wife was quoted by Thuckeray with warm appreciation. Heber's wife published his Ise, with a relection from his letters (2 vols. 1830) and a narrative of a journey from Calcula to Bombay and there is a shorter Lafe of him by Dr George Smith (1803).

John Kehle (1792-1866), author of The Christian Year, was born at Fairford, Gloucester shire the son of the vicar of the neighbouring parish of Coln St-Aldwynds. At the early age of fourteen he was elected a scholar of Corpus Christi, Oxford, and liaving taken a double first in classics and mathematics, was in 1811 elected to a fellow ship at Onel He was for some years tutor and examiner at Oxford, but afterwards lived with his father, and assisted him as curate The publication of The Christian Lear (1827), and the marvellous success of the work, brought its author prominently before the public, and in 1833 he was appointed Professor of Poetry About the same time the Tractarian at Oxford movement began, taking its first impulse from a sermon on national apostusy preached by Keble on the 14th July Newman became leader of the party, and after he had gone over to the Church of Rome, Keble and Pusey were cluef advisers and counsellors. Keble wrote some of the more important fracts, inculcating 'deep submission to authority, implicit reverence for Catholic tradition firm belief in the divine prerogatives of the priesthood, the real inture of the sacriments and the danger of independent speculation? In 1535 he became vicir of Hursley near Winchester. In 1846 he published a second volume of poems. Lyra Innocent un and he was author of a Late of Wilson Bishop of Sodor and Man (1563), and editor of in edition of Hookers Keble's poetry shows great delicaes and purity of thought and expression, prosaic sometimes and feeble, it curies with it an apostolic air and wais its way to the heart Mer his death appeared a much pared volume of Letters !

sermons, besides collections of his papers and reviews, Studia Sacra, and other pipers theory of poetry—that it is the vehicle for the expression of the poet's deepest feelings, controlled by a certain reserve—was explained in an interesting article in the British Critic in 1838 on Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Seeth, and was worked out at length and illustrated by in examination of the chief Greek and Latin poets in his Latin lectures delivered as Professor of Poetry at Oxford (1831-11) was only in deference to the wishes of his friends and not without much distidence that in 1827 he published The Christian Year, or

IOHV YIBIT From a Drawing (1863) 1) G. Fiel mind. K.A., in the National Po trait Gallery

Thoughts in Verse for the Sundays at I Helicity's throughout the Year. The influence of this volume was not very great at first, but its excellence visrecognised by true critics, and later on, when the Practirian movement had made us water well known, and had surred a deeper interest in its theme, it had an influence which can scarcely be overrated. For though some of the parms in rather obscure and somewhat constructed and artificial, as though written to comple a the senies, yet the grener number have a permise bay of inspiration in them, the lose of home life and of nature, a calming, spotting sense of the e er present line of God, a submer of sell, a sifering, and a sad undersore of grief for the noral and spiritual degeneracy of the Church are 5 mas, of Sprittual Course, twelve volumes of prioched a serking characteristics. More even than his lin works he influenced the Oxford movement by his saintly, affectionate, generous, and chivalrous character. Keble College, founded at Oxford in 1870, is a permanent monument to his memory. In the Christian Year we find suggested by the text, 'So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth, and they left off to build the city' (Gen. XI. 8), the following

Since all that is not Heaven must fade,
Light be the hand of Ruin laid
Upon the home I love
With hilling spell let soft Decay
Steal on, and spare the Giant sway,
The crash of tower and grove.

For opening down some woodland deep
In their own quiet glades should sleep
The relies dear to thought,
And wild flower wreaths from side to side
Their waving tracery hang, to hide
What ruthless time has wrought

Another text (Prov xiv 10) suggests

Why should we funt and fear to live alone, Since all alone, so Heaven has willed, we die Nor even the tenderest heart, and next our ovin, Knows half the reasons why we simle and sigh!

Lach in his hidden sphere of joy or woe

Our hermit spirits dwell and range apart,

Our eyes see all around, in gloom or glow,

Hues of their own, fresh borroy ed from the heart

Second Sunday after Christmas

When the poor and needy seel water and there is none and their tongue faileth for thirst. I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them —/fr vii 17

And wilt Thou hear the forced heart
To Thee in silence cry?
And as th' inconstant wildfires dart
Out of the restless cyc,
Wilt Thou forgive the wayward thought,
By kindly woes yet half untaught
A Saviour's right, so dearly bought,
That Hope should never die?

Thou wilt for many a languid prayer
Has reached Thee from the wild,
Since the lorn mother, wandering there,
Cast down her fainting child,
Then stole apart to weep and die,
Nor knew an angel form was nigh,
To show soft waters gusling by
And dewy shadows mild

Thou wilt—for Thou art Israel's God,
And Thine unwerned arm
Is ready yet with Moses' rod,
The hidden rill to charm
Out of the dry unfathonied deep
Of sands, that he in hifeless sleep,
Save when the scorehing whirlwinds heap
Their waves in rude alarm

These moments of wild writh are Thine—
Thine too the drearier hour
When o'er the horizon's silent line
Fond hopcless fineies cower,

And on the travel'er's listless way Rises and sets the unchinging day, No cloud in heaven to slake its ray, On earth no sheltering bower

Thou wilt be there, and not forsalle,

To turn the latter pool

Into a bright and breezy lake,

The throbbing brow to cool

Till left awhile with Thee alone

The wilful heart be fain to own

That He by whom our bright hours shone,

Our darl ness best may rule

The scent of water far away
Upon the breeze is flung
The deart pelican to day
Securely leaves her young,
Reproving thanl less man, who fears
To journey on a few lone years,
Where on the sand Thy step appears,
Thy crown in sight is hung

Then, who didst sit on Jeeob's well
The weary hour of noon,
The languad pulses Then canst tell,
The nerveless spirit tune
Then from Whose ero's in anguish burst the cry that own d Thy dying thirst,
To Thee we turn, our Last and lirit,
Our Sun and soothing Moon

From darkness, here and dreariness,
We ask not full repose,
Only be Thou at hand, to bless
Our trial hour of woes
Is not the pilgrim's toil o'erpaid
By the clear rill and palmy shade?
And see we not, up Larth's darl glade,
The gate of Heaven unclose?

The Twenty-first Sunday after Trinity

The vision is yet for an appointed time but at the end it shall speak, and not lie though it tarry wait for it because it will rurely come, it will not tarry —Hal it 3

The morning mist is cleared away,

Yet still the face of heaven is gray.

Nor yet the autiminal breeze has stirred the grove,

Finded yet full, a paler green

Skirts soberly the tranqual scene,

The redbreast warbles round this leafy cove.

Sweet messenger of 'calm decay,' Saluting sorrow as you may,
As one still bent to find or mal e the best,
In thee, and in this quiet mend,
The lesson of sweet peace I read
Rather in all to be resigned than blest

'Tis a low chant, according well
With the soft solitary knell,
As homeward from some grave beloved we turn
Or by some holy death bed dear,
Most welcome to the chastened car
Of her whom heaven is teaching how to mourn

O cheerful tender strain! the heart
That duly bears with you its part,
Singing so thankful to the dreary blast,
Though gone and spent its joyous prime,
And on the world's autumnal time,
'Mid withered lives and sere, its lot be east

That is the heart for thoughtful seer,
Watching, in trance nor dark nor clear,
The appulling Future as it never draws
This spirit calmed the storm to inect,
Feeling the rock beneath his feet,
And tracing through the cloud the eternal Cause

That is the heart for watchman true
Waiting to see what GoD will do,
As our the Church the gathering twilight falls
No more he strains his wi that eye,
If chance the golden hours be high,
By youthful Hope seen bearing round her walls

I are d from his shadowy paradise,
His thoughts to Heaven the steadier rise
There seel his answer when the world reproves
Contented in his dual hing round,
If only he be faithful found,
When from the east the eternal morning moves

George Finlay (1709-1875), the lustorian of Greece from the Roman conquest on, was the grandson of a well I nown Glasgow merchant and nuplies of Kirkman Linlas, the city's MP, but was born at Paversham in Kent, where his father, in officer who had served in the West was inspector of the Indies and Holland Covernment powder-mills He was educated for the Scottish Bar at Glasgow, Gottingen, and Ldinburgh but, filled with Philhellenic ardour, was moved to join Lord Byron and other enthusinsts in the Greek rehellion. After the peace he bought a property near Athens and, having vainly exhausted his means and endusiasm on the political and agricultural regeneration of his adopted country, he devoted himself to historical studies, and as advocate and historian of the modern Greeks did more for their cause than most of the Philhelienes His claims for compensation from the Greek Government, as well as those of Don Pacifico, were the cause of Ford Palmerston's famous demonstration against Greece in 1850. Ultimately he acted as Itmis correspondent it Athens, and there he died

His great History was written and published piecement in seven volumes between 1843 and 1861 as Green under the Romans, The Byzant re I mfire, Byzantine and Greek Limpres Metic al Greek at I Itel zond, Greeke under the Ollon in and Levetian Donitation, and The Great Revoluthe whole was reissued by the Clarendon Pres in 1877 under Mr Torers editorship, as a community History of Greet from the Komin Conquest to the Present Time, D.C. 176 to 1 1. 186] It was long before the great ments of his work were recognised by the world but gradually students in all countries admitted its connect and pe manent value. ## The Capture of Constantinople

On the day before the assiult the empror role round to all the posts occupied by the garrien and encouraged the troops to expect victors by his chee fuldemember. He then visited the Church of St Sophia already deserted by the orthodox where with his attendants he partool of the hole sacrament according to the Latin form. He returned for a short time to the imperial palace that he might test for a short time, and on quitting it to take his station at the great larach, he was so overcome by the certainty that he should never again behold those present that he turned to the members of his household, many of whom had been the compan ons of his vonth, and columnly a led them to paidon every offence he had ever given them lears burst from all present as Constantine mounted his hor can I role lowly forward to meet his fate

The contrist between the city of the Chri irus and the camp of the Mohammedan was not encouragn; Within the walls an emperor in the decline of afe commanded a small and disunited force with thenty leaders under his orders, each at the head of an almost independent band of Greek, Genoe e Veneura er Callan So slight was the te which boind these soldicr virious chiefs together that even when their were preprime for the hard assuit the emperious of high to use all his ruthorty and per onal influent to privent Guistiniani and the Grand Dulle Notaras for n coming to blows. suspended from the flagstaffs of the batteries, and from the masts and yards of the ships, and were reflected in the waters of the Propontis, the Golden Horn, and the Bosphorus The whole Othoman encampment was resplendent with the blaze of this illumination. Yet a deep silence prevailed during the whole night, except when the musical cadence of the solemn cliant of a thousand voices calling the true believers to prayers reminded the Greeks of the immense numbers and strict discipline of the host which was waiting eagerly for the signal of attact

On the 29th May [1453], long before the earliest dawn, the assault commenced both by land and sea. Column after column marched forward, and took np their ground before the portions of the wall they were ordered to The galleys, fitted with towers and scaling platforms, protected by the guns on the bridge, advanced against the fortifications of the port. But the principal attack was directed against the breach at the gate of St Romanos, where two flanking towers had fallen into the ditch and opened a passage into the interior of the city The gate of Charsias and the quarter of Blachern were also assailed by chosen regiments of janissaries in over The attack was made with daring whelming numbers courage, but for more than two hours every point was successfully defended. In the port the contest appeared favourable to the besieged, and even on the land side their valour was for some time successful columns followed one another in an incessant stream, and if one battnion fell back to reform its ranks, another rushed forward to take its place and renew the assault The defenders were at last fatigued by their exertions, and their scanty numbers were weakened by wounds Unfortunately, Giustiniani, the protostrator or marshal of the army, and the ablest officer in the place, received a wound which compelled him to retire on board his ship to have it dressed Until that moment he and the emperor had defended the great breach with advantage, but after his retreat Sagan Paslia, observing that the energy of the defenders was relaxed, excited the bravest of the janissaries to mount to the A chosen company led by Hassan of Ulubad (Lopadion), a man of gigantic frame, first crossed the ruins of the wall, and their leader gained the summit of the dilapidated tower which flanked the breach The defenders made a desperate resistance and many of his followers were slain, but the janissaries had secured the vantage ground, and fresh troops poar ing in to their aid, they surrounded the defenders of the breach The emperor fell amidst a heap of slain, and a column of janissaries rushed into Constantinople over his lifeless body

About the same time another corps of the Othomans forced an entrance into the city at the Gate Kerkos, which had been left almost without defence, for the besieged were not sufficiently numerous to guard the whole line of the fortifications, and their best troops were drawn to the points where the attacks were fiercest. The corps that forced the Gate Kerkos took the defenders of the Gate Charsias in the rear, and over powered all resistance in the quarter of Blachern.

Several gates were then thrown open, and the victorious army entered Constantinople at several points. The cry that the enemy had stormed the walls preceded their march. Senators, priests, monks, and nuns, men, women, and children, all rushed to seek safety in St Sophia's.

A prediction current among the Greeks flattered them with the vain hope that an ingel would descend from heaven and destroy the Molinmmedans in order to reveal the extent of God's love for the orthodox. St Sophia's, which for some time they had forsal en as a spot profuned by the emperor's attempt at a union of the Christian world, was again revered as the sanctuary of orthodoxy, and was crowded with the flower of the Greek nation, confident of a miraculous interposition in favour of their national pride and ecclesiastical prejudices

The besiegers, when they first entered the city, fearing lest they might encounter serious resistance in the narrow streets, put every soul they encountered to the sword. But as soon as they were fully aware of the impossibility of any further opposition, they began to make prisoners. At length they reached St Sophia c, and rushed into that magnificent temple, which could with case contain about twenty thousand persons The men, women, and children who had sought safety in the church were divided among the soldiers as slaves, without any refer ence to their rank or respect for their ties of blood, and hurried off to the camp, or placed under the guard of commides, who formed joint alliances for the security of their plunder The ecclesiastical ornanients and church plate were poor indeed when compared with the immense riches of the Byzantine cathedral in the time of the Crusaders, but whatever was movable was divided among the soldiers with such colority that the mighty temple soon presented few trices of having been a Chris tian church. The sack of this great cathedral was marked by many deeds of rapacity and erucity, but it was not stained by the infamous orgies and wanton insults with which the Crusaders had disgraced their victory in 1204.

While one division of the victorious army was engaged in plundering the southern side of the city, from the Gate of St Romanos to the Cliurch of St Sophia, another, turning to the port, made itself master of the warehouses that were filled with merchandise, and surrounded the Greek troops under the Grand Duke Notaras. The Greeks were easily subdued, and Notaras surrendered himself a prisoner

About midday the Turks were in possession of the whole city, and Moliammed II entered his new capital at the Gate of St Romanos, riding triumphantly past the body of the Emperor Constantine, which has con cealed among the slain in the breach he had defended The sultan rode straight to the Church of St Sophia, where he gave the necessary orders for the preservation of all the public buildings. Even during the license of the sack, the severe education and grave character of the Othomans exerted a powerful influence on their conduct, and on this occasion there was no example of the wanton destruction and wilful conflagrations that had signalised the Latin conquest. To convince the Greeks that their orthodox empire was extinct, Moham med ordered a moolah to ascend the bema and address a sermon to the Mussulmans, announcing that St Sophia was now a mosque set apart for the prayers of the true believers To put an end to all donbts concerning the death of the emperor, he ordered the body of Constantine to be sought amongst the slain, and after it had been identified by the Grand Duke Notaras, the head was exposed to the inhabitants of the capital, from whence it was afterwards sent as a trophy to be seen by the Greeks of the principal cities in the Othoman Empire.

The body was interred with due ceremony at a spot which is still pointed out, and where the Othoman sultans keep alive a striking memorial of their an cestor's victory by maintaining a lamp constantly burning over the remains of the last Christian emperor of Constantinople.

Colonel William Mure (1799-1860) of Caldwell in Ayrshire, who was educated at Westminster, Edinburgh, and Bonn, represented Ren frewshire in Parliament, commanded in the militia, and was Lord Rector of Glasgow University, was the author of a learned work, A Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece (5 vols 1850-57, unfinished) He travelled in Greece, and in the Journal of his tour (1842) engaged in the Homeric controversy, especially as to the localities of the Odyssey A competent scholar devoted to Greek literature for twenty years, he brought to his Critical History political opinions directly opposite to those of Mr Grote, maintained that both Iliad and Odyssey were originally composed substantially as we still have them, and argued strenuously for the unity and authenticity of the Homeric poems

It is probable that, like most other great painters of human nature, Homer was indebted to previous tradition for the original sketches of his principal heroes sketches, however, could have been little more than out lines, which, as worked up into the finished portraits of the Iliad and Odyssey, must rank as his own genuine productions. In every branch of unitative art this faculty of representing to the life the moral phenomena of our nature in their varied phases of virtue, vice, weak ness, or eccentricity is the highest and rarest attribute of genius, and rarest of all as exercised by Homer through the medium of dramatic action, where the characters are never formally described, but made to develop them selves by their own language and conduct. It is this among his many great qualities which chiefly raises Homer above all other poets of his own class, nor, with the single exception perhaps of the great English drama tist, has any poet ever produced so numerous and spirited a variety of original characters, of different ages, ranks, and seves. Still more peculiar to himself than their variety is the unity of thought, feeling, and expression, often of minute phraseology, with which they are in dividually sustained, and yet without an appearance of effort on the part of their author. Each describes him self spontaneously when brought on the scene, just as the automata of Vulcan in the Odyssey, though indebted to the divine artist for the mechanism on which they move, appear to perform their functions by their own nnaided powers That any two or more poets should simultaneously have conceived such a character as Achilles is next to impossible Still less credible is it that the different parts of the Iliad, where the hero successively appears as the same sublime ideal being, under the influence of the same combination of virtues, failings, and passions-thinking, speaking, acting, and suffering according to the same single type of heroic grandear-can be the production of more than a single mind Such evidence is perhaps even stronger in the case of the less prominent actors, in so far as it is less possible that different artists should simultaneously agree in their portraits of mere subordinate incidental person ages than of heroes whose renown may have rendered their characters a species of public property. Two poets of the Elizabethan age might without any concert have harmonised to a great extent in their portrait of Henry V, but that the correspondence should have extended to the imaginary companions of his youth—the Falsialis, Pistols, Birdolphs, Quicklys—were in credible. But the nicest shades of peculiarity in the inferior actors of the Iliad and Odissey are conceived and maintained in the same spirit of distinction as in Achilles or Hector

John Colin Dunlop (c 1785-1842), son of a poetical Lord Provost of Glasgow (see Vol II p 808), studied there and at Edinburgh for the Scottish Bar, and from 1816 till his death was Sheriff of Renfrewshire His History of Fiction from the Earliest Greek Romances till the Novels of the Present Age, published in 1814, could not from the nature of the case be a perfect work, nor does it stand on the higher level of literary criticism But, improved in a second edition (3 vols 1816), it was in the German annotated translation (1851) described as the only work of its kind, and it contains a vast amount of sensible, if at times somewhat superficial, information He wrote also a History of Roman Literature (3 vols 1823-28), Mimoirs of Spain from 1621 to 1700 (2 vols 1834), and a volume of translations from the Latin Anthology (1838)

Sir William Francis Patrick Napier (1785-1860) was a descendant of Napier of Merchiston, brother of Sir Charles the conqueror of Sindh, and cousin of Admiral Sir Chailes Napier, who bombarded Acre and commanded in the Baltic in the war against Russia in 1854 Born at Celbridge, County Kildare, the son of Colonel the Hon George Napier and his second wife, Lady Sarah Bunbury (daughter of the Duke of Richmond and at one time the object of a romantic passion on the part of the young George III), he entered the army at fifteen, and as an officer in the famous Light Division greatly distinguished Immself in the Peninsular war, of which he was to write the splendid record, The History of the War in the Pininsula and in the South of France from the year 1807 to the year 1814 (1828-40) Napier, unlike most earlier British authors, showed the same admiration for French as for English heroism, his proof-sheets were read by Marshal Soult. The book immediately gave Napier high rank amongst English writers and historians, superseded Southey's and other works on the same subject, was translated into French, Spanish, Italian, and German, and took a permanent place as an English classic. Mr Oman, in rewriting the history of the Peninsular war (1902), fully recognises the merits of 'the immortal six volumes of the grand old soldier,' but insists, with evidence, that in this all-important contemporary narrative the personal element counts for too much, and that Napier's sympathies and enmities have coloured the whole work. He was a bitter enemy of the Tories of his own day, and is not a trustworthy guide either on the English or Spanish politics of the time. He was strongly prejudiced against Canning and Castlereagh, and cherished the hallucination 'that Bonaparte was a beneficent character thwarted in his designs for the regeneration of Europe by the obstinate and narrow-minded opposition of the British Government' He is always unfair to the Spaniards, and invariably minimises their successes and exag-But 'as a narrator of the gerates their defeats incidents of war he is unrivalled no one who has ever read them can forget his soul stirring descrip tions of the charge of the Fusilier brigade at Albuera, of the assault on the great breach at Badylos, or the storming of Soult's position on the Rhune. These and a hundred other cloquent passages will survive for ever as masterpieces of a vigorous English prose' Apier, who was a generous and hot tempered man, a keen controversialist, an accomplished printer and sculptor, wrote, beside his magnum opus, an account of The Conquest of Scinde (1845), a somewhat too eulogistic and one sided Life and Ofinions of Sir Charles Napur (1857), and a history of his brother's administration of Sindh

Albuera

Houghton's regiments reached the height under a heavy cannonade, and the Twenty ninth, after breaking through the fugitive Spaniards, was charged in flank by the French lancers, yet two companies, wheeling to the right, foiled this attack with a sharp fire, and then the third brigade of the second division came up on the left, and the Spanish troops under 71, as and Ballesteros at last moved forward. Hartman's artillery was now in full play, and the enemy's infintry recoiled, but soon recover ing, renewed the fight with greater violence than before. The cannon on both sides discharged showers of grape at half range, the peals of musl ctry were incessant, often within pistol shot, yet the close formation of the French emburrassed their battle, and the British line would not yield them an inch of ground or a moment of time to open their ranks Their fighting vas, however, fierce Stewart was twice wounded, Colonel and dangerous Duckworth was slain, and the intrepid Houghton, having received many wounds without shrinking, fell and died in the very act of cheering on his men. Still the stringgle continued with unabated fury Colonel Inglis, twenty two officers, and more than four hundred men, out of five hundred and seventy who had mounted the hill, fell in the Tifty seventh alone, the other regiments were scarcely better off, not one third were standing in any ammuni tion failed, and as the English fire slaci ened a French column was established in advance upon the right flank The play of the guns checked them a moment, but in this dreadful crisis Beresford wavered! Destruction stared him in the face, his personal resources were exhausted, and the unhappy thought of a retreat rose in his agitated mind. He had before brought Hamilton's Portuguese into a situation to cover a retrograde move ment, he now sent Alten orders to abandon the bridge and village of Albuera, and to take, with his Germans and the Portuguese artillery, a position to co er a retreat by the Valverde road. Lut while the commander was thus preparing to resign the contest, Colonel Hardinge had urged Cole to advance with the fourth division, and then riding to the third brigade of the second division which, under the command of Colonel Abercrombie, had hitherto been only slightly engaged, directed him also to push forward into the fight. The die was thus east, Beresford acquiesced, Alten received orders to retake the village, and this terrible battle was continued

The fourth division was composed of two brigades one of Portuguese under General Harvey, the other, under Sir William Myers consisting of the Seventh and Twenty third Regiments, was called the fusileer brigade Harvey's Portuguese were immediately pushed in bety een I umley's dragoons and the hill, where they were charged by some French cavalry, whom they heat off, and mean time Cole Ind his fusiliers up the contested heighthis time six gins were in the enemy's po se sion, the whole of Werle's reserves were coming forward to reinforce the front column of the Trench, the remnant of Honcliton's brigade could no longer maintain its ground, the field was happed with carcasses, the lancers were riding furiously about the captured artillers on the upper parts of the hill, and behind all, Hamilton's Portuguese and Alten's Germans, now withdraying from the bridge, seemed to be in full retreat Soon, however Cole's first leers, fluided by a battalion of the Lusitanian legion under Colonel Hav I shawe, mounted the hill, drove off the lancers, recovered five of the capture I guns and one colour, and appeared on the right of Houghton's brigade, precisely as Abercrombie passed it on the left.

Such a gallant line, assuing from the mids' of the smole and rapidly separating itself from the confused and broken multitude, startled the enemy's nineres, which were increasing and pressing onwards as to an assured victors, they wavered, hesitated, and then somiting forth a storm of fire, liastily endeavoured to enlarge their front, while n fearful discharge of grape from all their artiller, whistled through the British ranks killed, Cole and the three colonels Lllis, Blakeney, and Hawkshawe, fell wounded, and the fusileer battalions, struck by the iron tempest, recled and staggered like sinling ships, but suddenly and sternly recovering, they closed on their terrible enemies, and then was seen with what a strength and impesty the British soldier fights. In vain did Soult with voice and gesture animate his Frenchmen, in vain did the hardiest veterans break from the crowded columns and sacrifice their lives to gain time for the mass to open out on such a fair field, in vain did the mass itself bear up, and, fiercely striving fire indis eriminately upon friends and foes, while the horsemen hovering on the flank threatened to charge the advancing line Nothing could stop that astonishing infantry sudden burst of unlisciplined valour, no nervous enthu siasm weakened the stability of their order their flashing eyes were bent on the dark columns in their front, their measured tread shool the ground, their dreadful volleys swept away the head of every formation, their deafening shouts overpowered the dissonant cries that broke from all parts of the tumultuous eroud, as slowly and with a horrid carnage it was pushed by the incessant vigour of the attack to the farthest edge of the hill. In vain did the French reserves mix with the struggling multitude to sustain the fight, their efforts only increased the irreme diable confusion, and the mighty mass, breaking off like a loosened cliff, went headlong down the steep—the rain flowed after in streams discoloured with blood, and eighteen hundred unwounded men, the remnant of six thousand unconquerable British soldiers, stood triumphant on the fatal hill!

Badajos

All this time the tumult at the brenches was such as if the very earth had been rent asunder and its central fires bursting upwards uncontrolled The two divisions had reached the glacis just as the firing at the castle eom menced, and the flash of a single musket discharged from the covered way as a signal showed them that the French were ready, yet no stir was heard and darkness covered the breaches Some hay-packs were thrown, some ladders placed, and the forlorn hopes and storming parties of the light division, five hundred in all, de seended into the ditch without opposition, but then a bright flame shooting upwards displayed all the terrors of the scene. The rumparts, crowded with dark figures and glittering arms, were on one side, on the other the red columns of the British, deep and broad, were coming on like streams of burning lava, it was the touch of the magician's wand, for a crash of thunder followed, and with incredible violence the storming parties were dashed to pieces by the explosion of hundreds of shells and nowder barrels.

For an instant the light division stood on the brink of the ditch amazed at the terrific sight, but then, with a shout that matched even the sound of the explosion, the men flew down the ladders, or, disdaming their aid, leaped reckless of the depth into the gulf below, and at the same moment, amidst a bluze of musketry that dazzled the eyes, the fourth division came running in and de seended with a like fury There were only five ladders for the two columns, which were close together, and a deep cut made in the bottom of the ditch as far as the counter guard of the Triuidad was filled with water from the inundation, into that watery share the head of the fourth division fell, and it is said above a hundred of the fusileers, the men of Albuera, were there smothered Those who followed checked not, but, as if such a disaster had been expected, turned to the left and thus came upon the face of the unfinished ravelin, which, being rough and broken, was mistaken for the breach and instantly covered with men, jet a wide and deep chasm was still between them and the rumparts, from whence came a deadly fire wasting their ranks Thus buffled, they also commenced a rapid discharge of musketry, and disorder eusned, for the men of the light division, whose conducting engineer had been disabled early, and whose flank was confined by an unfinished ditch intended to cut off the bastion of Santa Maria, rushed towards the breaches of the curtain and the Trinidad, which were indeed before them, but which the fourth division had been destined to storm. Great was the confusion, for the ravelin was quite crowded with men of both divisions, and while some continued to fire, others jumped down and ran towards the breach, many also passed between the ruelin and the counter guard of the Trinidad, the two divisions got mixed, the reserves, which should have remuned at the quarries, also came pouring in until the ditch was quite filled, the rear still crowding forward and all cheering vehiciently. The enemy's shouts also were loud and terrible, and the bursting of shells and of grenades, the rouring of gans from the flanks, answered by the iron howitzers from the battery of the parallel, the heavy roll and hornd explosion of the powder barrels, the whizzing flight of the blazing splinters, the loud exhortations of the officers, and the continual elatter of the muskets made a maddening din

Now a multitude bounded up the great breach as if driven by a whirlwind, but across the top glittered a range of sword blades, sharp pointed, keen edged on both sides, and firmly fixed in ponderous beams chained together and set deep in the ruins, and for ten feet in front the ascent was covered with loose planks studded with sharp iron points, on which feet being set, the planks moved, and the unhappy soldiers, falling forward on the spikes, rolled down upon the ranks behind. Then the Frenchmen, shouting at the snecess of their stratagem and leaping forward, plied their shot with terrible rapidity, for every man had several muskets, and each musket, in addition to its ordinary charge, contained a small eylinder of wood stuck full of wooden slugs, which scattered like hall when they were discharged. Once and again the assailants rushed up the breaches, but always the sword blades, immovable and impassable, stopped their charge, and the lussing shells and thunder ing powder barrels exploded uncersingly. Hundreds of men had fallen, hundreds more were dropping, still the heroic officers called aloud for new trials, and, sometimes followed by many, sometimes by a few, ascended the rums, and so furious were the men themselves that in one of these charges the rear strove to push the foremost on to the sword blades, willing even to make a bridge of their writing bodies, but the others frustrated the attempt by dropping down, and men fell so far from the shot that it was hard to know who went down voluntarily and who were stricken, and many stooped unhurt that never rose again Vain also would it have been to break through the sword-blades, for the trench and parapet behind the breach were finished, and the assailants, crowded into even a narrower space than the ditch was, would still have been separated from their enemies and the slaughter would have continued

At the beginning of this dreadful conflict Andrew Barnard had with prodigious efforts separated his division from the other and preserved some degree of mili tary array, but now the turnult was such that no com mand could be heard distinctly except by those close at hand, and the mutilated carcasses heaped on each other, and the wounded struggling to avoid being trampled upon, broke the formations order was im possible! Officers of all ranks, followed more or less numerously by the men, were seen to start out as if struck by sudden madness and rush into the breach, which, yawning and glittering with steel, seemed like the mouth of a huge dragon belching forth smoke and slame In one of these attempts Colonel Macleod of the Forty third, a young man whose feeble body would have been quite unfit for war if it had not been sustained by an unconquerable spirit, was killed, wherever his voice was heard his soldiers had guthered, and with such a strong resolution did he lead them up the fital ruins that when one behind him in falling plunged a bayonet into his back he complained not, but, continuing his course, was shot dead within a vard of the sword blades. Let there was no want of gallant leaders or desperate followers until two hours passed in these vain efforts had convinced the troops the breach of the Trinidad was in pregnable, and as the opening in the curtain, although less strong, was retired and the approach to it impeded by deep holes and cuts made in the ditch, the soldiers did not much notice it after the partial failure of one attack which had been made early. Gathering in dark groups and leaning on their muskets, they looked up with sullen desperation at the Trinidad, while the enemy, stepping out on the ramparts and aiming their shots by the light of the fire balls which they threw over, asked as their victims fell, 'cohy they did not come into Badajos'

In this dreadful situation, while the dead were lying in heaps and others continually falling, the wounded crawl ing about to get some shelter from the merciless shower above, and withal a siekening stench from the burnt flesh of the slain, Captain Nicholas of the engineers was observed by Lieutenant Shaw of the Forty third making incredible efforts to force his way with a few men into the Shaw immediately collected fifty Santa Maria bastion soldiers of all regiments and joined him, and although there was a deep cut along the foot of that breach also, it was instantly passed, and these two young officers led their gallant band with a rush up the ruins, but when they had gained two thirds of the ascent a concentrated fire of musketry and grape dashed nearly the whole dead to the earth Nicholas was mortally wounded, and the intrepid Shaw stood alone! With inexpressible cool ness he looked at his watch, and saying it was too late to carry the breaches, rejoined the masses at the other attack. After this no further effort was made at any point, and the troops remained passive but unflinching beneath the enemy's shot, which streamed without intermission, for of the riflemen on the glacis, many, leaping early into the ditch, had joined in the assault, and the rest, raked by a cross fire of grape from the distant bastions, buffled in their aim by the smoke and flames from the explosions, and, too few in number, entirely failed to quell the I rench musketry

About midnight, when two thousand brave men had fallen, Wellington, who was on a height close to the quarries, ordered the remainder to retire and re form for a second assault, he had heard the eastle was taken, but, thinking the enemy would still resist in the town, was resolved to assaul the breaches again. This retreat from the ditch was not effected without further carnage and confusion, the French fire never slackened, a cry arose that the enemy was making a sally from the distant flanks, and there was a rush towards the ladders. Then the grouns and lamentations of the wounded who could not move and expected to be slain increased, and many officers who had not heard of the order endeavoured to stop the soldiers from going back, some would even have removed the ladders, but were unable to break the crowd

All this time Picton was lying close in the castle, and either from fear of risking the loss of a point which ensured the capture of the place, or that the egress was too difficult, made no attempt to drive away the enemy from the breaches. On the other side, however, the fifth division had commenced the false attack on the Purda keras, and on the right of the Guadiana the Portuguese were sharply engaged at the bridge thus the town was girdled with fire, for Walker's brigade, having passed on during the feint on the Pardaleras, was escalading the distant bastion of San Vincente. His troops had advanced along the banks of the river and reached the I rench guard house at the barrier gate undiscovered, the ripple of the waters smothering the sound of their foot steps, but just then the explosion at the breaches took place, the moon shone out, the French sentinels, discover ing the columns, fired, and the British soldiers, springing forward under a sharp musketry, began to hew down the wooden barrier at the covered way The Portuguese, panic stricken, threw down the scaling ladders, the others snatched them up again, and forcing the barrier, jumped into the ditch, but the guiding engineer officer was killed, there was a cunette which embarrassed the column, and the ladders proved too short, for the walls were gene rally above thirty feet high. The fire of the enemy was deadly, a small mine was sprung beneath the soldiers' feet, beams of wood and live shells were rolled over on their heads, showers of grape from the flank swept the ditch, and man after man dropped dead from the ladders

Fortunately some of the defenders had been called away to aid in recovering the castle, the ramparts were not entirely manned, and the assailants, discovering a corner of the bastion where the scarp was only twenty feet high, placed three ladders there under an embrasure which had no gun and was only stopped with a gabion. Some men got up with difficulty, for the ladders were still too short, and the first man who gained the top was pushed up by his comrades, and drew others after him until many had won the summit, and though the French shot heavily against them from both flanks and from a house in front, their numbers augmented rapidly, and half the Fourth Regiment entered the town itself to dislodge the French from the houses, while the others pushed along the rampart towards the breach, and by dint of hard fighting successively won three bastions.

In the last of these combats Walker, leaping forward sword in hand at the moment when one of the enemy's cannoneers was discharging a gun, was covered with so many wounds it was wonderful that he could survive, and some of the soldiers immediately after, perceiving a lighted match on the ground, ened out, 'A mine!' At that word, such is the power of imagination, those troops who had not been stopped by the strong barrier, the deep ditch, the high walls, and the deadly fire of the enemy, staggered back appalled by a chimera of their own raising, and in this disorder a French reserve under General Veillande drove on them with a firm and rapid charge, pitching some men over the walls, killing others outright, and cleansing the ramparts even to the San Vincente. There, however, Leith had placed Colonel Nugent with a battalion of the Thirty-eighth as a reserve, and when the French came up, shouting and slaying all before them, this battalion, two hundred strong, arose and with one close volley destroyed them, then the pume ceased, the soldiers rallied, and in compact order once more charged along the walls towards the breaches But the French, although turned on both flanks and abandoned by fortune, did not yet yield the portion of the Fourth Regiment which had entered the town was strangely situated For the streets were empty and brilliantly illuminated and no person was seen, yet a low buzz and whispers were heard around, lattices were now and then gently opened, and from time to time shots were fired from underneath the doors of the houses by the Spamards, while the troops, with bugles sounding, advanced towards the great square of the town In their progress they captured several mules going with ammuni tion to the breaches, yet the square itself was as empty and silent as the streets, and the houses as bright with lamps a terrible enchantment seemed to be in opera tion, they saw only an illumination and heard only low whispering around them, while the tumult at the breaches was like the crashing of thunder Plainly, however, the fight was there raging, and hence, quitting the square, they attempted to take the garrison in reverse by attack ing the rumparts from the town side, but they were re ceived with a rolling musketry, driven back with loss, and resumed their movement through the streets last the breaches were abandoned by the French, other parties entered, desultory combats took place Veillande and Phillipon, who was wounded, seeing all ruined, passed the bridge with a few hundred soldiers and entered San Christoval, which was surrendered next morning upon summons to Lord Fitzroy Sonierset, for that officer had with great readiness pushed through the town to the drawbridge ere the French had time to organise further resistance. But even in the moment of ruin the night before, this noble governor had sent some horsemen out from the fort to carry the news to Soult, and they reached him in time to prevent a greater mis fortune.

Now commenced that wild and desperate wickedness which tarnished the lustre of the soldiers' heroism indeed, were not alike, hundreds risked and many lost their lives in striving to stop the violence, but madness generally prevailed, and as the worst men were leaders here, all the dreadful passions of human nature were dis played Shameless rapacity, brutal intemperance, savage lust, cruelty and murder, shrieks and piteous lamenta tions, groans, shouts, imprecations, the lussing of fires bursting from the houses, the crashing of doors and windows, and the reports of muskets used in violence, resounded for two days and nights in the streets of Badajos! On the third, when the city was sacked, when the soldiers were exhausted by their own excesses, the tumult rather subsided than was quelled, the wounded men were then looked to, the dead disposed of t

Five thousand men and officers fell in this siege, and of these, including seven hundred Portuguese, three thou sand five hundred had been stricken in the assault, sixty officers and more than seven hundred men being slain on the spot. The five generals, Kempt, Harvey, Bowes, Colville, and Pieton, were wounded, the first four severely, six hundred men and officers fell in the escalade of San Vincente, as many at the castle, and more than two thousand at the breaches, each division there losing twelve hundred! And how deadly the breach strife was may be gathered from this the Forty third and Diffy second Regiments of the light division lost more men than the seven regiments of the third division engaged at the castle!

Let it be considered that this frightful carriage took place in a space of less than a hundred yards square, that the slain died not all suddenly nor by one manner of death—that some perished by steel, some by shot, some by water—that some were crushed and mangled by heavy weights, some trainpled upon, some dashed to atoms by the fiery explosions, that for hours this destruction was endured without slirinking and the town was won at last. Let these things be considered, and it must be admitted a British army bears with it an awful power. And false would it be to say the French were feeble men, the garrison stood and fought manfully and with good discipline, behaving worthily—shame there was none on any side. Yet who shall do justice to the bravery of the British soldiers? the noble emulation of the officers? Who shall measure out the glory of Ridge, of Macleod, of Nicholas, of O'Hare of the Ninety fifth, who penshed on the breach at the head of the stormers, and with him nearly all the volunteers for that desperate service? Who shall describe the springing valour of that Portu guese grenadier who was killed the foremost man at the Santa Maria? or the martial fury of that desperate rifle man who, in his resolution to win, thrust himself beneath the chained sword blides, and there suffered the enemy to dash his head to pieces with the ends of their muskets? Who can sufficiently honour the intrepulity of Walker, of Shaw, of Canch, or the hardiness of Terguson of the Forty third, who, having in former assaults received two deep wounds, was here, his former hurts still open, leading the stormers of his regiment, the third time a volunteer, the third time wounded? Nor would I be understood to select these as pre eminent, many and signal were the other examples of unbounded devotion, some known, some that will never be known, for in such a tumult much passes unobserved, and often the observers fell themselves ere they could bear testimony to what they saw, but no age, no nation, ever sent forth braver troops to battle than those who stormed Badajos

When the extent of the night's havor was made known to Lord Wellington the firmness of his nature gave way for a moment, and the pride of conquest yielded to a passionate burst of grief for the loss of his gallant soldiers.

The following outburst on Byron—intercalated in Napier's defence of his brother—shows the historian of the Peninsular war in another light

On Byron.

But while the Lord High Commissioner, Adam, could only see in the military resident of Cephalonia a person to be crushed by the leaden weight of power without equity, there was another observer in that island who appreciated and manfully proclaimed the great qualities of the future conqueror of Scinde. This man, himself a butt for the rancour of envious duliness, was one whose youthful genius pervaded the world while he lived, and covered it with a pall when he died. For to him moun tain and plain, torrent and lake, the seas, the skies, the earth, light and darkness, and even the depths of the himman heart, gave up their poetic secrets, and he told them again, with such harmonious melody, that listening nations marvelled at the sound, and when it ceased they sorrowed

Sir John Kincaid (1787-1862) was one among several of Wellington's soldiers who wrote picturesque memoirs of their services under him in the Napoleonic wars Born near Falkirk, he held a lieutenant's commission in the North York Militia, but in 1809 enlisted in the old 95th-the present Rifle Brigade—as a volunteer In the ranks at first, but afterwards as a heutenant, he served through the Peninsular war from Torres Vedras to Toulouse, and fought also at Quatre Bras and Waterloo After the peace he rose to be a captain in 1826 and Yeoman of the Guard in 1844, and was knighted in 1852 In 1830 appeared his Adventures in the Rifle Brigade, describing in familiar and unsystematic fashion, but with wonderful spirit and vividness, his experiences in the Peninsular and Belgian campuigns Kincaid had a genuine literary gift, and his book ranks first in a group of camp memoirs wherein the next best is probably the Recollections (1848) of 'Rifleman' Harris, a private of the 95th during the campaigns of Vimeiro and Corunna The following glimpse of Waterloo is from Kincaid

The Riflemen at Waterloo

The sileneing of these guns was succeeded by a very extraordinary scene on the same spot A strong regi ment of Hanoverians advanced in line to charge the enemy out of La Haye Sunte, but they were themselves charged by a brigade of cuirassiers, and, excepting one officer on a little black horse, who went off to the rear like a shot out of a shovel, I do believe that every man of them was put to death in about five seconds brigade of British light dragoons advanced to their relief, and a few on each side began exchanging thrusts, but it seemed likely to be a drawn battle between them, without much harm being done, when our men brought it to a crisis sooner than either side anticipated, for they previously had their rifles eagerly pointed at the cuiras siers, with a view of saving the perishing Hanoverians, but the fear of killing their friends withheld them, until the others were utterly overwhelmed, when they in stantly opened a terrific fire on the whole concern, sending both sides to flight, so that, on the small space of ground within a hundred yards of us, where five thousand men had been lighting the instant before, there was not now a living soul to be seen

It made me mad to see the curressiers in their retreat stooping and stabbing at our wounded men as they lay on the ground. How I wished that I had been blessed with Omnipotent power for a moment, that I might have blighted them!

The same field continued to be a wild one the whole of the afternoon. It was a sort of daelling post between the two armics, every half hour showing a meeting of some kind upon it, but they never exceeded a short scramble, for men's lives were held very cheap there

For the two or three succeeding hours there was no variety with us, but one continued blaze of musketry. The smoke hung so thick about that, although not more than eighty yards asunder, we could only distinguish each other by the flashes of the pieces

I shall never forget the scene which the field of battle presented about seven in the evening. I felt weary and worn out, less from fatigue than anxiety Our division, which had stood upwards of five thousand men at the commencement of the battle, had gradually dwindled down into a solitary lot of skirmishers. The 27th Regi ment were lying literally dead, in square, a few yards behind us My horse had received another shot through the leg, and one through the flap of the saddle, which lodged in his body, sending him a step beyond the The smoke still hung so thick about us that we could see nothing I walked a little way to each flank, to endeavour to get a glimpse of what was going on, but nothing met my eye except the mangled remains of men and horses, and I was obliged to return to my post as wise as I went.

I had never yet heard of a buttle in which everybody was killed, but this seemed likely to be an exception, as all were going by turns. We got excessively im patient under the time similitude of the latter part of the process, and burned with desire to have a last thrust at our respective vis a vis, for, however desperate our affairs were, we had still the satisfaction of seeing that theirs were worse. Sir John Lambert continued to stand as our support at the head of three good old regiments, one dead (the 27th) and two living ones, and we took the liberty of soliciting him to aid our views, but the Duke's orders on that head were so very particular that the gallant general had no choice

Presently a cheer, which we knew to be British, commenced far to the right, and made every one prick up his ears—it was Lord Wellington's long wished for orders to advance, it gradually approached, growing louder as it grew near—we took it up by instinct, and charged through the hedge down upon the old knoll, sending our adversaries flying at the point of the bayonet. Lord Wellington galloped up to us at the instant, and our men begin to cheer him, but he called out, 'No cheering, my lads, but forward, and complete your victory.''

This movement had carried us clear of the smole, and, to people who had been for so many hours en veloped in darkness, in the midst of destruction, and naturally anxious about the result of the day, the scene which now met the eye conveyed a feeling of more exquisite gratification than can be conceived It was a fine summers evening, just before sunset The Trench were flying in one confused mass Entish lines were seen in close pursuit, and in admirable order, as fir as the eve could reach to the right, while the plain to the left was filled with Prussians. The enemy made one last attempt at a stand on the rising ground to our right of La Belle Allinnee, but a charge from General Adams's brigade again threw them into a state of confusion, which was now inextricable, and their rain was complete Artillery, baggage, and everything be longing to them fell into our linnds After pursuing them until dark, we halted about two miles beyond the field of battle, leaving the Prussians to follow up the Selections from the Memoirs of Kincaid, Harris, and others were edited by the Rey W. H. Fitchett under the title of Wellington's Men (1900).

James Silk Buckingham (1786-1855), traveller and lecturer, was born, a farmer's son, at Flushing near Falmouth, and went to sea before he was ten. After years of wandering, he in 1818 started a journal at Calcutta, whose strictures on the Indian Government led to its suppression (1823) In London he established the Oriental Herald (1824) and the Athonaum (1828), which he edited for a year or two, selling his interest in it ultimately to John Sterling From 1832 to 1837 he was member for Sheffield, and then travelled for four years in North America He was projector of the British and Foreign Institute (1843-1846), and president of the London Temperance League (1851) Between 1822 and 1855 he published nearly a score of volumes of travel (in Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, Assyria, America, as well as in Western Europe) and many political treatises, besides two volumes of an Autobiography, of which the third and fourth never appeared

James Sheridan Knowles (1784–1862) was long accounted the most successful of modern tragic dramatists Born at Cork, he was the son of a respected teacher and author of a dictionary, a first cousin of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and the boy, after being trained mainly in his father's school, was successively an ensign in the militia, a medical student, an actor, a schoolmaster, an actor again, and from about 1844 an occasional Baptist preacher, fierce in denunciation of Catholicism His first play, Caius Gracchus, was performed at Belfast in 1815, the next, Virginius (1820), which had a good run at Covent Garden, was based on the familiar story of Virginia Knowles afterwards brought out and Applus William Tell (1825), in which Macready achieved a triumph, The Hunchback (1832), The Love Chase (1837), and other pieces Several of his pieces are still standard acting plays For more than a dozen years he enjoyed a civil list pension of £200. To a considerable knowledge of stage effect he united a lively, inventive imagination, and a poetical colouring which, if at times too florid, set off familiar images and illustrations. His style was formed on that of Massinger and the other elder dramatists, carried often to extravagance, he frequently violated Roman history and classical propriety, ran into conceits and affected metaphors, and had little sense of humour, his blank verse is mostly wooden and irregular, never in very perfect rhythm, and the style is not seldom stilted These faults were counterbalanced by a happy art of constructing situations and plots, romantic, not too improbable, though usually somewhat conventional, by skilful delineation of character, especially in domestic life, and by the infusion of not a little warm feeling and some real poetry He had a happy knack of utilising commonplaces or paradoxes for his purposes-thus 'It follows not because the hair is rough, the dog's a savage one,' 'What ment to be dropped on fortune's hill? The honour is to mount it, 'When fails our dearest friend, there may be refuge with our direst foe?

knowless Dramatic Works were collected (3 vols.) in 1843 of a Life by his son (1872) only twenty five copies were printed.

Basil Hall (1788-1844), writer of travels, was born in Edinburgh, the son of Sir James Hall of Dunglass, chemist and founder of experimental Basil entered the navy in 1802, and in 1816 commanded a sloop in the naval escort of Lord Amherst's mission to Peking, visiting Corea, then a region hardly known, and described for the first time in his Voyage of Discovery to Corea (1818) He also wrote a Journal on the Coast of Chili, Peru, and Mexico in 1820-22, Travels in North America in 1827-28, a vivacious work whose free criticisms of things American gave great offence in the United States, and Fragments of Voyages and Travels (1831-40) Schloss Hainfeld (1836) was a semi-romance, and Patchwork (1841) a collection of tales and sketches Hall died insane in Haslar Hospital

Bryan Waller Procter ('Barry Cornwall,' 1787-1874) was born at Leeds, and educated at Harrow, with Byron and Peel for schoolfellows Articled to a solicitor at Calne, about 1807 he came to London to live, and in 1815 began to contribute poetry to the Literary Gazette 1816 he succeeded by his father's death to about £500 a year, and in 1823 married Basil Montagu's step daughter, Anne Benson Skepper He had meanwhile published four volumes of poems, and produced a tragedy, Mirandola (1821), at Covent Garden, the success of which was largely due to the acting of Macready and Charles Kemble. Procter was called to the Bar in 1831, from 1832 to

BRYAN WALLER PROCTER From the Bust by G J H Foley, R.A, in the National Portrait

1861 was a Metropolitan Commissioner of Lunacy In 1857 a windfall came to Procter and other poets Mr John Kenyon, a wealthy West Indian gentleman, fond of literary society and author of a Rhymed Plea for Tolerance, bequeathed over £140,000 in legacies to friends and writers whom he admired Thus to Elizabeth Barrett Browning, a sum of £4000 was allotted, to her husband, £6500, and to Procter also £6500 Procter's works, published under the pseudonym 'Barry Cornwall' (a faulty anagram of his real name), comprise Dramatic Scenes (1819), A Sicilian Story and Marcian Colonna (1820), The Flood of Thessaly (1823), and English Songs (1832), besides memoirs of Edmund Kean (1835) and Charles Lamb (1866) The poems are rarely more than studies or graceful exercises, harmonious echoes of bygone and contemporary singers Yet 'Barry Cornwall' will be remembered as the man whom every one loved—that company including a hundred of the greatest of the century. His daughter Adelaide earned an independent right to a place in such a cyclopedia as the present (see below). His Bryan Waller Procter an Autobiographical Fragment, was edited in 1877 by Coventry Patmore, and the Academy for 17th March 1888 had a long article on Mrs Procter.

Address to the Ocean.

O thou vast Ocean 1 ever sounding sea! Thou symbol of a drear immensity! Thou thing that windest round the solid world Like a huge animal, which, downward harled From the black clouds, hes weltering and alone, Lushing and writhing till its strength be gone. Thy voice is like the thunder, and thy sleep Is as a giant's slumber, loud and deep Thou speakest in the east and in the west At once, and on thy heavily laden breast Fleets come and go, and shapes that have no life Or motion, yet are moved and meet in strife. The earth hath nought of this no chance or change Ruffles its surface, and no spirits dare Give answer to the tempest wakened air, But o'er its wastes the weakly tenants range At will, and wound its bosom as they go Ever the same, it hath no ebb, no flow But in their stated rounds the seasons come, And pass like visions to their wonted home, And come again, and vanish, the young Spring Looks ever bright with leaves and blossoming, And Winter always winds his sullen horn, When the wild Autumn, with a look forlorn, Dies in his stormy manhood, and the skies Weep, and flowers sieken, when the summer flies Oh ' wonderful thou art, great element, And fearful in thy spleens humours bent, And lovely in repose, thy summer form Is beautiful, and when thy silver waves Make music in earth's dark and winding caves, I love to wander on thy pebbled beach, Marking the sunlight at the evening hour. And hearken to the thoughts thy waters teach-Eternity-Lternity-and Power

Marcelia.

The shallow brook It was a dreary place That ran throughout the wood, there took a turn And widened all its music died away, And in the place a silent eddy told That there the stream grew deeper There dark trees Funereal-cypress, yew, and shadowy pine, And spicy cedar-clustered, and at night Shook from their melaneholy branches sounds And sighs like death 'twas strange, for through the day They stood quite motionless, and looked, methonght, Lake monumental things, which the sad earth From its green bosom had cast out in pity, To make a young girl's grave. The very leaves Disowned their natural green, and took black And mournful hue, and the rough brier, stretching His straggling arms across the rivulet, Lay like an armed sentinel there, catching

With his tenacious leaves, straws, withcred boughs, Moss that the banks had lost, coarse grasses which Swam with the current, and with these it hid The poor Marcelia's death bed Never may net Of venturous fisher be cast in with hope, For not a fish abides there. The slim deer Snorts as he ruffles with his shortened breath The brook, and panting flies the unlioly place, And the white heifer lows, and passes on The foaming hound laps not, and winter birds Go higher up the stream And yet I love To loster there and when the rising moon Flames down the avenue of pines, and looks Red and dilated through the evening mists, And chequered as the heavy branches sway To and fro with the wind, I stay to listen, And fancy to myself that a sad voice, Praying, comes moaning through the leaves, as 'twere For some misdeed The story goes that some Neglected girl-an orphan whom the world Frowned npon-once strayed thither and 'twas thought Cast herself in the stream You may have heard Of one Marcelia, poor Nolina's daughter, who Fell ill and came to want? No! Oh, she loved A wealthy man who marked her not He wed, And then the girl grew sick, and pined away, And drowned herself for love.

An Invocation to Birds

Come, all ye feathery people of mid air, Who sleep 'midst rocks, or on the mountain summits Lie down with the wild winds, and ye who huild Your homes amidst green leaves by grottos cool. And ye who on the flat sands hoard your eggs For suns to npen, come! O phœnix rare 1 If death hath spared, or philosophic search Permit thee still to own thy haunted nest, Perfect Arahian-lonely nightingale! Dusk creature, who art silent all day long, But when pale eve unseals thy clear throat, loosest Thy twilight music on the dreaming boughs Until they waken. And thou, cuekoo bird, Who art the ghost of sound, having no shape Material, but dost wander far and near, Like untouched echo whom the woods deny Sight of her love-come all to my slow charm! Come thou, sky climbing bird, wakener of morn, Who springest like a thought unto the sun, And from his golden floods dost gather wealth-Epithalamium and Pindarique song-And with it enrich our ears, come all to me, Beneath the chamber where my lady lies, And, in your several musics, whisper-Love 1

King Death.

King Death was a rare old fellow,
He sat where no sun could shine,
And he lifted his hand so yellow,
And poured out his coal black wine!
Hurrah for the coal black wine!

There came to him many a maiden
Whose eyes had forgot to shine,
And widows with grief o'erladen,
For a draught of his coal black wine.
Hurrali for the coal black wine!

The scholar left all his learning,
The poet his fancied woes,
And the beauty her bloom returning,
Like life to the fading rose
Hurrah for the coal black wine!

All came to the rare old fellow,
Who laughed till his eyes dropped brine,
And he gave them his hand so yellow,
And pledged them in Death's black wine.
Hurrah for the coal black wine!

The Nights

Oh, the Summer night
Has a smile of light,
And she sits on a sapphire throne,
Whilst the sweet winds load her
With garlands of odour,
From the bud to the rose o'erblown!

But the Autumn night
Has a piercing sight,
And a step both strong and free,
And a voice for wonder,
Like the wrath of the thunder,
When he shouts to the stormy sea !

And the Winter night
Is all cold and white,
And she singeth a song of pain,
Till the wild bee hummeth,
And the warm Spring cometh,
When she dies in a dream of rain 1

Oh, the night brings sleep
To the greenwoods deep,
To the bird of the woods its nest,
To care soft hours,
To life new powers,
To the sick, the weary—rest!

Song for Twilight

Hide me, Ó twilight air!
Hide me from thought, from care,
From all things foul or fair,
Until to morrow!
To night I strive no more,
No more my soul shall soar,
Come, sleep, and shut the door
'Gainst pain and sorrow!

If I must see through dreams,
Be mine Elysian gleams,
Be mine by morning streams
To watch and wander,
So may my spirit cast
(Serpent like) off the past,
And my free soul at last
Have leave to ponder

And shouldst thou 'scape control,
Ponder on love, sweet soul,
On joy, the end and goal
Of all endeavour
But if earth's pains will rise
(As damps will seek the skies),
Then night, seal thou minc eyes,
In sleep for ever

The Death of Amelia Wentworth.

Marian Are you awake, dear lady?
Anicha Wide awake
There are the stars abroad, I see I feel
As though I had been sleeping many a day
What time o' the night is it?

Mar About the stroke

Of midnight.

Amel Let it come. The skies are calm And bright, and so, at last, my spirit is Whether the heavens have influence on the mind Through life, or only in our days of death, I know not, yet, before, ne'er did my soul Look upwards with such hope of joy, or pine For that hope's deep completion Marian' Let me see more of heaven There—enough Are you not well, sweet girl?

Mar O yes, but you Speak now so strangely you were wont to talk Of plain familiar things, and cheer me now You set my spirit drooping

Amel I have spoke Nothing but cheerful words, thou idle girl Look, look above ' the canopy of the sky, Spotted with stars, shines like a bridal dress A queen might envy that so regal blue Which wraps the world o' nights Alas, alas l I do remember in my follying days What wild and wanton wishes once were mine, Slaves - radiant gems - and beauty with no peer, And friends (a ready host)—but I forget I shall be dreaming soon, as once I dreamt, When I had hope to light me. Have you no song, My gentle girl, for a sick woman's ear? There's one I've heard you sing 'They said his eye'-No, that's not it the words are hard to hit 'His eye like the midday sun was bright'. 'Tis so.

You've a good memory Well, listen to me.

I must not trip, I see.

Amel

I hearken Now

Song

His eye like the midday sun was bright, Hers had a proud but a milder light, Clear and sweet like the cloudless moon Alas I and must it fade as soon?

His voice was like the breath of war, But hers was fainter—softer far And yet when he of his long love sighed, She laughed in scorn—he fled and died.

Mar There is another verse, of a different air, But indistinct—like the low moaning
Of summer winds in the evening thus it runs—

They said he died upon the wave,

And his bed was the wild and bounding billow,
Her bed shall be a dry earth grave

Prepare it quick, for she wants her pillow

Amel How slowly and how silently doth time Float on his starry journey! Still he goes, And goes, and goes, and doth not pass away Hc rises with the golden morning, calmly, And the moon at night. Methinks I see Him stretching wide abroad his mighty wings,

Amel

Floating for ever o'er the crowds of men, Like a huge vulture with its prey beneath Lo! I am here, and time seems passing on To morrow I shall be a breathless thing-Yet he will still be here, and the blue hours Will laugh as gaily on the busy world As though I were alive to welcome them There's one will shed some tears Poor Charles! Charles (entering) I am here. Did you not call? Amel You come in time. My thoughts Were full of you, dear Charles Your mother-now I take that title-in her dying hour Has privilege to speak unto your youth There's one thing pains me, and I would be calm My husband has been harsh unto me-yet He 15 my husband, and you'll think of this If any sterner feeling move your heart? Seek no revenge for me You will not ?-Nay, Is it so hard to grant my last request? He is my husband he was father, too, Of the blae eyed boy you were so fond of once. Do you remember how his eyelids closed When the first summer rose was opening? 'Tis now two years ago-more, more and I-I now am hastening to him. Pretty boy! He was my only child How fair he looked In the white garment that encircled him !-'Twas like a marble slumber, and when we Laid him beneath the green earth in his bed, I thought my heart was breaking-yet I lived But I am wears now Mar You must not talk, Indeed, dear lady, nay-Indeed you must not Amel Well, then, I will be silent, yet not so For ere we journey, ever should we take A sweet leave of our friends, and wish them well, And tell them to take heed, and bear in mind Our blessings So, in your breast, dear Charles, Wear the remembrance of Amelia. She ever loved you-ever, so as might Become a mother's tender love-no more. Charles, I have lived in this too bitter world Now almost thirty seasons you have been A child to me for one third of that time. I took you to my bosom when a boy, Who scarce had seen eight springs come forth and vanish. You have a warm heart, Charles, and the base crowd Will feed upon it, if-but you must niake That heart a grave, and in it bury deep Its young and beaatifal feelings. All that you wish-all, but you cannot die And leave me? You shall see how calmly Death Will come and press his finger, cold and pale, On my now smiling lip these eyes men swore Were brighter than the stars that fill the sky, And yet they must grow dim an hour-ChOh, no ! No, no 'oh, say not so! I cannot bear To hear you talk thus. Will you break my heart? Amel No I would caution it against a change That soon must happen Calmly let us talk

When I am dead-

Alas, alas 1

Ch

Not as I wish you had a braver spirit Bid it come forth Why, I have heard you talk Of war and danger-Ah!-[Wentworth enters Mar She's pale-speak, speak , Ch O my lost mother!—How! You here? I am come To pray her pardon. Let me touch her hand. Amelia! she faints Amelia! [She dies Poor faded girl 1 I was too harsh-unjust Ch Look! Mar She has left us. Ch It is false. Revive ! Mother, revive, revive ' It is in vain Ch Is it then so? My soul is sick and faint. O mother, mother ! I-I cannot weep Oh for some blinding tears to dim my eyes, So I might not gaze on her! And has death Indeed, indeed struck her-so beautiful, So wronged, and never erring, so beloved By one—who now has nothing left to love? O thou bright heaven ' if thou art calling now Thy brighter angels to thy bosom-rest, For lo' the brightest of thy host has gone-Departed-and the earth is dark below, And now-I'll wander far and far away Like one that hath no country I shall find A sullen pleasure in that life, and when I say, 'I have no friend in all the world,' My heart will swell with pride, and make a show Unto itself of happiness, and in truth There is, in that same solitude, a taste Of pleasure which the social aever know From land to land I'll roam, in all a stranger, And, as the body gains a braver look By staring in the face of all the winds, So from the sad aspects of different things My soul shall plack a courage, and bear up Against the past And now-for Hindustan

Bernard Barton (1784-1849), the Quaker poet, was born in London of Cumbrian parentage. His mother died in bearing him, his father about 1791, and Bernard, brought up by his step mother at Tottenham, and sent to a Quaker school at Ipswich, was from 1798 to 1806 in a shop at Halstead He then went to Woodbridge, married, turned coal and corn merchant, lost his wife (1808), and, after a year as a tutor at Liverpool, returned to Woodbridge as clerk in a bank, there he continued until two days before his death He left a daughter, Lucy, who married Edward FitzGerald, the translator of Omar Khayyam Barton more than once thought of giving up business for a literary life. Byron in 1812 remonstrated 'Do not renounce writing,' he said, 'but never trust entirely to authorship If you have a profession, retain it, it will be, like Prior's fellowship, a last and sure resource.' Lamb, too, in 1823 wrote to him 'Throw yourself on the world, without any rational plan of support beyond what the chance employ of booksellers would afford you'll Throw yourself rather, my dear sir, from the steep Tarpeian rock slap dash

If you have but five headlong upon iron spikes consolatory minutes between the desk and the bed. make much of them, and live a century in them, rather than turn slave to the booksellers are Turks and Tartars when they have poor authors at their beck. Hitherto you have been at arm's length from them-come not within their I have known many authors want for bread-some repining, others enjoying the blessed security of a counting-house-all agreeing they had rather have been tailors, weavers-what not? -rather than the things they were. I have known some starved, some go mad, one dear friend literally dying in a workhouse. Oh, you know not -may you never know—the miseries of subsisting by authorship l Keep to your bank, and the bank will keep you.' Bernard Barton followed the advice, and managed withal to publish ten volumes of verse between 1812 and 1845-he 'would never believe there could be too much poetry' Several hymns by him are in general use, 'Lamp of our feet' and 'Walk in the light' being the most In 1824 some Quaker friends raised £1200 for him, and in 1846 Peel procured him a pension of £100 a year FitzGerald prefixed an exquisite Memoir to his Remains (1849), and there is also Mr E U Lucas's Bernard Barton and his Friends (1894)

To the Evening Primrose

Fair flower, that shunn'st the glare of day, Yet lov'st to open, meekly bold, To evening's hues of sober gray, Thy cup of paly gold,

Be thine the offering owing long
To thee, and to this pensive hour,
Of one brief tributary song,
Though transient as thy flower

I love to watch, at silent eve,
Thy scattered blossoms' lonely light,
And have my inmost heart receive
The influence of that sight

I love at such an hour to mark
Their beauty greet the night breeze chill,
And shine, mid shadows gathering dark,
The garden's glory still

For such, 'tis sweet to think the while, When cares and griefs the breast invade, Is friendship's animating smile In sorrow's dark'ning shade.

Thus it bursts forth, like thy pale cup, Glist'ning amid its dewy tears, And bears the sinking spirit up Amid its chilling fears.

But still more animating far,
If meek Religion's eye may trace,
Even in thy glimmering earth born star,
The holier hope of Grace.

The hope that as thy beauteous bloom Expands to glad the close of day, So through the shadows of the tomb May break forth Mercy's ray

To my Daughter

Sweet pledge of joys departed! as I lay Wrapt in deep slumber, I beheld thee led By thy angelie mother, long since dead—
Methought upon her face such smiles did play
As gild the summer morning A bright ray
Of lambent glory stream'd around her head
I gazed in rapture, love had banish'd dread,
Even as light the darkness drives away
Silent awhile ye stood—I could not move,
Such sweet delight my senses did o'erpower,
When, in mild accents of celestial love,
Thy guardian spoke—'Cherish this opening flower
With holy love, that so the future hour
Shall reunite our souls in bliss above.'

Ebenezer Elliott (1781-1849) was born of mixed moss-trooper and yeoman ancestry Masborough, now a suburb of Rotherham, in Yorkshire. A shy and morbid boy, who proved a dull pupil at four different schools, he worked in his father's foundry from his sixteenth to his twenty-third year, and threatened to become a 'sad drunken dog,' till the picture of a prim rose in Sowerby's Botany 'led him into the fields, and poetry followed' His Vernal Walk, written at sixteen, was published in 1801, to it succeeded Night (1818), The Village Patriarch (1829), Corn-law Rhymes and the Ranter (third ed. 1831), and other volumes He had married early, and sunk all his wife's fortune in his father's business, but in 1821, with a borrowed capital of £100, he started on his own account as a bar iron merchant at Sheffield, and throve exceedingly, 'making £20 a day sometimes without stirring from his counting-house, or ever seeing the goods he disposed of' Though in 1837 he lost fully onethird of his savings, still in 1841 he was able to retire with £300 a year to a house of his own building at Great Houghton near Barnsley, and there he died In his poems he saw the poor as miserable and oppressed, and traced most of the evils he deplores to the Corn laws he affirmed to be 'the cause of all the crime that is committed, 'agriculturists,' he maintained, 'ought not to live by robbing and murdering the manufacturers' On the other hand, 'Capital has a right to rule the land,' and 'Competition is the great social law of God,' and he was neither anarchist nor collectivist-

What is a Communist? One who has yearnings For equal division of unequal earnings

The Corn laws were denounced by him with a vehemence and a harshness of phraseology which most men cannot but feel as repulsive, even when they are recognised as the outcome of the irritated and inverted sympathies of an angry poet, and he had manifestly little or no humour. But his vigorous verses helped in no small degree to swell the cry which at length compelled the legislature to abolish all restrictions on the importation of corn.

For thee, my country, thee, do I perform, Sternly, the duty of a man born free, Heedless, though ass and wolf and venomous worm Shake ears and fangs, with brandished bray, at me

Elliott's imperfect but real endowment largely redeemed his errors of taste his pictures of humble worth, his descriptions of English scenery, are excellent, he wrote from genuine feeling, and often rose to indisputable eloquence. The Corn-law Rhymer was honoured with critical notices from Southey, Bulwer Lytton, and Wilson, and became for a while almost as truly and popularly the poet of Yorkshire—of its heights, dales, and 'broad towns'—as Scott was the poet of Tweedside, or Wordsworth of the Lakes

To the Bramble Flower

Thy fruit full well the schoolboy knows, Wild bramble of the brake! So put thou forth thy small white rose, I love it for his sake Though woodbines flaunt and roses glow O'er all the fragrant bowers, Thou needst not be ashamed to show Thy satin threaded flowers, For dull the eye, the heart is dull, That cannot feel how fair, Amid all beauty beautiful, Thy tender blossoms are ' How delicate thy gauzy fall ! How rich thy branchy stem ! How soft thy voice when woods are still, And thou sing'st hymns to them, While silent showers are falling slow, And 'mid the general hush, A sweet air lifts the little bough, Lone whispering through the bush ! The primrose to the grave is gone, The hawthorn flower is dead, The violet by the mossed gray stone Hath laid her weary head, But thou, wild bramble ' back dost bring, In all their beauteous power, The fresh green days of life's fair spring And boyhood's blossomy hour Scorned bramble of the brake 1 once more Thou bidd'st me be a boy, To gad with thee the woodlands o'er, In freedom and in joy

The Excursion.

Boue weary, many childed, trouble tried '
Wife of my bosom, wedded to my soul!
Mother of nine that live and two that died!
This day drink health from nature's monntain bowl,
Nay, why lament the doom which mocks control?
The buried are not lost, but gone before.
Then dry thy tears, and see the river roll
O'er rocks that crowned you time dark heights of yore,
Now, tyrant like, dethroned, to crush the weak no more

The young are with us yet, and we with them Oh, thank the Lord for all He gives or takes—The withered bud, the hving flower, or gem! And He will bless us when the world forsakes!

Lo I where thy fisher born, abstracted, takes,
With his fixed eyes, the trout he cannot see !
Lo ! starting from his earnest dream, he wakes!
While our glad Fanny, with rused foot and knee,
Bears down at Noe's side the bloom bowed hawthorn tree.

Dear children I when the flowers are full of bees,
When sun touched blossoms shed their fragrant snow,
When song speaks like a spirit, from the trees
Whose kindled greenness hith a golden glow,
When, clear as music, rill and river flow,
With trembling hues, all changeful, tinted o'er
By that bright pencil which good spirits know
Alike in earth and heaven—'tis sweet, once more,
Above the sky tinged hills to see the storm bird soar

'Tis passing sweet to wander, free as air,
Bhthe truants in the bright and breeze blessed day,
Far from the town—where stoop the sons of care
O'er plans of mischief, till their souls turn gray,
And dry as dust, and dead alive are they—
Of all self buried things the most unblessed
O Morn' to them no blissful tribute pay!
O Night's long courted slumbers! bring no rest
To men who laud man's foes, and deem the basest best!

God! would they handcuff thee? and, if they could, Chain the free air, that, like the daisy, goes
To every field, and bid the warbling wood
Exchange no music with the willing rose
For love sweet odours, where the woodbine blows
And trades with every cloud, and every beam
Of the rich sky! Their gods are bonds and blows,
Rocks, and blind shipwreck, and they hate the stream
That leaves them still behind, and mocks their changeless dream

They know ye not, ye flowers that welcome me,
Thus glad to meet, by trouble parted long!
They never saw ye—never may they see
Your dewy beauty, when the throstle's song
Floweth like starlight, gentle, calm, and strong!
Still, Avarice, starve their souls! still, lowest Pride,
Make them the meanest of the basest throng!
And may they never, on the green hill's side,
Embrace a chosen flower, and love it as a bride!

Blue Lyebright! Ioveliest flower of all that grow
In flower loved England! Flower, whose hedge side gaze
Is like an infant's! What heart doth not know Thee, clustered smiler of the bank! where plays
The sunbeam with the emerald snake, and strays
The dazzling rill, companion of the road
Which the lone bard most loveth, in the days
When hope and love are young? Oh, come abroad,
Blue Lyebright! and this rill shall woo thee with an ode.

Awake, blue Eyebright, while the singing wave
Its cold, bright, beauteous, soothing tribute drops
From many a gray rock's foot and dripping cave,
While yonder, lo, the starting stone chat hops!
While here the cottar's cow its sweet food crops,
While black faced cwes and lambs are bleating there,
And, bursting through the briers, the wild ass stops—kicks at the strangers—then turns round to stare—Then lowers his large red cars and shakes his long dark hair

Native Genius

O faithful love, by poverty embraced !

Thy heart is fire amid a wintry waste, Thy joys are roses born on Heela's brow, Thy home is Eden warm amid the snow, And she, thy mate, when coldest blows the storm, Clings then most fondly to thy guardian form, E'en as thy taper gives intensest light, When o'er thy bowed roof darkest falls the night. Oh, if thou e'er hast wronged her, if thou e'er From those mild eyes hast caused one bitter tear To flow unseen, repent, and sin no more ! For richest gems, compared with her, are poor, Gold, weighed against her heart, is light—is vile, And when thou sufferest, who shall see her smile? Sighing, ye wake, and sighing, sink to sleep, And seldom smile, without fresh cause to weep (Scarce dry the pebble, by the wave dashed o'er, Another comes, to wet it as before), Yet while in gloom your freezing day declines, How fair the wintry sunbeam when it shines ! Your foliage, where no summer leaf is seen, Sweetly embroiders earth's white veil with green, And your broad branches, proud of storm tried strength, Stretch to the winds in sport their stalwart length, And calmly wave, beneath the darkest hour, The ree born fruit, the frost defying flower Let luxury, siekening in profusion's chair, Unwisely pamper his unworthy heir, And, while he feeds him, blush and tremble too! But love and labour, blush not, fear not you l Your children—splinters from the mountain's side— With rugged hands, shall for themselves provide Parent of valour, east away thy fear l Mother of men, be proud without a tear 1 While round your hearth the woe nursed virtues move, And all that manliness can ask of love, kemember Hogarth, and abjure despuir, Remember Arkwright and the peasant Clare Burns, o'er the plough, sung sweet his wood notes wild, And richest Shakespeare was a poor man's child Sire, green in age, mild, patient, toil inured, Endure thinc evils as thou hast endured Behold thy wedded daughter, and rejoice 1 Hear hope's sweet accents in a grandchild's voice l See freedom's bulwarks in thy sons arise, And Hampden, Russell, Sidney, in their eyes 1 And should some new Napoleon's curse subdue All hearths but thine, let him behold them too, And timely shun a deadlier Waterloo Northumbrian vales! ye saw in silent pride,

Northumbrian vales! ye saw in silent pride,
The pensive brow of lowly Akenside,
When, poor, yet learned, he wandered young and free,
And felt within the strong divinity
Seenes of his youth, where first he wooed the Nine,
His spirit still is with you, vales of Tyne!
As when he breathed, your blue belled paths along,
The soul of Plato into British song

Born in a lowly hut an infant slept,
Drenmful in sleep, and sleeping, smiled or wept
Silent the youth—the man was grave and shy
His parents loved to watch his wondering eye
And lot he waved a prophet's hand, and gave,
Where the winds soar, a pathway to the wave!
From hill to hill bade air hung rivers stride,
And flow through mountains with a conqueror's pride

O'er grazing herds, lo I slips suspended sail, And Brindley's pruse hath wings in every gale ' The norm came up to drink the welcome shower, The redbreast quaffed the raindrop in the bower, The flaskering duck through freshened lilies swam, The bright roach took the fly below the dam, Ramped the glad colt, and eropped the pensile spray, No more in dust uprose the sultry way, The lark was in the cloud, the woodbine hung More sweetly o'er the chaffinch while he sung, And the wild rose, from every dripping bish, Belield on silvery Sherf the mirrored blush, When calmly seated on his panniered ass, Where travellers hear the steel his as they pass, A milk boy, sheltering from the transient storm, Chalked on the grinder's wall an infant's form, Young Chantrey smiled, no critic praised or blamed, And golden Promise smiled, and thus exclaimed 'Go, child of genius! rich be thine increase,

Song from 'Corn-law Rhymes'

Go-be the Phidias of the second Greece ''

Child, is thy father dead?
Father is gone!
Why did they tax his bread?
God's will be done!
Mother has sold her bed,
Better to die than wed!
Where shall she lay her head?
Home we have none!

Father clamm'd thrice a week,
God's will be done!
Long for work did he seek,
Work he found none
Tears on his hollow cheek
Told what no tongue could speak
Why did his master break?
God's will be done!

Doctor said air was best,
Food we had none,
Father, with panting breast,
Groan'd to be gone
Now he is with the blest—
Mother says death is best !
We have no place of rest—
Yes, ye have one!

There are two poor Lives of Ellioti, one by his son in law, John Watkins (1850) and another by January Searle (George S. Phillips 1850) See Carlyle's essay for the Edinburgh of July 1832, and Guest's History of Rotherham (1879)

Helpstone near Peterborough, 13th July 1793, his father was a helpless cripple and a pauper John got some education by his own extra work as a plough boy, from the labour of eight weeks he generally acquired as many pence as paid for a month's schooling. At thirteen he fell in with Thomson's Seasons, and hoarded up a shilling to purchase a copy, at daybreak on a spring morning he walked to Stamford—six or seven miles off—to make the purchase, and had to wait till the shops were opened. Returning to his native village with the precious purchase, as he walked through the green glades of Burghley Parl he composed his first piece of poetry, the Morning Walk, and this was soon followed by the Evening Walk and other verses A benevolent exciseman taught writing and arithmetic to the young poet, who continued his obscure but ardent devotion to his rural muse. In 1817, while working at Bridge Casterton in Rutland, he resolved to risk publishing a volume. By hard working day and night he saved a pound to print a prospectus, and a Collection of Original Trifles was announced to subscribers, the price not to exceed 3s 6d 'I distributed my papers,' he says, 'but as I could get at no way of pushing them into higher circles than those with whom I was acquainted, they consequently passed off as quietly as if they had been still in my possession, unprinted and unseen' Seven subscribers in all proposed But one of the prospectuses led to an acquaintance with Edward Drury, a bookseller in Stainford, and through his mediation the poems were published at London by Taylor and Hessey, who purchased them from Clare for £20 The volume was brought out in January 1820 as Poems descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery, by John Clare, a Northamptonshire Peasant The attention of the public was instantly awakened, magazines and reviews were unanimous in his favour, and soon he was in posses sion of a little fortune Earl Fitzwilliam sent £100 to his publishers, which, with the like sum advanced by them, was laid out in the purchase of stock, the Marquis of Exeter allowed him an annuity of fifteen guineas for life, Earl Spencer a further annuity of £10, and various other contributions were received, so that the poet had a permanent yearly allowance of £45. He married his 'Patty of the Vale,' daughter of a neighbouring farmer, and in his native cottage at Helpstone, with his aged and infirm parents and his young vife by his side-all proud of his now successful genius —he basked in the sunshine of poetical felicity His second venture, The Vitlage Minstrel and other Poems (2 vols 1821), raised his reputation first piece, in the Spenserian stanza, describes the scenes, sports, and feelings of rural life-the author himself sitting for the portrait of Lubin, the humble rustic who 'hummed his lowly dreams far in the shade where poverty retires' Clare contributed short pieces to the annuals and other periodicals more careful and polished in diction, but the poet's prosperity was, alas! soon over His discretion was not equal to his fortitude he speculated in farm ing, wasted his little hoard, and amidst accumulating difficulties sank into nervous despondency and despair For four years he was an inmate of Dr Allen's private asylum in Epping Forest, whence he escaped only to be taken to the Northampton lunatic asylum, and there he dragged on a miserable existence/of twenty years—unvisited by wife, child, or friend, it is said-till May 1864

Poor Clare's muse was the true offspring of English country life. He was a faithful painter of country scenes and occupations, and he noted every light and shade of his brooks, meadows, and green lanes. His imagery, drawn straight from nature, is varied and original, there is often a fine delicacy in his pieces, and not seldom he lights on really happy thoughts

What is Life?

And what is Life? An hour glass on the run,
A mist retreating from the morning sun,
A busy, bustling, still repeated dream
Its length? A minute's pause, a moment's thought,
And Happiness? A bubble on the stream,
That in the act of scizing shrinks to nought

And what is Hope? The puffing gale of morn,

That robs each floweret of its gem—and dies,

A cobwch, hiding disappointment's thorn,

Which stings more keenly through the thin disguise.

And what is Death? Is still the cause unfound? That darl mysterious name of horrid sound?

A long and lingering sleep the weary crave.
And Peace? Where can its happiness abound?

Nowhere at all, save beaven and the grave.

Then v hat is I ife? When stripped of its disguise, A thing to be desired it cannot be, Since everything that meets our foolish eyes. Gives proof sufficient of its vanity. This but a trial all must undergo,

To teach unthankful mortals how to prize. That happiness vain man's denied to know,

Until he is called to claim it in the skies.

Summer Morning

'Tis sweet to meet the morning breeze,
Or list the giggling of the brook,
Or, stretched beneath the shade of trees,
Peruse and pause on nature's book,

When nature every sweet prepares
To entertain our wished delay—
The images which morning wears,
The wal ening charms of early day !

Now let me tread the meadow paths,
Where glittering dew the ground illumes,
As sprinkled o'er the withering swaths,
Their moisture shrinks in sweet perfumes.

And hear the beetle sound his horn,
And hear the skylark whistling nigh,
Sprung from his bed of tufted corn,
A hailing minstrel in the sky

First sunbeam, calling night away
To see how sweet thy summons seems,
Split by the willow's wavy gruy,
And sweetly dancing on the streams.

How fine the spider's web is spun, Unnoticed to vulgar eyes, Its silk thread glittering in the sun Art's bungling vanity defies

Roaming while the dewy fields
'Neath their morning burden lean,
While its crop my searches shields,
Sweet I scent the blossomed bean.

Making oft remarking stops,
Watching tiny nameless things
Climb the grass's spiry tops
Ere they try their gauzy wings.

So emerging into light,
From the ignorant and vain
Fearful genius takes her flight,
Skimming o'er the lowly plain

From 'The Woodman.'

Far o'er the dreary fields the woodland lies,
Rough is the journey which he daily goes,
The woolly clouds, that hang the frowning skies,
Keep winnowing down their drifting sleet and snows,
And thro' his doublet keen the north wind blows,
While hard as iron the cemented ground,
And smooth as glass the glibbed pool is froze,
His nailed boots with clenching tread rebound,
And dithering echo starts, and mocks the clamping sound

The Primrose

Welcome, pale primrose! starting up between Dead matted leaves of ash and oak that strew
The every lawn, the wood, and spinney through,
'Mid creeping moss and ivy's darker green,
How much thy presence beautifies the ground!
How sweet thy modest unaffected pride
Glows on the sunny bank and wood's warm side!
And where thy fury flowers in groups are found,
The schoolboy roams enchantedly along,
Plucking the fairest with a rude delight
While the meek shepherd stops his simple song,
To gaze a moment on the pleasing sight,
O'erjoyed to see the flowers that truly bring

The Thrush's Nest.

The welcome news of sweet returning spring

Within a thick and spreading hawthorn bush
That overhung a molehill, large and round,
I heard from morn to morn a merry thrush
Sing hymns of rapture, while I drank the sound
With joy—and oft an unintruding guest,
I watched ber secret toils from day to day,
How true she warped the moss to form ber nest,
And modelled it within with wood and clay
And by and-by, like heath bells gilt with dew,
There lay her shining eggs as bright as flowers,
Ink spotted over, shells of green and blue
And there I witnessed, in the summer hours,
A brood of nature's minstrels chirp and fly,
Glad as the sunshine and the laughing sky

Dawnings of Genius

In those low paths which poverty surrounds,
The rough rude ploughman, off his fallow grounds—
That necessary tool of wealth and pride—
While moiled and sweating, by some pasture's side,
Will often stoop, inquisitive to trace
The opening beauties of a drusy's face,
Oft will he witness, with admiring eyes,
The brook's sweet dimples o'er the pebbles rise,
And often bent, as o'er some magic spell,
He'll pause and pick his shaped stone and shell
Raptures the while his inward powers inflame,
And joys delight him which he cannot name,

Ideas picture pleasing views to mind, For which his language can no utterance find, Increasing beauties, freshening on his sight, Unfold new charms, and witness more delight, So while the present please, the past decay, And in each other, losing, melt away Thus pausing wild on all be saunters by, He feels enraptured, though he knows not why, And hums and mutters o'er his joys in vain, And dwells on something which he can't explain The bursts of thought with which his soul's perplexed Are bred one moment, and are gone the next, Yet still the heart will kindling sparks retain, And thoughts will rise, and Fancy strive again So have I marked the dying ember's light, When on the hearth it fainted from my sight, With glimmering glow oft redden up again, And sparks crack brightening into life in vain, Still lingering out its kindling hope to rise, Till faint, and fainting, the last twinkle dies

Dim burns the soul, and throbs the fluttering heart, Its painful pleasing feelings to impart, Till by successless sallies wearied quite, The memory fails, and Fancy takes her flight The wick, confined within its socket, dies, Borne down and smothered in a thousand sighs

Clare's Life has been written by Frederick Martin (1865) and J L. Cherry (1873). His books were bought from his widow and ultimately presented to the Northampton Museum Mr Norman Gale edited a selection from his poems in 1902

George Darley (1795-1846), poet and mathematician, was born in Dublin, and educated there at Trinity College Against the wishes of his family he took to literature, and launched himself on London, where in 1822 he published The Errors of Ecstasse, a blank-verse dialogue between a mystic and a muse. He became one of the able band of writers for the Loudon Magazine, started in 1820-'the only clever hand among them,' wrote Charles Lamb in 1825-and in its pages, under the pseudonym of John Lacy, his papers on the English dramatists appeared The same magazine published his best story, Lilian of the Vale, which contains the well-known song, 'I've been roaming' Some other tales were in cluded in the volume of Labours of Idleness, issued under the pseudonym of Guy Perceval in 1826 In 1827 appeared Sylvia, or the May Queen, mentioned by Lamb in one of his letters as a 'very poetical poem' Darley afterwards joined the staff of the Athenæum, where he showed himself a severe and captious critic, notably in a savage onslaught on Talfourd's Ion Always shy and recluse in his habits, he was finally a victim of melancholy and nervous depression His poems Nepenthe and The Lammergeyer were circulated privately, and his latter years saw the publication of two dramas, Thomas à Becket (1840) and Ethelstan (1841) Darley was a man of very various accomplishment-a respectable writer on mathematics as well as a keen and erudite critic. and, within a certain ringe, a true poet. A profound student of the older English literature, he edited Beaumont and Fletcher's plays in 1840, and so greatly was his style influenced by seventeenth-century models that F T Palgrave inserted in the Golden Treasury his beautiful lines beginning, 'It is not Beauty I demand,' as the work of an anonymous writer of that age. His Nepenthe was edited by R A. Streatfield in 1897

The Loveliness of Love

It is not Beauty I demand, A crystal brow, the moon's despair, Nor the snow's daughter, a white hand, Nor mermaid's yellow pride of hair

Tell me not of your starry eyes,
Your lips that seem on roses fed,
Your breasts, where Cupid tumbling lies
Nor sleeps for kissing of his bed —

A bloomy pair of vermeil cheeks Like Hebe's in her ruddiest hours, A breath that softer music speaks Than summer winds a wooing flowers,

These are but gauds—nay, what are hips? Coral beneath the ocean stream, Whose brink when your adventurer slips Full oft he perisheth on them

And what are cheeks but ensigns oft That wave hot youth to fields of blood? Did Helen's breast, though ne'er so soft, Do Greece or Ilium any good?

Eyes can with baleful ardour burn, Poison can breath, that erst perfumed, There's many a white hand holds an urn With lovers' hearts to dust consumed

For crystal brows there's nought within, They are but empty cells for pride, He who the Syren's hair would win Is mostly strangled in the tide.

Give me, instead of Beauty's bust, A tender heart, a loyal mind Which with temptation I would trust, Yet never link'd with error find,—

One in whose gentle bosom I Could pour my secret heart of woes, Like the care burthen'd honey fly That hides his marmurs in the rose,—

My carthly Comforter! whose love So indefeasible might be That, when my spirit wonn'd above, Hers could not stay, for sympathy

Antiquity

Antiquity, thou Titan born 1
That rear'st thee, in stupendous scorn
At all succession, from thy bed
On prime earth's firm foundation spread,
And look'st with dim but settled eye
O'er thy deep lap, within whose span
Layer upon layer sepulchred lie
Whole generations of frail man '

That steady glare not fierce simoom,
Blasting with his hot pinion blinds,
Nor floods of dust thy corse entomb,
Heaped o'er thee by the sexton winds!
Nor temple, tower, nor ponderous town
Built on thy grave can keep thee down,
But still thou rear'st thee in thy seorn,
Antiquity, thou Titan born,
To crush our souls with that dim frown!

(From Nefentke )

A Mystic's Monologue

Why then, when all is still, wilt thou not rest, My soul, and drink th' oblivion of the scene? Is't not the type of man's eternal state? The symbol of futurity—that safe retreat, Which pitiful Mercy gave for all our woes? Why then not just anticipative joy?

Joy '—joy !—what joy ?——Is joy, defect of woe, Such as vacuity of sense affords?——
What joy—if sleep indeed be temporal death,
Its symbol and its type? Sleep is not joy '
'Tis impercipient 1 Certainly Nor woe!
What is it, then? Mental annihilation——
And death, its antitype, is nothing more

Annihilation!—dark!—and everlisting!—
Why, this were well! I could exchange for this O' how I long to throw this passion off!—
And what so prompt? so near? The pilfering breeze,
That robs the scented valley of its sweets
And ravishes the poor, defenceless flowers,
Wing'd by velleity, can scarce o'ersweep
A few poor measures of the earth, in the hour
'Tis swift'st, while I—by a little, little step,
And shrewd addition of the coffin sheet,
To keep me from the shivering touch of earth,
Can pass—from world to world! This is most well.

To stand-thus pimon'd, on the outside brink Of the fool's horror, the dull cave of death, That hides away the fleering heav ns-the gaze Of pitiless liearted pitiers,-to stand-Loaden with weighty griefs and sallow cares, Press'd by misfortines innite and acquired, And ere youth's rose hath summer'd on its stalk. Turn'd to a wretched weed, wither'd and pale, Stung by a venomous blast that bites my core, Sickness-which binds me with an aching erown, Encircling with its drowsy weight my head, Last, Poverty, upon a carrion steed, Cheering his bleak dogs, Hunger and Nakedness, With slaughter red mouths, and sharp, remorseless fangs, To tear my flesh, to strip my liouseless form, Lap my cold blood, and hant me to my grave -To stand, I say -this world upon my back, Galling my un atlantic shoulders, these fell dogs Close at my heels pursuing-and the next Small fluxion of the longitude of time, My burthen hurl'd, back to th' injurious skies, My grim tormentors baffled in the teeth, To rest in senseless quiet, joyless case, In the short compass that a corpse can measure, Laid stretch'd upon th' eternal bed of silence, Pent up in futile boards or chok'd with clay Excellent! Ha! ha! ha! ha! I'll do't! I'll do't!-

-Why, what a fool was I To whine, and weep, and play with tribulation, When th' cure hes in a phial or a pill! Now, now, ye hideous band, ye coward crew, That bend your horrors on a wretch like me, Where's your dominion now? your terrors where? Down with that sceptre, thou tyrannic fool, That sways it o'er my health! Stand back-stand back, Yellow eyed Melancholy and black Despair, The gulf is at your foot! And thou, thin Poverty, Charm off thy dogs, and pull thy courser's neek Down to his knee! Insatinte! what? wilt follow me From you dread cliff that breaks the midway air Into you gorge? Perdition gapes beneath, And stretches wider its immoderate jaws For thee and these.

> Ha! ha! ha! ha! Have I appail'd thee, fiend?

Dar'st thou not follow me?

'Tis well! Begone!
There is your cease There my redemption lies
I'll leap't! though sooty hell should grin beneath,
Or thinder roll above, to shake the Mercy seat!

Ha! what a chain was there! Hell-Thunder-God!-Yes, God 1 God 1 The calculating atheist Who reckons on the sleeping bolts of Heav'n, Under the tremor of whose cloudy bed Minor impiety doth walk unblasted, Whispers 'There is no God'-and trembles There is a God! This truth, the gilded heav'ns, Where numberless immensurable bodies roll, Systems on systems, universe on universe, Each comprehending an ubiquity, And all, swung round the centre of infinity By the dread impulse of Omnipotence-Omnipotence declare! This truth, dumb Earth Speaks out! and Ocean, o'er its undulant flood, O'er roaring eddies swallowing the mad billows, And hollow rocks beaten with resonant echoes, This truth-borne on the plural voice o' the waves-Mountain back'd Ocean, heaving to the shout, Prolongs in doubling thunders round its vasty shores.

Thomas Lovell Beddocs was born at Chf ton, 20th July 1803, the eldest son of a well-known physician, by a sister of Maria Edgeworth From Bath grammar school he passed in 1817 to the Charterhouse, and thence in 1820 to Pembroke College, Oxford In 1821 he published The Improvisatore, which he afterwards sedulously suppressed. and in 1822 The Brides' Tragedy, which attracted some notice, and gained him Bryan Waller Procter's friendship In 1825 he went to Gottingen to study medicine, and thenceforth led a strange wandering life, as doctor and democrat, in Germany and Switzerland, with only three visits to England At Basel, eight months before, he had tried to bleed himself to death, and had in consequence lost a leg, when on 26th January 1849 he poisoned himself with curari-Mr Gosse first revealed the story From 1825 Beddoes was engaged at intervals in the composition of a drama, Death's Jest-book, which, with poems and a Memoir by his friend

T F Kelsall, appeared in two posthumous volumes (1850-51) His dramas exhibit no power of characterisation, no ability in the conduct of a plot, but the fullness of thought and image, the tone of music, and the depth of colour are marvellous 'The power of the man,' said Browning, 'is immense and irresistible.' His lyrics, 'If thou wilt ease thine heart' and 'If there were dreams to sell,' are amongst his triumphs

Wolfram's Dirge

If thon wilt ease thine heart
Of love and all its smart,
Then sleep, dear, sleep,
And not a sorrow
Hang any terr on your eyelashes,
Lie still and deep,
Sad soul, until the sea wave washes
The rim o' the sun to morrow,
In eastern sky

But wilt thou cure thine heart
Of love and all its smart,
Then die, dear, die,
'Tis deeper, sweeter,
Than on a rose bank to lie dreaming
With folded eye,
And there alone, and the beaming
Of Love's stars, thou'lt meet her
In eastern sky

Dream-Pedlary

If there were dreams to sell,
What would you buy?
Some cost a passing bell,
Some a light sigh,
That shakes from Life's fresh crown
Only a rose leaf down
If there were dreams to sell,
Merry and sad to tell,
And the crier rung the bell,
What would you buy?

A cottage lone and still,
With bowers nigh,
Shadowy, my woes to still,
Until I die
Such pearl from Life's fresh crown
Fain would I slinke me down
Were dreams to have at will,
This would best heal my ill,
This would I buy

But there were dreams to sell
Ill didst thou buy,
Life is a dream, they tell,
Waking, to die
Dreaming a dream to prize,
Is wishing ghosts to rise,
And, if I had the spell
To call the buried well,
Which one would I?

If there are ghosts to raise, What shall I call, Out of hell's murky haze, Heaven's blue pall? Raise my loved long lost boy
To lead me to his joy —
There are no ghosts to raise,
Out of death lead no ways,
Vain is the call

Know st thou not ghosts to sue?

No love thou hast
Else he, as I will do,

And breathe thy last
So out of Life's fresh crown
Fall like a rose leaf down

Thus are the ghosts to woo,

Thus are all dreams made true,

Ever to last!

Dirge

No tears, no siglings, no despair,
No trembling dewy smile of care,
No mourning weeds,
Nought that discloses
A heart that bleeds,
But looks contented I will bear,
And o'er my checks strew roses
Unto the world I may not weep,
But save my sorrow all, and keep
A secret heart, sweet soul, for thee,
As the great earth and swelling sea—

A Crocodile

Hard by the lilied Nile I saw
A duskish river-dragon stretched along,
The brown habergeon of his limbs enamelled
With sanguine almandines and rainy pearl
And on his back there lay a young one sleeping,
No bigger than a mouse, with eyes like beads,
And a small fragment of its speckled egg
Remaining on its harmless, pulpy snout,
A thing to laugh at, as it gaped to catch
The baulking, merry flies. In the iron jaws
Of the great devil beast, like a pale soul
Fluttering in rocky hell, lightsomely flew
A snowy troculus, with rosente beak
Tearing the hairy leeches from his throat.

'Bona de Mortuis'

Ay, ay 'good man,' 'kind father,' 'best of friends'— These are the words that grow, like grass and nettles, Out of dead men, and speckled hatreds hide, Like toads, among them

Mr Gosse edited Beddoes s Poems in 1890, and his Letters in 1894.

Robert Montgomery (1807-55) was even in his own time generally known as 'Satan Montgomery,' not from any reflection on his character—for he was a much-respected and beloved clergyman, nor from any presumed affinity with the Satanic school—since he stood at the literary and theological antipodes, but from the ill omened name of his most famous poem, and an amiable desire to distinguish him from the even more universally respected James Montgomery 'Satan' had indeed no hereditary right to the name of Montgomery, having been unfortunate in the circumstances of his birth. The natural son of a clown in the Bath theatre and of a local schoolmistress, he was originally called by his father's name of Gomery till he himself thought well to expand it, for the greater dignity, into the more aristocratic Montgomery, after having begun at a Bath school to distinguish himself by verses that brought him local credit. At seventeen he founded a short-lived weekly paper, at twenty he published The Stage-Coach, a poem, and The Age Reviewed, a satire on his own times Next came The Omnipresence of the Deity (1828), which inside a year ran through eight editions. A volume containing A Universal Prayer, Death, A Vision of Heaven, and A Vision of Hell was treated by Bowles, Crabbe, and Southey as the work of a poet of promise. The Puffiad was accepted as smart sature, the publication of Salan, or Intellect without God (1830), was the crisis of his fortunes The thesis was highly approved by pious people, and the poem ran rapidly through several editions Then arose Macaulay in the might of his wrath, and volunteered to the editor of the Edinburgh Review to do the best satire could accomplish towards annihilating 'a wretched poetaster of the name of Montgomery, who has written some volumes of detestable verses on religious subjects,' which had liad an immense sale through puffing and what we would now call log rolling The review undertaken in this spirit (April 1830) hardly attempted an 'appreciation' of the work, it is remarkable neither for insight nor fair-play But as a characteristic specimen of a scathing exposure of actual dements, Macaulay's skilful and brilli int and effective piece of destructive criticism has become an English classic, and as surely as many of the minor poets of Pope's time are remembered only as they appear in his pillory, so certainly is Robert Montgomery known to new generations by Macaulay's representation of him But it did not at once kill Montgomery's popu The Omnipresence of the Deity reached larity a twenty-eighth edition before the middle of the century, and selections from his works were repeatedly reissued

In the year of the denunciatory review Montgomery went up to Lincoln College and became duly hall marked BA (1833) and MA of Oxford His ordination (1835) and probation as curate were followed by a call to an Episcopal chapel in Glasgow (1836), from 1843 till his death he served a chapel in St Pancras parish. He was a popular preacher, and devoted himself mainly to pastoral and philanthropic work, the only nameworthy poems after Oxford (1831) being The Messiah (1832) and Woman, the Angel of Life, and other Poems (1833)

Montgomery's Devil is unlike Luther's, Milton's, Fielding's, Goethe's, Hauff's, Marie Corelli's, in niany things, and amongst others in that the whole poem of over five thousand lines is one continuous monologue by Satan himself—continuous save for the formal division into three books. And the sentiments, so far from being like what one might expect from the Prince of Darkness, are for the most part eminently worthy of a sound Christian divine, nine-tenths of the opinions put into Satan's mouth are doubtless those actually cherished by Montgomery in his own proper character In the first book Satan takes a hasty survey of the in habited world, from China, Babylonia, and Egypt to America, making a few suitable remarks on each country, partly descriptive, partly critical Spain the Inquisition is commented on unfavourably, in France the excesses of the Revolution, in the United States slavery Only very rarely the Fallen Angel recalls the fact that he had seen better days He somewhat more frequently hints, as in the second book, that he now finds his account in vice and crime, yet in discussing ambition, pride, envy, avaiice, selfishness, vengeance, hypocrisy, and their evil consequences, he says very much what every good man with a turn for blank verse might say. The third book deals more specifically with the seamy side of English civilisation, progress, commerce, and society—with luxury, selfishness, the trampling down of the poor by those in haste to be rich, the vice of the Court, the shallowness and falseness of social circles, and 'the dark mysteries of life,' and only now and again comes a hint that this state of things is more favourable for the schemes of hell than the maintenance in England of a 'paradisal' purity A sketch of the Cication, the fall of man, and the scheme of redemption is given incidentally. Many of the observations are shrewd, the reflections are often relevant and sensible, and the criticisms just. Occasionally there is eloquence and a certain vigour and felicity of expression and rhythmical swing There are occasional passages distantly resembling Thomson's Seasons, and many much in the key of Pollok's Course of Time But the plan involves inevitable tedium, there is material for many, many edifying sermons, a good deal that is (or is very like) poetry, and not a little bathos, intensified by a free use of the 'poetic diction' Wordsworth's soul abhorred, and by such locutions as 'twinkless stars' for stars that are not shining, 'sumless angels' for the innumerable liost, aidless (unaided), kindless (unkind), viewless, tombless, &c. There is endless repetition, sunrise and sunset, twilight and moonlight, are described over and over again, and Montgomery rings the changes on such phrases as 'darkly wild,' 'fiercely wild,' &c In the dedication he hopes his song may 'not unawake a gentle sigh' Yet there are many passages that explain how Satan passed through many editions while the Course of Time was still popular

Satan's View of England.

Heaven favour'd land of grandeur, and of gloom, Of mountain pomp, and majesty of hills, Though other climates boast, in thee supreme A beauty and a gentleness abound,

Here all that can soft worship elaim, or tone
The sweet sobriety of tender thought,
Is thine—the sky of blue intensity,
Or charm'd by sunshine into pieture clouds,
That make bright landscapes when they blush abroad,—
The dingle grey, and wooded copse, with hut
And hamlet, nestling in the bosky vale,
And spires brown pecping o'er the ancient elms,
And steepled cities, faint and far away,
With all that bird and meadow, brook and gale,
Impart,—are mingled for admiring eyes
That love to banquet on thy blissful scene

Satan describes the Sunset

But lo I the day declines, and to his throne The sun is wheeling What a world of pomp The heavens put on in homage to his power ! Romance hath never hung a richer sky,-Or sea of sunshine, o'er whose aureate deep Triumphal barks of beauteous foam career, As though the clouds held festival, to hail Their god of glory to his western home And now the earth is mirror'd on the skies ! While lakes and valleys, drown'd in dewy light, And rich delusions, dazzlingly array'd, Form, float, and die in all their phantom joy At length the Sun is throned, but from his face A flush of beauty o'er Creation flows, That brightens into rapturous farewell ! Then faints to paleness, for the day hath sunk Beneath the waters, dash'd with ruby dyes, And Twilight in her nun like meekness comes, The air is fragrant with the soul of flowers, The breeze comes panting like a child at play, While birds, day worn, are couched in leafy bowers, And, calm as clouds, the sunken billows sleep The dimness of a dream o'er Nature steals. Yet hallows it, a hush'd enchantment reigns, The mountains to a mass of mellowing shade Are turn'd, and stand like temples of the night, While field and forest, fading into gloom, Depart, and myers whisper sounds of fear -A dying pause, as if th' Almighty moved In shadow o'er his works, hath solemnised The world I-

An English National Rejoicing

How gloriously the festive bells resound! Pealing their gladness through the azure night, As though the triumph of ten thousand hearts. In full voiced chorus shook the starry air, And made it joyous music! Now they swell Aloft, in one tempestuous wave of sound, Then faintly die, like war notes on the wind, Then on again! with an ecstatic roar, Thrilling the empire with a brave delight

England hath laul her sceptre on the deep, And with her thunder chased her ocean foes Lake leaves before the breathing of a blast! England hath rear'd her banners on the plain Of battle, Victory waved them, and the world Again shall echo with her haughty name And hence a stormy rapture shakes the isie, Hence the loud music of her hollow fanes, Whether in cities emulously tower'd Among the skies, or in lone hamlets seen,—

Still pouring out the language of the land, With all, those pregentries, and fiery pomps. That hang and glitter from her window'd piles, Emblazed with mottoes, and triumphal scenes.

Not one to whom the name of country clings With spelling fondness but this hour adores. The old men feel the sunshine of far youth Returning, fresh as when the hero glow'd. The young,—hip, eye, and daring heart, are stirr'd, Their very blood seems rippled with delight, So deep the fullness of this warlike joy. Yea, hollow checks of Sadness, and the brows Of Poverty, and lean faced Want itself, Forget their nature in a share of fame.

The Other Side

Hither, thou frantic Bacchanal ! whose voice Rings loudest, stand upon the hoof scarr'd heath, And say if Heaven on such a scene can smile Here, deep as in thine own crulting land, Night reigns, but not with noon like azurc crown'd, While starry sympathics, all gaily bright, Look down on gladness but with sullen calm, Where Weariness hath toned the wind, and stars Are monraful watchers o'er the trodden dead, In tombless havoc weltering on the plain Each heart that's cold, to other hearts was chain'd, Whose links were out of years of fondness framed. Each eye, now darken'd with celipsing death, Once beam'd the sun of happiness and home, Each of the dead hath flung a shade o'er life, Henceforth to be a feast for agony Mark where the moon her glimm'ring languor throws, What death romance! what visions of the slun !-One calmly brow'd, as though his native trees Had waved their beauty o'er his dying head, Another marred with agonising lines, And dreams of home, yet ling'ring in his face. Now go, and sing the splendour of the war l Go, tell the fortress of the brave and free, How beautiful her patriotic roar Of Victory, shouting o er the new made dead, Like Madness, when she hoots a murderous joy So shall a war fame flourish ever green, And laurell'd History be trumpet tongued, To fire Ambition with a bloody thirst, And keep the world a slaughter house for man l

Satan in London

But hail, thou city giant of the world! Thou that dost seom a canopy of clouds, But in the dimness of eternal smoke For ever rising like an ocean steam, Dost mantle thine immensity, how vast And wide thy wonderful array of domes, In dusky masses staring nt the skies ! Time was, and dreary solitude was here, When night black woods, unvisited by man, In howling conflict wrestled with the winds. But now, the storm roll of immingled life Is heard, and, like a roaring furnace, fills With living sound the airy reach of miles! Thou more than Rome! for never from her hearf Such universe awaking spirit pour'd As emanates from thine The mighty globe Is fever'd by thy name, a thousand years,

And silenec hath not known thee 1 What n weight Of awfulness will doomsday from thy scenc Derive, and when the blasting trumpet smites All cities to destruction, who will sink Sublime, with such a thunder crash as thou 1

Myriads of domes, and temples huge, or high, And thickly wedded, like the ineient trees. That in unviolated forests frown, Myriads of streets, whose river windings flow. With viewless billows of unweary sound, Myriads of hearts in full commotion mix'd, From morn to noon, from noon to night again, Through the wide realm of whirling passion borne,—And there is London, Lingland's heart and soul. By the proud flowing of her famous Thames. She circulates through countless lands and isles. Her greatness, gloriously she rules, At once the awe and sceptre of the world.

Satan describes the Opera.

The second are a sensual tribe, Convened to hear romantic harloss sing On forms to banquet a lascinious gaze, While the bright perfidy of wanton eyes Through brain and spirit darts delicious fire.

Satan sympathises

In n lone chamber, on a tatter'd couch A dying printer lies His brow shows young And noble, lines of beanty on his face Yet linger, in his cyc of passion gloams A soul, and on his check a spirit light Is playing, with that proud sublimity Of thought, that yields to death but gives to Time A Fame that will avenge his wrongs, and write Their history in her canonised roll Of martyrs -be it for his epitaph, He lived for genius, and for genius died l So sad and lone '-wall'd in by misery, With none to smooth his couch, or shed the tear That softens pain,-uncheer'd, unwept, unknown, And famish'd by the want of many days,-Hither, Ambition, wisdom breathes in woc

The Felon's Death.

To die

A malefretor's derth,—to be the gaze,
The damned, hideous, and detested gaze
Of thousands, staring out their hungry eyes
To glut their wonder, while on tiptoe placed,
To see the spirit gasping from his throat,
And chronicle his agony, to live
A ballad hero, in the creaking rhymes
Of vagabonds, and have his felon name
From hip to hip thus vilely bandied out,
For vingar warning,—O ye sinless days
Of childhood, O ye hours of love and home,
And summer dreams, by hannted wood or wild,
And blessings nightly murmur d from the hip
Of parents,—glory of remember'd days!

Of Macaulay's famous review fully a half concerns dishonest reviewers and reviewing io general. In the other he seeks rather laboriously to coovict Monigomery of plagransing from Dryden Pope, Crabbe, Campbell, Scott, and Byroo, does certainly not quote his best passages, and contemptoously and somewhat hyper critically dissects his mixed metaphors and bombastic phrases.

Thomas Haynes Bayly (1797-1839), author of 'We met-'twas in a Crowd,' and hundreds of other popular songs, was the son of a wealthy Bath lawyer, had earls and baronets for cousins, and, as his biographer expressly says, 'was nurtured in the lap of luxury' From Winchester he passed into his father's office, then spent three years at Oxford with a vague view to the Church, but in 1826 married a pretty Irish wife and became a popular poet. Unhappily his own fortune and his wife's were sunk in unprofitable speculations he had to live by literature, and wrote too much, sometimes manifestly against the grain, and spite of his popularity, misfortune and ill health dogged his steps in his later years 'I'd be a Butterfly' was one of his first successes, The Aylmers and A Legend of Killarney were his principal stories in prose Of his thirty-six dramatic pieces, a few may yet be read with a little patience, but even Perfection, produced by Madame Vestris, is forgotten-still more The Proof of the Pudding and Tom Noddy's Secret But most people familiar with collections of 'Standard English Songs' carry in their heads a small anthology of his lyrics-'The Soldier's Tear,' 'She wore a Wreath of Roses,' 'O no, we never mention her,' 'We met-'twas in a Crowd,' 'Gaily the Troubadour touclied his Guitar,' Shades of Evening, close not o'er us,' 'I'm saddest when I sing,' 'Lilla's a Lady,' 'I'll hang my Harp on a Willow Tree,' and 'The Misletoe Bough' He was probably the most successful song-writer of the age next to Moore—his songs and short poems count by hundreds, for some of his songs he composed the tunes (notably 'The Troubadour' and 'We met') But Sir Henry Bishop set about a hundred and twenty of them to music, and other distinguished and popular composers—Balfe, Sir John Stevenson, Callcott, Barnett, J P Knight, C E Horn, T Cooke-were glad to associate their melodies with his verse. Some of his best were translated into Latin (by Archdeacon Wrangham), French, German, Spanish, and Italian Yet the bulk of his songs are now unsung and unread, and there are well-appointed modern libraries that have no copy of the poems of one whom a contemporary French critic pronounced the English Anacreon In many, doubtless, spite of unmistakable definess, metrical ease, and sprightliness, the sentiment was too sentimental, the ecstasy of joy and grief a shade conven tional even when it was the expression of a real and sincere feeling Of his innumerable society verses, the titles and subjects show that the interest was trifling, the wit forced or commonplace-'This is my eldest Daughter, sir,' 'My Wife is very musical,' 'Not at Home,' 'I must come out next Spring, Mamma,' 'The Black-ball'd Man,' 'The Old Bachelor,' and the persistage about rouging, false teeth, elegant shoes and corns, the effect of dances and of seasickness on ladies' complexions, is a little tire some, and at times not quite impeccable on the score of good taste. Prayers, elegies, verses, and other like solemnities are rarely but oddly mixed on the same page with jingles about county balls, picnics, Lord and Lady Hogsnorton, and other frivolities. But there is a vein of real and stern satire in 'The Absentee,' written against heartless Irish landlords in the time of the Famine.

And own that Erin is too fair for thee, Deserter! Renegade! and Absentee!

and the pathos, tenderness, and and serious reflection, are often, but not always, quite genuine, spontaneous, and natural, though seldom able to stir other hearts

Old Age sits bent on his Iron-gray Steed.

Old age sits bent on his iron gray steed.
Youth rides erect on his courser black.
And little he thinks, in his reckless speed.
Old age comes on in the very same track!
Though one seems strong as the forest tree,
The other infirm and winning breath,
If ever youth baffles old age, 'twill be
By rushing into the arms of death

And youth will quaff, and youth will feast,
His lagging foe he il still deride,
Until, when he expects him least,
Old age and he stand side by side
He then looks into his toilet glass,
And sees old age reflected there,
He cries, 'Alas' how quickly pass
Bright eyes, and bloom, and riven har!

Of what is the Old Man thinking?

Of what is the old man thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff?

From the midday pastime shrinking,
He shares not the merry laugh
But the tears of the old man flow,
As he looks on the young and gay
And his gray head, moving slow,
Keeps time to the air they play
The elder around are drinking,
But not one cup will he quaff,
Oh! of what is the old man thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff?

'Tis not with a vain repining
That the old man sheds a tear,
'Tis not for his strength declining
He sighs not to linger here
There's a spell in the air they play,
And the old man's eyes are dim,
For it calls up a past May day,
And the dear friends lost to him
From the seene before him shrinking,
I'rom the dance and the merry laugh,
Of their calm repose he is thinking
As he leans on his oaken staff

Lord Harry has written a Novel

Lord Harry has written a Novel,
A story of elegrnt life
No stuff about love in a hovel,
No sketch of a commoner's wife

No trash such as pathos and passion, Fine feelings, expression, and wit, But all about people of fashion Come look at his caps, how they fit

Oh Radcliffe! thou once wert the charmer
Of girls who sat reading all night,
Thy heroes were striplings in armour,
Thy heroines damsels in white
But past are thy terrible touches,
Our lips in derision we curl,
Unless we are told how a Duchess Convers'd with her cousin the Earl.

We now have each dialogue quite full
Of titles—'I give you my word,
My Lady, you're looking delightful,'
'Oh dear' do you think so, my Lord?'
'You've lieard of the Marquis's marriage,
The bride with her jewels new set,
Four horses, new travelling carriage,
And defented a la fourchette'

Haut Ton finds her privacy broken,
We trace all her inns and her outs,
The very small talk that is spoken
By very great people at routs.
At Tenby Miss Jinks asks the loan of
The book from the Innkeeper's wife,
And reads till she dreams she is one of The leaders of elegant life

Bayly s works were edited by his widow, with a Memoir (2 vols. 1844), and see Andrew Lang's Essays in Little (1891).

John Abercromble (1780-1844), after Dr Gregory's death the chief consulting physician in Scotland, secured extraordinary credit as an author by two works on The Intellectual Powers (1830) and The Moral Feelings (1833), without psychological value or philosophical insight, but substantially 'sound' and enlivened by illustrations from pathological mental cases The son of one of the ministers of Aberdeen, he studied there and at Edinburgh, where from 1804 onwards he rose to eminence in his profession. He wrote also books on the pathology of the brain and Treatle

Sir David Brewster (1781-1868), born at Jedburgh, was educated for the Church of Scotland at the University of Edinburgh, but his nervousness disqualifying him for a clerical career, he became editor in 1802 of the Edinburgh Maga zine, and in 1808 of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia He was already deep in optics, the kaleidoscope was invented by him in 1816, and in 1843 and 1844 he improved Wheatstone's cumbrous stereoscope by means of refracting lenses of the chief originators of the British Association (1831), in 1815 he was elected FRS and Copley medallist, in 1818 the Rumford medal was awarded him for his discoveries on the polarisation of light, in 1832 he was knighted, and had a pension conferred upon him, in 1838 he was appointed Principal at St Andrews, in 1849 he was elected a foreign associate of the French Institute, and he was Principal of Edinburgh University from 1859 till the last year of his life Among his works were an edition of Legendre's Geometry, translated by Thomas Carlyle (1822), the standard Life of Newton (1828, enlarged ed. 1855), Letters on Natural Magic, addressed to Sir Walter Scott (1831), Martyrs of Science (1841), More Worlds than One (1854), and treatises on the kaleidoscope and various subjects in optics The Home Life of Brewster, by his daughter, Mrs Gordon (1869, 3rd ed. 1881), is a worthy monument to him

Michael Faraday (1791-1867) was born, a blacksmith's son, at Newington Butts near London, and at thirteen was apprenticed to a bookbinder He began early to make experiments in chemistry and electricity, and, attending Sir Humphry Davy's lectures, took notes which he transmitted to Sir Humphry, desiring his assistance to 'escape from trade and enter into the service of science.' By Day he was appointed chemical assistant in the Royal Institution in 1813, in 1827 he succeeded to Davy's chair of Chemistry there, and he was made FRS in 1824, DCL in 1832 In 1831 the first series of his Experimental Researches in Electricity and Physics was read before the Royal Society—a work which was continued to 1856 For many years he gave lectures at the Royal Institution, eminently popular from the happy simplicity of his style and his successful illustrations, in spite of the fact that the subjects were far from simple or at first sight attractive. He was not merely one of the greatest of discoverers in the realm of physics, but one of the most successful popularisers of science, and well deserved the pension granted in 1835. He was a simple, gentle, cheerful man of genius, a Sandemanian of strong religious feeling and unassuming manners. Tyndall pronounced Faraday the greatest experi mental philosopher the world has ever seen, and classified his principal discoveries under four heads-magno electric induction, the cliemical phenomena of the current, the magnetisation of light ('which,' said Tyndall, 'I should liken to tlie Weisshorn among mountains-high, beautiful, and alone'), and diamagnetism. Other physicists credit him with at least a dozen discoveries of the first importance in these departments of research In Faraday's opinion, it required twenty years of work to make a man in physical science, the previous period being one of infancy lecturing before a private society on the element chlorine, Faraday made a memorable remark Before leaving this subject I will point out the history of this substance, as an answer to those who are in the habit of saving to every new fact, "What is its use?" Dr Franklin says to such, "What is the use of an infant?" The answer of the experimentalist is, "Endeavour to make it useful.", Among his famous works were his lectures on The Non-metallic Elements and The

Chemical History of a Candle, and the profound treatise on The Various Forces in Nature

From 'The Chemical History of a Candle'

What is all this process going on within us which we cannot do without, either day or night, which is so provided for by the Author of all things that He has arranged that it shall be independent of all will? If we restrain our respiration, as we can to a certain extent, we should destroy ourselves. When we are asleep, the organs of respiration, and the parts that are associated with them, still go on with their action, so necessary is this process of respiration to us, this contact of air with the lungs. I must tell you, in the briefest possible manner, what this process is. We consume food the food goes through that strange set of vessels and organs within us, and is brought into various parts of the system, into the digestive parts especially, and alternately the portion which is so changed is carried through our lungs by one set of vessels, while the air that we inhalc and exhale is drawn into and thrown out of the lungs by another set of vessels, so that the air and the food come close together, separated only by an exceedingly thin surface the air can thus act upon the blood by this process, producing precisely the same results in kind as we have seen in the case of the candle. The candle combines with parts of the air, forming carbonic acid, and evolves heat, so in the lungs there is this curious, wonderful change taking place The air entering, com bines with the carbon (not carbon in a free state, but, as in this case, placed ready for action at the moment), and makes carbonic acid, and is so thrown out into the atmosphere, and thus this singular result takes place we may thus look upon the food as fuel Let me take that piece of sugar, which will serve my purpose. It is a compound of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, similar to a candle, as containing the same elements, though not in the same proportion [The figures were shown in a table.] This is indeed a very curious thing, which you can well remember, for the oxygen and hydrogen are in exactly the proportions which form water, so that sugar may be said to be compounded of 72 parts of carbon and 99 parts of water, and it is the carbon in the sugar that combines with the oxygen carried in by the air in the process of respiration, so making us like candles, producing these actions, warmth, and far more wonderful results besides, for the sustenance of the system, by a most beautiful and simple process. To make this still more striking, I will take a little sugar, or to hasten the experiment I will use some syrup, which contains about three fourths of sugar and a little water If I put a little oil of vitriol on it, it takes away the water, and leaves the carbon in a black mass You see how the carbon is coming out, and before long we shall have a solid mass of charcoal, all of which has come out Sugar, as you know, is food, and here we have absolutely a solid lump of carbon where you would not have expected it. And if I make arrangements so as to oxidise the carbon of sugar, we shall have a much more striking result. Here is sugar, and I have here an oxidiser-a quicker one than the atmosphere, and so we shall oxidise this fuel by a process different from respiration in its form, though not different in its kind It is the combustion of the carbon by the contact of oxygen which the body has supplied to it. If I set this into action at once, you will see combustion produced

Just what occurs in my lungs—taking in oxygen from another source, namely, the atmosphere—takes place here by a more rapid process

You will be astonished when I tell you what this curious play of carbon amounts to A candle will burn some four, five, six, or seven hours What, then, must be the daily amount of carbon going up into the air in the way of carbonic acid! What a quantity of carbon must go from each of us in respiration! What a won derful change of carbon must take place under these circumstances of combustion or respiration! A man in twenty four hours converts as much as seven ounces of carbon into carbonic acid, a milch cow will convert seventy ounces, and a horse seventy nine ounces, solcly by the act of respiration. That is, the horse in twenty four hours burns seventy nine ounces of charcoal, or carbon, in his organs of respiration, to supply his natural warmth in that time. All the warm blooded animals get their warmth in this way, by the conversion of carbon, not in a free state, but in a state of combina tion. And what an extraordinary notion this gives us of the alterations going on in our atmosphere! As much as five million pounds, or 548 tons, of carbonic acid is formed by respiration in London alone in twenty four hours And where does all this go? Up into the air If the carbon had been like the lead which I showed you, or the iron which, in burning, produces a solid substance, what would happen? Combustion could not go on. As charcoal burns it becomes a vapour, and passes off into the atmosphere, which is the great vehicle, the great carrier for conveying it away to other places. Then what becomes of it? Wonderful is it to find that the change produced by respiration, which seems so injurious to us (for we cannot breathe air twice over). is the very life and support of plants and vegetables that grow upon the surface of the earth. It is the same also under the surface, in the great bodies of water, for fishes and other animals respire upon the same principle, though not exactly by contact with the open air

The standard Life was that by Dr Bence Jones (2 vols 1870), Professor Tyndall had already issued Faraday as a Discoverer (1868 5th ed 1894), Dr J H Gladstone produced a monograph in 1872, and there is a more recent one-volume Life of Faraday by Professor Sylvanus P Thompson (1899)

Sir John Herschel-in full, Sir John Frederick William Herschel (1792-1871)-was the son of that Sir William Herschel who, born in Hanover, came to England as oboist in the band of the Hanoverian Guards, and settling at Bath as organist and music teacher, became a very dis tinguished astronomer, was made astronomer to George III, discovered Uranus and the satellites of Saturn, and added greatly to our knowledge of the nebulæ and the double stars Sir William was assisted in his work with his monster telescope at Slough, and in his great catalogue of stars, by his sister Caroline Lucretia (1750-1848), a most remarkable woman Sir John, born at Slough, was educated at Eton and St John's, Cambridge, where in 1813 he was senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman In 1822 he applied himself especially to astronomy, and helped to re examine the nebulæ and clusters of stars in his fither's catalogues, reporting to the Royal Society observations on 525 nebulæ, clusters of stars, and double stars not noticed by his father His treatises on Sound and Light appeared in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana (1830-31), his Astronomy (1831) and Natural Philosophy in Lardner's Cyclopædia The Astronomy was the most successful attempt that had till then been made to simplify and popularise the study of the science, and was long the standard college manual. In 1834 he visited the Cape to examine the southern celestial hemisphere, the results (1847) completed a survey of the heavens begun in 1825. Made successively a knight, a baronet, and a DCL of Oxford, he was Master of the Mint in 1850-55, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His articles on Meteorology, Physical Geography, and the Telescope, contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, were published separately, and his Popular Lectures and Collected Addresses made him well known to the 'general reader' A distinguished chemist, he attained important results in photography and made valuable researches on the undulatory theory of light. He had a lively interest in poetry, and he translated from Schiller and from the Iliad See Miss Clarke's The Herschels (1896)

Isaac Taylor (1787–1865), a copious and popular author on religious philosophy and other subjects, was the son of Isaac of Ongar (see page 174), and assisted him while he was yet an engraver. His bent, however, was literary, he read largely in patristic theology and in philosophy, by 1818 was on the staff of the Eclectic Review, and in 1822 published a small work on The Elements of Thought. He lived to be a valued contributor to Good Words in the second half of the nineteenth century, and published over a score of works, of which the first really successful one was The Natural History of Enthusiasm, published anonymously in 1829 It dealt with a variety of contemporary problems in religion, social conditions, and politics, reached a tenth edition in 1845, and was followed by The Natural History of Fanaticism (1833), Spiritual Despotism, The Physical Theory of Another Life, Ultimate Civilisation, and books against the Tractarian position, against the Essays and Reviews, on Jesuitism, on Methodism, and on The Spirit of Hebrito Poetry Jane Taylor and Ann were his sisters (see page 174), and his son, Canon Israc Taylor (1829-1901), was also an industrious writer, on such subjects especially as Words and Places (1864), The Alphabet (1883), The Origin of the Aryans (1890), as well as on the Memorials of the Taylor Family of Ongar (1867)

Monkery

The ancient monkers was a system of the most de liberate selfishness That solicitude for the preservation of individual interests which forms the basis of the human constitution is so broken up and counteracted by the claims and pleasures of domestic life that, though the principle remains, its manifestations are suppres ed and its predominance effectually prevented, except in some few tempers peculiarly unsocial But the anchoret is a selfist by his very profession, and like the sensualist, though his taste is of another kind, he pursues his personal gratification, reekless of the welfare of others. His own advantage or delight, or-to use his favourite phrase-the good of his soul, is the sovereign object of his cares. His meditations, even if they embrace the compass of heaven, come round ever and again to find their ultimate issue in his own bosom, but can that be true wisdom which just ends at the point whence it started? True wisdom is a progressive principle abjuring the use of the active faculties, in reducing him self by the spell of vows to a condition of physical and moral annihilation, the insulated says to his fellows, con cerning whatever might otherwise have been converted to their benefit, 'It is eorban,' thus making void the law of love to our neighbour by a pretended intensity of love to God That so monstrous an immorality should have dared to call itself by the name of Sanctity, and should have done so, too, in front of Cliristianity, is indeed amazing, and could never have happened if Christianity had not first been shorn of its life giving warmth, as the sun is deprived of its power of heat when we ascend into the rarity of upper space. The tendency of a taste for imaginative indulgences to petrify the heart has been already adverted to, and it receives a signal illustration in the monkish life, especially in its more perfect form of absolute separation from the society of man The anchoret was a disjoined particle, frozen deep into the mass of his own selfishuess, and there embedded, below the touch of every human sympathy This sort of meditative insulation is the ultimate and natural issue of all enthusiastic piety, and may be met with even in our own times, among those who have no inclination to run away from the comforts of common (From The Natural History of Enthusiasm)

Sir William Hamilton (1788-1856), Scottish philosopher, was born at Glasgow, where his father and grandfather held the chairs of Anatomy and Botany, in 1816 he made good his hereditary claim to the old baronetcy which Sir Robert Hamilton of Preston, the commander of the Covenanters at Bothwell Bridge, had abandoned in 1688, rather than take the oath of allegiance After gaining high distinction at to William III Glasgow University, he went in 1809 to Balliol College as Snell exhibitioner, and graduated in 1810 He was called to the Scottish Bar in 1813, but had almost no practice, in 1820 he stood unsuccessfully for the chair of Moral Philosophy in Edinburgh, being defeated by Professor Wilson (see below), next year he became Professor of History 1829 he published in the Edinburgh Review a famous critique of Cousin's doctrine of the Infi nite, this and other articles were collected in 1852 as Discussions in Philosophy and Literature In 1836 he was appointed Professor of Logic and Metaphysics, Isaac Taylor being an unsuccessful candidate, and on these subjects he lectured in alternate years till the end of his life, gathering around him enthusiastic disciples. His lectures were published in 1859-61 by Mansel and Veitch, his principal work was his edition of Reid (1846, with notes 1862), defending what he believed to be Reid's sound philosophical doctrine of commonsense. Ill health diminished his power of work, but he edited Dugald Stewart's works in 1854-55, and was generally able with an assistant to perform the duties of his class till his death Hamilton began, as Veitch said, the spring time of a new life in Scottish philosophical thought. Vastly more learned than his predecessors, Hamilton studied with equal zeal ancient Greek and Roman, medieval and modern German, He made it his busithought and speculation ness to maintain and, as he thought, complete the traditional Scottish doctrines, derived from Reid and Dugald Stewart, with the help of the limit ing or negative results of the Kantian critique of knowledge Whether this eclectic method was capable of developing a self consistent system may be disputed, but Hamilton gave a great impulse to philosophical thought in Britain He made some contributions to psychology and logic-the quan tification of the predicate' one of them, but in essentials his philosophy is a strenuous assertion of the relativity of human knowledge and the impossibility of reaching a coherent metaphysical view of the universe Scottish philosophy has never produced anything like a real or complete metaphysical system-so far is it from being the case that Scotsmen are naturally metaphysicians In Scotland theological dogma-predestination, teleology, and the like-largely took the place of metaphysics, and philosophy remained mainly inductive, attaining many valuable results both in psychology and morals. In its recoil from the 'ideal system' of Berkeley as extended by Hume to sceptical assues, Scottish philosophy was too well content to appeal in all difficulties to 'the testimony of consciousness'-1 short and easy method which neither convinced opponents nor secured continuity and completeness for the rational element in mental activity The Scottish 'natural dualism' which rightly maintains, against subjective idealism, that the non-ego or object is given in knowledge, is apt to degenerate, and does usually 'degenerate into a crude metaphysical dualism of mind and matter as two heterogeneous substances ' Hamilton cannot be regarded as having harmonised the discrepancies of Reid or his other predecessors of the Scottish School Dean Mansel carried Hamilton's doctrine of relativity into the theological sphere by denying the possibility of knowing God, and M'Cosh and others tried to rescue the time honoured doctrines of the Scottish School from patent agnosticism But Hamilton, greeted in his time as a great and original thinker, is now without a following, though he remains the most accomplished and the last notable representative of the Scotch philosophy

John Wilson, better known as Christopher North and chief of the 'Blackwood group' than as Professor of Moral Philosophy or poet, was born on the 18th of May 1785, in Paisley, where his father was a wealthy manufacturer. At thirteen the boy was entered of Glasgow University, whence, in 1803, he was transferred to Migdalen College, Oxford Here he was distinguished for his varied intellectual gifts, but even more for his magnificent physique and unparalleled athletic accomplishments. After four years' resi dence at Oxford, having in 1797, on the death of his father, become master of £50,000, he purchased the estate of Elleray, overlooking Win dermere, where he went to live He married, built a house, kept a yacht and boats, enjoyed himself among the magnificent scenery of the lakes, wrote poetry, wrestled and jumped with the dalesmen, and cultivated the society of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, and De Quincey youth, robust health, fortune, and an exhaustless imagination, Wilson must, in such a spot, line been blest even up to the dreams of a poet reverses came, his fortune melted away under unjust stewardship, and, after entering himself of the Scottish Bar, he sought and obtained the Moral Philosophy chair-on the strength rather of his multifarious accomplishments and his Tork politics than for his philosophic temper or profundity (Sir William Hamilton being a defeated candidate) By fir his most characteristic work was done for Blackwood's Magazine He was a notable contributor from the beginning in 1817.

and after Lockhart's removal to London in 1826 he became the leading spirit and mainspring of Maga, though not formally called its editor Here he had an admirable vehicle for his extraordinary and exuberant wealth of ideas on all As the presiding genius of the manner of topics Noctes Ambrosiana-assumed to be records of festive gatherings at Ambrose's tavern in Gabriel's Road, with the Ettrick Shepherd and others as convives—he was clearly more in his element than in the professorial desk. Of the seventy one Noctes, forty one were reprinted in his works as Wilson's own When the series began Lockhart was often the author or part-author, sometimes Maginn, and Hogg had, or was allowed to suppose he had, a large share in them, latterly they fell more and more entirely to Wilson, who wrote with extraordinary facility and copiousness Between 1826 and 1852 he contributed over three hundred articles to Blackwood For one number in especial Mrs Oliphant reports him to have written fifty-six out of one hundred and forty-two pages

The contrast between the professor of ethics and the gymnast and cock fighter was not more marked than was the contrast between John Wilson, poet and romancer, and Christopher North, critic and miscellaneous writer In Maga 'Kit North' was a trenchant, and even savage, reviewer and satirist, a humourist vehement, rollicking, and reckless, audacious and luxuriant in diction, at times startling with gleams of profound insight, but often utterly obtuse, per erse, defiant of courtesy, good taste, and good sense. His humour is constantly strained to burlesque and tedious extravaganza, or even degenerates no mere buffoonery He was often generous, but could be unkind and unfair, in a single number of the Noctes he carped at Wordsworth (whom he had been one of the first to praise) and belittled Scott, while he not so unjustly called a less known author a jackass The criticisms sometimes evoked vivacious replies Tennyson's to 'Crusty Christo pher' is well known The outstanding defect, on the other hand, of his poetry (The Isle of Palms, 1812, The City of the Plague, 1816) and of his prose tales (The Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life, 1822, The Trials of Margaret Lyndsay, 1823, The Foresters, 1825) is that he is too uni formly gentle, sweet, tender, pathetic, sentimental. 'Almost the only passions,' or even mankish said Jeffrey, 'with which his poetry is conversant are the gentler sympathies of our nature-tender compassion, confiding affection, and guiltless sor-From all these there results, along with a most touching and tranquillising sweetness, a certain monotony and languor, which to those who read poetry for amusement merely will be apt to appear like dullness, and must be felt as a defect by all who have been used to the variety, rapidity, and energy of the popular poetry of the day? In the twenty-four short tales called Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life we find neither the humours of the kailyard nor the characteristics of a vigorous, shrewd, and self-assertive peasantry, with all the defects of their qualities, but a too utterly Arcadian innocence, simplicity, and piets So likewise in Margaret Lyndsay, the heroine is a humble maiden, whose father, adopting Tom Paine's opinions, is imprisoned on a charge of sedi tion, becomes an utter reprobate, and elopes with the mistress of a brother-reformer—to the gradual ruin and distress of his innocent family, and their banishment from their country home to a city slum Of the strongly contrasted, Bohemian Nocles—now to many all but unreadable—Lord Cockburn said 'There is not so original and curious a work in the English and Scotch languages It is a most singular and delightful outpouring of criticism, politics, and descriptions of feeling, character, and scenery of verse and prose, and maudlin eloquence, and especially of wild fun. It breathes the very essence of the bacchanalian revel of clever men, and its Scotch is the best Scotch that has been written in modern times' But it should be added that the Scotch is that of men with a literary training, abounding in doctored English book-words never heard in the vernacular of the Lowlands attained to extraordinary eminence in the republic of letters in his own lifetime, Hallam called him a writer of the most ardent and enthusiastic genius, whose eloquence was as the rush of mighty waters But while his personality is still remembered, even in Scotland the Noctes have lost their extraordinary popularity, the tales are little read, and the poetry quite forgotten In 1837 Wilson was sore stricken by the death of his wife, in 1840 he suffered from a paralytic affection of the right hand, though he still retained his passion for angling, for Tweed and Yarrow, and for the wilder scenery of Rannoch In 1851, when his health was and Loch Ane fairly broken, and he had resigned his professorship, he got a pension of £300 per annum, and he died in Edinburgh on the 3rd of April 1854

From Lines 'To a Sleeping Child.'

Art thou a thing of mortal birth, Whose happy home is on our earth? Does human blood with life imbue Those wandering veins of heavenly blue That stray along thy forehead fair, Lost 'mid a gleam of golden hair? Oh, can that light and airy breath Steal from a being doomed to death, Those features to the grave be sent In sleep thus mutely eloquent? Or art thou, what thy form would seem, The phantom of a blessed dream?

Oh that my spirit's eye could see
Whence burst those gleams of ecstasy!
That light of dreaming soul appears
To play from thoughts above thy years.
Thou smil'st as if thy soul were sorring
To heaven, and heaven's God adoring!
And who can tell what visions high
May bless an infant's sleeping eye?

What brighter throne can brightness find To reign on than an infant's mind, Ere sin destroy or error dim The glory of the scraphim?

Oh, vision fair, that I could be Again as young, as pure as thee! Vain wish! the runbow's radiant form May view, but cannot brave the storm Years can bedim the gorgeous dyes That paint the bird of Paradise And years, so fate hath ordered, roll Clouds o'er the summer of the soul. Thir was that face as break of dawn, When o'er its beauty sleep was drawn Like a thin veil that half concealed The light of soul, and half revealed While thy hushed heart with visions wrought, Each trembling eyelash moved with thought, And things we dream, but ne'er can speak, Like clouds came floating o'er thy cheek, Such summer clouds as travel light, When the soul's heaven hes calm and bright, Till thou awok'st-then to thine eye Thy whole heart leapt in ecstasy ! And lovely is that heart of thine, Or sure these eyes could never shine With such a wild yet bashful glee,

Gay, half o'ercome timidity I

Springs, summers, autumns, winters-each within itself longer, by many times longer than the whole year of grown up life, that slips at last through one's fingers like a knotless thread—pass over the enried darling's brow, and look at him now, a straight and strengthy stripling, in the savinge spirit of sport, spring ing over rock ledge after rock ledge, nor heeding aught as he plashes knce deep or waistband high through river feeding torrents, to the glorious music of his run ning and ringing reel, after a tongue hooked salmon, insancly seeking with the ebb of tide, but all in vain, the white breakers of the ser No hazel or willow wand, no half crown rod of ash framed by village wright, is now in his practised hands, of which the very left is dexter ous, but a twenty feet rod of Phin's, all ring rustling, and a glitter with the preserving mraish, limber as the attenuating line itself, and lithe to its topmost tenuity as the elephant's proboscis—the luccory and the horn with out twist, knot, or flaw-from butt to fly a faultless taper, 'fine by degrees and beautifully less,' the beau ideal of a rod by the skill of cunning eriftsmin to the senses materialised! A fish-fat, fair, and forty! 'She is a salmon, therefore to be woo'd-she is a salmon, therefore to be won'-but shy, timid, capricious, head strong, now wrathful and now full of fear, like any other female whom the cruel artist has hooked by hip or heart, and, in spite of all her struggling, will bring to the gasp at last, and then with calm eyes behold her lying in the shade dead, or worse than dead, fast fading, and to be reillumined no more the lustre of her beauty, insensible to sun or shower, even the most perishable of all perish able things in a world of perishing '-But the salmon has grown sulky, and must be made to spring to the plunging stone There, suddenly, instinct with new passion, she shoots out of the form like a bar of silver bullion, and, relapsing into the flood, is in another moment at the very head of the waterfull! Give her the butt-give her the butt-or she is gone for ever with the thunder into ten fathom deep !-Now comes the trial of your tackle-and when was Phin ever known to fail at the edge of eliff or cataract? Her snout is southwards -right up the middle of the main current of the hill born river, as if she would seek its very course where she was spawned! She still swins swift, and strong, and deep-and the line goes steady, boys, steady-stiff and steady as a Tory in the roar of Opposition There is yet an hour's play in her dorsal fin-danger in the flap of her tail-and yet may her silver shoulder shatter the gut against a rock. Why, the river was yesterday in spate, and she is fresh run from the sea. All the lesser naterfalls are now level with the flood, and she meets with no impediment or obstruction—the coast is clear no tree roots here-no floating branches-for during the night they have all been swept down to the salt loch In medio tutissimus ibis-ny, non you feel she begins to fail—the butt tells now every time you deliver your right What I another mad leap! yet another sullen plunge! Christopher on Wordsworth and Scott

Tickler How can that be?—Wordsworth says that a great poet must be great in all things

North Wordsworth often writes like an idiot, and never more so than when he said of Milton, 'His soul was like a star, and dwelt npart' I or it dwelt in tumult, and mischief, and rebellion Wordsworth is, in all things, the reverse of Milton—a good man, and a bad poet

Tickler What !- I hat Wordsworth whom Magn cries up as the Prince of Pocts?

North Be it so, I must humour the funce of some of my friends. But had that man been a great poet, he would have produced a deep and lasting impression on the mind of England, whereas his verses are becoming less and less I nown every day, and he is, in good truth, already one of the illustrious obscure

Tickler I never thought bin more than n very ordinary man -with some imagination, certainly, but with no grasp of understanding, and apparently little acquainted with the history of his kind. My God ' to compare such a writer with Scott and Byron!

North And yet, with his creed, what might not n great poet have done?-That the language of poetry is but the language of strong human passion '- I hat in the great elementary principles of thought and feeling common to all the race the subject matter of poetry is to be sought and found '-I hat enjoyment and suffering, as they wring and crush, or expand and elevate, men's hearts, are the sources of song '-And what, pray, has he made out of this true and philosophical creed?-A few ballads (pretty at the best), two or three moral fables, some natural description of scenery, and half a dozen narratives of common distress or happiness. Not one single character has he created-not one incident -not one tragical catastrophe 11e has thrown no light on man's estate here below, and Crabbe, with all -not one tragical catastrophe his defects, stands immeasurably above Wordsworth as the Poet of the Poor

Ti kler Good And yet the youngsters, in that absurd Magazine of yours, set him up to the stars as their idol, and kiss his very feet, as if the toes were of gold

North Well, well, let them have their own way awhile. I confess that the 'Lyenrsion' is the worst poem, of any character, in the Inglish language. It contains about two hundred sonorous lines, some of which appear to be fine, even in the sense as well as the sound. The remaining seven thousand three hundred are quite ineffectual. Then what labour the builder of that lofty rhyme must have undergone! It is, in its own way, a small Tower of Babal, and all built by a single man.

Aorth Scott's poetry puzzles me-it is often very had

North I recept when his martial soul is up, he is but a tame and feeble writer. This versification in general flows on easily—smoothly—almost concrously—but seldom or never with imp tuosity or grandent. There is no strength, no felicity in his diction—and the substance of his pactry is neither rich nor rare. The atmosphere is becoming every moment more oppressive. How stands the Therm?

Tichler Ninety. But then when his nurrial soul is ups and up it is at sight of a spear point or a pennon—then indeed you hear the true poet of chivalry. What each, kit, for all his previous drivelling—if drivelling at be—and God forbid. I should deny drivelling to any poet, ancient or nuclear—for now he makes my very soul to burn within me—and, envard and eithern though I be—ve, a most intense and insuperable coward, priving bife and limb beyond all other earthly possessions, and loath to shed one single drop of blood either for my king or country—yet such is the trumpet power of the song of that son of genus that I start from my old elbow chair, up with the poker, tong, or shovel, no matter which, and flourithing it round my head, ety,

'Charge, Chester, charge' On, Stanley on! and then, dropping my voice and returning to my pudded bottom, whaper,

"Were the last words of Marmon!"

North Braso-braso-braso

Tieller I care not one single curse for all the criticism that ever was canted, or decanted, or recanted. Notther does the world. The world tall es a poet as it finds him, and seats him above or below the salt. The world is as obstinate as a million mules, and will not turn its head on one side or another for all the shouting of the critical population that ever was shouted. It is very possible that the world is a bad judge. Well, then—appeal to posterity, and be hanged to you—and posterity will affirm the judgment with costs.

North How you can jubber away so, in such a temperature as this, confounds me. You are indeed a singular old man.

Tickler Therefore I say that Scott is a Homer of a poet, and so let him doze when he has a mind to it, for no man I know is better entitled to an occasional half canto of slumber

North Did you ever meet any of the Lake Poets in private society?

Tickle: Five or six times. Wordsworth has a grave, solemn, pedantic, awkward, out of the worldish look about him, that rather puzzles you as to his probable profession, till he begins to speak—and then, to be sure, you set him down at once for a Methodist preacher.

North I have seen Chantrey's bust

Tick'er The bust flatters his head, which is not intellectual. The forehead is narrow, and the skull altogether too scanty. Yet the baldness, the gravity, and the composure are impressive, and, on the whole, not unpoetical. The eyes are dim and thoughtful, and a certain sweetness of smile occasionally lightens up the strong lines of his countenance with an expression of courteousness and philanthropy.

North Is he not extremely cloquent?

Tickler I'ar from it. He labours like a whale spouting—his voice is wearisomely monotonous—he does not know when to have done with a subject—oracularly announces perpetual truisms—never hits the nail on the head—and leaves you amazed with all that needless pother, which the simple bard opines to be eloquence, and which passes for such with his Coekney idolaters and his eatechimens at Ambleside and Keswick.

North Not during dinner, surely?

Tickler Yes—during breakfast, limeli, dinner, tea, and supper—every intermediate moment—nor have I any doubt that he proses all night long in his sleep

(From the Aoctes )

The Shepherd on the Poor-Laws

North Thank heaven for Winter! Would that it lasted nll year long! Spring is pretty well in its way, with budding branches and carolling birds, and wimpling burnies, and fleecy skies, and dew like showers softening and brightening the bosom of old mother earth. Summer is not much amiss, with umbrageous woods, glittering atmosphere, and awnkening thunder storms me libel Autumn in her gorgeous bounty and her beau But Winter-dear, cold handed, warm tiful decays hearted Winter, welcome thou to my fur elad bosom! Thine are the sharp, short, brueing, invigorating days, that screw up musele, fibre, and nerve, like the strings of an old Cremona discoursing excellent music-thine the long snow silent or hail rattling nights, with earthly firesides and heavenly luminaries, for home comforts, or travelling imaginations, for undisturbed imprisonment, or unbounded freedom, for the affections of the heart and the flights of the soul! Thine too-

Shepherd Thine too skatin, and curlin, and grewin, and a' sorts o' decylry amang lads and lasses at rockins and kirns. Beef and greens! Beef and greens! O, Mr North, beef and greens!

North Ies, James, I sympathise with your enthin siasm. Now, and now only, do carrots and turnips deserve the name. The season this of rumps and rounds. Now the whole nation sets in for serious eating—serious and substantial eating, James, half leisure, half labour—the table loaded with a lease of life, and each dish a year. In the presence of that Haggis I feel myself immortal.

Shepherd Butcher meat, though, and coals, are likely, let me tell you, to sell at a perfee' ransom free Martinmas to Michaelmas.

North Paltry thought Let beeves and muttons look up, even to the stars, and fuel be precious as at the Pole Another slice of the stot, James, another slice of the stot—and, Mr Ambrose, smash that half ton lump of black diamond till the clumner roar and radiate like Mount Vesuvius.—Why so glum, Tiekler?—why so glum?

Tickler This outrageous merriment grates my spirits I am not in the mood. Twill be a severe winter, and I think of the poor.

North Why the devil think of the poor at this time of day? Are not wages good, and work plenty, and is not charity a British virtue?

Shepherd I never heard sie even down nonsense, Mr Tiekler, in a' my born days. I met a puir woman ganging along the brigg, wi' a deevil's dizzen o bairns, ilka ane wi'n daud o breid in the tae hiun and a whang o' cheese i the tither, while their cheeks were a' bliwn out like sae many Boreases, wi' something better than wun', and the mither hersel, a weel fur'd hizzie, tearin awa at the fleshy shank o' a mirrow bane, mid wi' hunger, but no wi' starvation, for these are two different things, Mr Tiekler. I can assure you that puir folks, mair especially gin they be beggars, are hungry four or five times a day, but starvation is seen at night sitting by nn empty aumry and a cauld hearthstane. There's hittle or nie starvation the now, in Seotlan'!

North The people are, on the whole, well off —Take some pickles, Timothy, to your steak Dickson's mustard is superb

Shepherd I canna say that I a'thegather just properly understan' the system o' the purr laws, but I ken this, that puir folks there will be till the end o' Black-cood's Magazine, and, that granted, maun there no be some kind o' provision for them, though it may be kittle to calculate the proceese amount?

North Are the English people a dependent, ignorant, grovelling, mean, debised, and british people?

Shepherd Not they, indeed—they're a powerfu' population, second only to the Scotch. The English puir laws had better be cut down some two three milhons, but no abolished. The Political Economic creatures are a cruel set—greedier theirsels than gaberlunzies—yet grudging a handfu' o' meal to an auld wife's wallet. Charity is in the heart, not in the head, and the open ham should be stretched out o' the sudden, unasled and free, not held back wi' clutched fingers like a meeser, while the Wisenere shakes his head in cauldrife calculation, and ties a knot on the purse o him on principle

North Well said, James, although perhaps your tenets are scarcely tenable

Shepherd Scarcely tenable? Wha'll take them frae me either by force or reason? Oh! we're from into argument, and that's what I cannot thole at meals. Mr Tickler, there's nac occasion, man, to look sac down in the mouth—everybody kens ye're a man o' genius, without your pretending to be melaneholy

Tieller I have no appetite, James

Shepherd Nae appeteet! how suld ye hae an appeteet? A bowl o Mollygo tawny soup, wi' bread in proportion -twn codlins (wi maist part o' a labster in that sass), the first gash o the jiget-stakes -then I'm must sure, pallets, and finally guse-no to count jeclies and coosturd, and bluemange, and many milhon mites in that Campsic Stilton-better than ony Linglish-a pot o' Draught-twa lang shankers o' ale-noos an' thans a sip o' the auld port, and just afore grace a chilker o' Glenlivet, that made your een glower and water in your head as if you had been lookin at Mrs Siddons in the sleep walking seene in Shakespeare's tragedy of Macleth Gin ye had an appeted after a' that destruction o' animal and vegetable matter, your maw would be like that o' Death hunsel, and your stamach insatiable as the grave

Tickler Mr Ambrose, no hughter, if you please, sir North Come, come, Tickler—had Hogg and Ilera

But 'tis an old behef,
That on some solemn shore,
Beyond the splicre of grief,
Dear friends will meet once more.

Beyond the sphere of time, And sin, and fate's control, Screne in changeless prime Of body and of soul.

That creed I fain would keep,
That hope I'll not forgo,
Lternal be the sleep,
Unless to waken so.

The Cld and the Leper

He has ta'en some twenty gentlemen along with him to go, For he will pay that ancient vow he to Saint James doth owe,

To Compostella, where the shrine doth by the altar stand, The good Rodrigo de Bivar is riding through the land

Where'er he goes, much alms he throws, to feeble folk and poor,

Beside the way for him they pray, him blessings to procure, For, God and Mary Mother, their heavenly grace to win, His hand was ever bountiful great was his joy therein.

And there, in middle of the path, a leper did appear,
In a deep slough the leper lay—none would to help come near

With a loud voice he thence did cry, 'For God our Saviour's sake,

From out this fearful jeopardy a Christian brother take '-

When Roderick heard that piteous word, he from his horse came down,

For all they said, no stay he made, that noble champion, He reached his hand to pluck him forth, of fear was no account.

Then mounted on his steed of worth, and made the leper mount

Behind him rode the leprous man, when to their hostelrie

They came, he made him eat with him at table cheerfully, While all the rest from that poor guest with loathing shranl away,

To his own bed the wretch he led, beside him there he lay

All at the mid hour of the night, while good Rodrigo slept, A breath came from the leprous man, it through his shoulders erept,

Right through the body, at the breast, passed forth that breathing cold

I wot he leaped up with a start, in terrors manifold

He groped for him in the bed, but him he could not find, Through the darf chamber groped he, with very anxious mind,

I ondly he lifted up his voice with speed a timp was brought, let nowhere was the leper seen, though far and near they sought

He turned him to his chamber, God wo', perplexed sore With that which had be'allen—when lo' his free before, There stood a man all clothed in we ture shining white Thus said the vision, 'Sie pest thou, or wake t thou, S.r. Knight?'—

"I sleep not," quoth Rodingo, "but tell me who art thou, For, in the midst of darkness, much light is on thy brow?"—

'I am the holy Lazarus, I come to speak with thee, I am the same poor leper thou say'dst for charity

*Not run the trial, nor in vain the victory linth been, God favours thee, for that my pain thou didst reheve yestreen

There shall be honour with thee, in buttle and in peace, Success in all thy doing, and plentiful increase

'Strong enemies shall not prevail the greatness to undo. The name shall make men's checks full pale—Christians and Moslem too.

A death of honour shalt thou die, such greet to thee is given,

Thy soul shall part victoriously, and he received in heaven'-

When he these gracious words had said, the spirit vanished quite,

Rodingo rose and knelt him down—he I nelt till morning light

Unto the Heavenly Father, and Mary Mother dear, He made his prayer right humble, till dawned the morning clear

The Wandering Knight's Song

'My ornaments are arms,
My pastime is in war,
My bed is cold upon the wold,
My lamp yon star

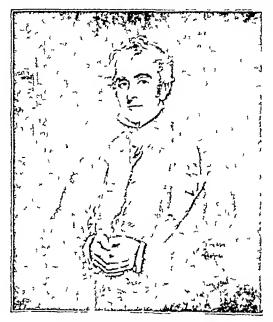

'My journeyings are long
My slumbers short and brol en,
From hill to hill I wander still,
Kissing thy token.

"I nde from land to land, I sail from sea to sea, Some day more kind I fate may find, Some right kiss thee

The Abbotsford Hunt.

The other 'superior occasion' came later in the season, the 28th of October, the birthday of Sir Walter's eldes son, was, I think, that usually selected for the Altasford Hunt This was a courting field on a large scale, in cluding, with is many of the young gentry as pleased to attend, all Scott's personal fivourites among the yeomen and farmers of the surrounding country The Sherift always took the field, but laterly devolved the command upon his good friend Mr John Usher, the ex laird of Tofffield, and he could not have had a more skilful or a better humoured heutenant The hunt tool place (other on the moors above the Cauldshields I och, or over some of the hills on the estate of Gala, and we had commonly ere we returned haves enough to supply the wife of every farmer that attended with such for a weel following The whole then dened at Abbot ford, the Sheriff in the chair, Adam I ergusson croupier, and Dominie Thomson of course, chaptain George, by the way, was hime if an eager partaker in the preliminary sport, and now he would from us with a grice in Birms sphire c, factoric as my arm? beginning with thanks to the Almights, who had given man dominion over the fowle of the rrant the beats of tre tell and expaining on this ext with so lucalent a commentary that South who had been fumbling with his spoon long before he reached his Amen, could not help exclaiming as he sat down, 'Well done, Mr George! I think we so had everything but the view holla!' The company, whose onset had been thus de ferred, were seldom, I think, under thirty in number, and sometimes they exceeded forty The feast was such as suited the occasion—a la on of beef, roasted, at the foot of the table, a salted round at the head, while tureous of hare soup, hotelpotch, and cockey leel ie extended down the centre, and such light articles as geese, turkers entire sucking-pig, a singed sheep's head, and the unfaling haggis were set forth by way of side-dishes. Black cocl. and moorfowl, bushels of smpe, thack fuldings, white fuddings, and pyramids of paneakes formed the second Ale was the favourite beverage during dinner,

Death of Sir Walter Scott.

On Monday he remained in lest, and recined extremely feeble, but after breakfast on Tuesday the 17th [July 18,2] he appeared revived somewhat, and was again wheeled about on the turk. Presently he fell asleep in his chair, and after dozing for perhaps half an hour, started awake and shaking the plands ve had jut about him from off his shoulders, said-'This is said idleness I shall forget what I have been thinking of, if I don't set it down now Take me into my own room, and fetch the leve of my desk. He repeated this so earnestly that we could not refuse his daughters went into his study opened his writing desk and hid paper and pens in the usual order, and I then moved him through the half and into the spot where he had always been accustomed to work the climir was placed at the desk, and he found himself in the old position, he smiled and thinked us, and said-Now give me my pen, and leave me for a little to miself? Sophia put the pen into his hand and he en demoured to close his fingers upon it, but they refused their office-it dropped on the paper. He sank back among his pillows, silent tears rolling down his cheeks, but composing himself by and by motioned to me to wheel him out of doors again. Laidlaw met us at the porch, and took his turn of the chair. Sir Walter, after a little while, again dropped into slumber. When he was awaking, Laidlaw said to me—'Sir Walter his had a little repose '—'No, Willie,' said he—'no repose for Sir Walter hit in the grave.' The tears again rushed from his eyes. 'Friends,' said he, 'don't let me expose myself—get me to bed—that's the only place.'

With this scene ended our glimpse of drylight Walter never, I think, left his room afterwards, and hardly his bed, except for an hour or two in the middle of the day, and after another week he was unable even for this. During a few days lie was in a state of painful irritation, and I saw realised all that he liad himself prefigured in his description of the meeting between Crystal Crossingry and his paralytic friend. Dr Ross came out from Fdinburgh, bringing with him his wife, one of the dearest mace of the Clarks' table. Sir Walter with some difficulty recognised the Doctor, but, on hearing Mrs. Ross's voice, exclaimed at once-'Isn't that Kate Hume?' These kind friends remained for two or three days with us. Clarkson's lancet was pronounced neces sary, and the relief it afforded was, I am happy to say, very effectual

After this he declined daily, but still there was great strength to be wasted, and the process was long seemed, however, to suffer no bodily pain, and his mind, though hopelessly obscured, appeared, when there was any symptom of consciousness, to be dwelling, with rare exceptions, on serious and soleinn things, the accent of the voice grave, sometimes awful, but never queridous, and very soldom indicative of any angry or resentful Now and then he imagined himself to be administering justice as Sheriff, and once or twice he seemed to be ordering 10m Purche about trees few times also, I am sorry to say, we could perceive that his fancy was at Jedburgh, and 'Burk Sir Walter' escaped him in a melaneholy tone. But commonly what ever we could follow him in was a fragment of the Bible (especially the Proplecies of Isaiali and the Book of Job) -or some petition in the litary-or a verse of some psalm (in the old Scotch metrical version), or of some of the inagnificant hymns of the Romish ritual, in which he had always delighted, but which probably hung on his memory now in connection with the Church services he had attended while in Italy We very often heard distinetly the eadence of the Dies Irie, and I think the very last stanza that we could make out was the first of a still greater favourite

Stabat Mater dolorosa
Juxta crucein lachrymosa, Duni pendehat I ilius!

All this time he continued to recognise his drughters, I aidlaw, and myself, whenever we spoke to him—and received every attention with a most touching thankful ness. Mr Clarl son, too, was always saluted with the old courtesy, though the cloud opened but a moment for him to do so. Most truly night it be said that the gentleman survived the genius.

As I was dressing on the morning of Monday the 17th of September, Nicolson came into my room, and told me that he master had awoke in a state of compoure and consciousness and wished to see me immediately. I found him entirely himself, though in the last extreme of feebleness. His even was clear and calm—evers trace of the wild fire of deliram extinguished. "Lockhart" he said, 'I may have but a minute to speak to you dear, be a good man-be virtuous-be religious-be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie liere. '- He paused, and I said- 'Shall I send for Sophia and Anne?'-'No ' said lie, 'don't disturb Poor souls! I know they were up all night-God bless you all '-With this he sank into a very tranquil sleep, and, indeed, he scarcely afterwards give any sign of consciousness, except for an instant on the arrival of his sons -They, on learning that the scene was about to close, obtained anew leave of absence from their pots, and both reached Abbotsford on the 19th. About half past one 1 M, on the 21st of September, Sir Walter breathed his last, in the presence of all his children. It was a beautiful day-so warm that every window was wide open-and so perfectly still that the sound of all others most delicious to his ear, the gentle ripple of the Tweed over its publics, was distinctly audible as the knelt around the bed, and his eldest son kissed and closed his (From the Life of Scott)

Athanasia in Prison

Alas I said I to misself, of what tidings am I doomed ever to be the messenger! but she was alone and how could I shrink from any pain that might perhaps alle vinte hers? I tool the key, glided along the corridors, and stood once more at the door of the chamber in which I had parted from Athanasia. No voice answered to my knock, I repeated it three times, and then, agitated with indistinct appreliension, licalated no longer to open it. No lump was burning within the chamber, but from without there entered a wascring glare of deep saffron coloured light, which showed me Its ammous and Athanasia extended on her couch troubled his lind no power to mar the image of her sleeping tranquility. I linng over her for a moment and was about to disturb that slumber-perhaps the last slumber of peace and innocence—when the chamber walls were visited with a yet deeper glare "Casus," she whispered, as I stepped from beside the couch, 'why do you leave me? Stry, Valerius? I looked back, but her eyelids were still closed, the same calm smile vas upon her dreaming lips. The light streamed redder and All in an instant became as quiet without as I approached the wandow, and saw Cottlins standing in the midst of the court, Sabinus and Silo near him, the horsenich drawn up on either side, and a soldier close behind resting upon an unsheathed a vord I saw the keen blue eye as fiered as ever. I saw that the blood was still fervid in his cheels, for the complexion of this man was of the same bold and fload linglitness so uncommon in Italy, which you have seen represented in the picture of Sylla, and even the blare of the torches seemed to strive in vain to heighten its the oldier had lifted his sword and natural scarlet my eye was fixed, as by fascination, when suithenly a deep vilce was heard aimils the deadly silence "Cotiling"-look up Covilius!"

Vurchus the Christian priest, stanling at an open window not far distant from that at which I was placed, stre ched forth his lettered hand as he stake. *Cotilius * I charge thee, look upon the hand from which the blessed water of baptism was ear upon the heal. I charge thee, look upon me and has, ere yet the blow he given upon what hope thy thoughts are fixed? Is this swood bared against be reled of Casar or a narry of of Jesus? I charge thee, speak, and for thy soul's sake speak truly'

A bitter motion of derision passed over his lips, and he nodded, as if impatiently, to the Pretorian. Instine tively I turned me from the spectacle, and my eye rested again upon the couch of Athanasia—but not upon the vision of her tranquillity. The elap with which the corpse fell upon the stones had perhaps reached the sleeping ear, and we know with what swiftness thoughts chase thoughts in the wilderness of dreams. So it was that she started at the very moment when the blow was given, and she whispered—for it was still but a deep whisper. Spare me, Trajan, Cæsar, Prince—have pity on my youth—streugthen, strengthen me, good Lord! Fie! Fie! we must not lie to save life. Felix—Valerius—come close to me, Chius—Fie! let us remember we are Romans—'Tis the trumpet'—

The Prætorian trumpet sounded the march in the court below, and Athanasia, starting from her sleep, gazed wildly around the reddened chamber The blast of the trumpet was indeed in her ear-and Valerius hung over her, but after a moment the cloud of the broken dream passed away, and the maiden smiled as she extended her hand to me from the couch, and began to gather up the ringlets that floated all down npon her shoulder She blushed and smiled mournfully, and asked me hastily whence I came, and for what purpose I had come, but before I could answer, the glare that was yet in the chamber seemed anew to he perplexing her, and she gazed from me to the red walls, and from them to me again, and theu ouce more the trumpet was blown, and Athanasia sprang from her couch I know not in what terms I was essaying to tell her what was the truth, but I know that ere I had said many words she discovered my menning For a moment she looked deadly pale, in spite of all the glare of the torch beams, but she recovered herself, and said in a voice that sounded almost as if it came from a light heart 'But Caius, I must not go to Cæsar without having at least a garland on my head Stay here, Valerius, and I shall be ready anon-quite ready

It seemed to me as if she were less hasty than she had promised, yet many minutes clapsed not ere she returned. She plucked a blossom from her hair as she drew near me, and said. 'Take it you must not refuse one token more, this also is a sacred gift. Caius, you must learn never to look upon it without kissing these red streaks—these blessed streaks of the Christian flower.'

I took the flower from her hand and pressed it to my lips, and I remembered that the very first day I saw Athanasia she had plucked such a one when apart from all the rest in the gardens of Capito I told her what I remembered, and it seemed as if the little circumstance had called up all the image of peaceful days, for once more sorrowfulness gathered upon her countenance. If the tear was ready, however, it was not permitted to drop, and Athanasia returned again to her flower

'Do you think there are any of them in Britain?' said she, 'or do you think that they would grow there? You must go to my dear uncle, and he will not deny you when you tell him that it is for my sake he is to give you some of his. They call it the passion flower—'tis an emblem of an awful thing. Caius, these purple streaks are lile trickling drops, and here, look ye, they are all round the flower—Is it not very like a bloody crown upon a pale brow? I will take one of them in my hand too, Caius, and methinks I shall not disgrace myself when I look upon it, even though Trajan should be frowning upon me'

I had not the heart to interrupt her, but heard silently all she said, and I thought she said the words quickly and eagerly, as if she feared to be interrupted.

The old priest came into the chamber while she was yet speaking so, and said very composedly 'Come, my dear child, our friend has sent again for us, and the soldiers have been waiting already some space, who are to convey us to the Palatine. Come, children, we must part for a moment—perhaps it may be but for a moment—and Valerius may remain here till we return to him Here, at least, dear Caius, you shall have the earliest tidings and the surest'

The good man took Athanasia by the hand, and she, smiling now at length more serenely than ever, said only 'Farewell then, Caius, for a little moment!' And so, drawing her veil over her face, she passed away from before me, giving, I think, more snpport to the ancient Aurelius than in her turn she received from him I began to follow them, but the priest waved his hand as if to forbid me. The door closed after them, and I was alone.

The standard Life of Lockhart is that of Mr Andrew Lang (2 vols. 1896) See also Mrs Oliphant s William Blackwood and his Sons (1897), and Sir George Douglas s little book, The Blackwood Group (1897).

Thomas Hamilton (1789-1842) produced in The Youth and Manhood of Cyril Thornton (1827) what was hailed as one of the most vigorous and interesting novels of the day, it is full of vivid sketches of college life, military campaigns, and other bustling scenes and adventures, and is not complimentary to the social manners of Glasgow citizens and Glasgow collegians (the hero is an Englishman) Son of a Glasgow professor and brother of the philosopher Sir William Hamilton, the author studied at Glasgow As captain of the 29th Regiment he served in the Peninsula, Nova Scotia, and France, and retiring on half-pay, settled at Edinburgh and became one of the Blackwood group He visited the United States, and wrote a lively work on the New World, entitled Men and Manners in America (1833) Cherishing a good deal of aristocratic and insular prejudice, he disliked the democratic government and many of the social habits of the Americans, and his criticisms, unfair rather than ill natured, caused much irritation in America. He was also author of Annals of the Peninsular War

Michael Scott (1789-1835), born at Cowlairs near Glasgow, studied at the university, and then tried his fortune in Jamaica and the West Indies as a planter. In 1822 he was in business in Glasgow. In 1829-33 he contributed to Black wood's the brilliant story of West India life Tom Cringle's Log, showing throughout proofs of the author's personal experiences, keen observation, sprightly temper, and humorous (perhaps too systematically humorous) view of life. His next best contribution to Blackwood's was The Criuse of the

Midge, issued in 1834 and 1835 Oddly enough Scott preserved a rigid incognito, and his authorship was unknown till after his death. Both the stories appeared first in book form at Paris in 1836, and as both have wealth of incident, abundant verve, and a bright and lively style, they have deservedly retained their popularity and been often reprinted. See Sir George Douglas's The Blackwood Group (1897)

Frederick Marryat, born in Westminster, 10th July 1792, the son of an MP, in 1806 sailed as midshipman under Lord Cochrane (Dundonald), and spent some years of dangerous service off the French and Spanish coasts and in the Mediter-He was concerned in no less than fifty engagements, after one of which an officer, who disliked him, seeing his seemingly lifeless corpse, exclaimed, 'Here's a young cock who has done crowing Well, for a wonder, this chap has cheated the gallows!' 'You're a liar!' said Marryat faintly, raising his head. Afterwards the 'chap' served in the attack on the French fleet in Aix Roads and in the Walcheren expedition, and in 1814, as lieutenant of the Newcastle, he cut out four vessels in Boston Bay, an exploit of great difficulty and daring During the Burmese war (1824) he commanded the Larne, and was for some time senior officer on the station services were rewarded by professional promotion and honours, and he was a Companion of the Bath (1826) and an officer of the Legion of Honour (1833) He retired in 1830, having already commenced a busy and highly successful literary career in 1829 by the publication of Frank Mildmay, the Naval Officer (1829), a nautical tale in three volumes This work partook rather strongly of the free spirit of the sailor, but there was a rough racy humour and dramatic liveliness that atoned for more serious faults year Marryat was ready with other three volumes, presenting a well-compacted and more carefully finished story, The King's Own Newton Forster, or the Merchant Service (1832), a tale of various and sustained interest, was surpassed by its immediate successor, Peter Simple (1834), the most amusing of all the author's works Dealing still in the main with nautical scenes and portraits, Marryat wrote about thirty volumes-amongst them Jacob Faithful (1834), Mr Midshipman Lasy (1836), The Pacha of Many Tales (1836), Japhet in Search of a Father (1836), The Pirate, and the Three Cutters (1836), The Dog Tiend, or Snarleyyow (1837), The Phantom Ship (1839), Poor Jack (1840), and some capital children's books, such as Masterman Ready (1841) and The Children of the New Torest After a trip to America in 1837, he published A Diary in America, with Remarks on its Institutions He was no admirer of the democratic government of America, his Diary was as uncomplimentary as the sketches of

Mrs Trollope or Captain Hall But his notes on traits of manners, peculiarities of speech, and other eccentricities of the Americans were as rich as his purely fictitious work, and, like them, probably owe a good deal to the novelist's creative imagination and love of drollery

In 1830 he had purchased Langham Manor, near the Norfolk coast, and here he settled in 1843. At one time he had a hobby for making a decoy, he flooded some hundred acres of his best grazingground, got his decoy into full working order so as to send some five thousand birds yearly to the London market, and then-drained it again receipts from farming in one year were £154, 2s 9d, his expenditure, £1637, os 6d ' Naturally, he did not die rich, though he had made over £20,000 by his writings, including £8500 during 1832-39 for the first publication of Peter Simple, Jacob Faithful, Japhet in Search of a Father, The Pacha of Many Tales, Mr Midshipman East, Snarleysow, and the Diary in America In 1847 he applied for service to the Admiralty, and when his request was refused he was so enraged that he burst a blood vessel, and was seriously ill for months The news early next year of the loss of his son in the wreck of his ship hastened his own death at Langham on 9th August 1848, and there he is buried

Quick tempered, extravagant, and over-eager in the pursuit of enjoyment, Marryat was an excellent officer and a generous man, his home was on the sea, unquestionably, and as a writer of sea-stories he has no superior He cannot, it may be, bring fully home to his readers the beauty and the terror of the deep, but for invention, narrative skill, and grasp of character, and especially for richness of humour, he stands first of all those who have dealt with the sea and sailors in prose No doubt his fun often descends to farce, still, setting Dickens aside, there is no English novelist who has awakened heartier and honester laughter His happiest creations, Mr Chucks and Terence O'Brien, Mesty and Equality Jack, and many more, would not unworthily fill places in the gallery of the greatest novelist own varied experiences at sea gave him a large fund of memories to draw from, many of his characters are obviously based on actual persons, and some of the episodes are manifestly autobiographical Marryat's best books betray no sign of struining after effect, the prose is direct, clear, and vigorous, an ideal, in its way, of the narrative of adventure. Nothing, for example, could well be more vivid, yet nothing could well be simpler and more reserved in style, than such a passage as the club hauling of the Diomede (in Peter Simple), whereas is usual in Marryat—the excitement and peril of the moment are brought home in the tersest phrase, by dramatic flashes and apt touches of dialogue. His sea fights, his chases and cuttingout expeditions, are told with irresistible gusto, and with vastly greater artistic skill than Fenimore Cooper's His books have been the delight of boshood succe they first appeared, and stown ! men can in them renew the jox of youth. The sailors of the Circut War live in his pipes as yields as do Iom Bowling and Hatchway and Pipes in Smollett stories i vividly i come types of Londoners live in the piges of Dickens

Quarter master, I cep her full again for stays Mind you ease the helm down when I tell you! About a minute passed before the captain gave any further orders. The ship had closed to within a quarter of a mile of the beach, and the waves curled and topped around us, bearing us down upon the shore, which presented one continued surface of foam, extending to within half a cable's length of our position, at which distance the enormous waves culminated and fell with the report of thunder. The exptrain waved his hand in silence to the quarter master at the wheel, and the helm was put down. In the meantime Mr Sawhridge, who was not In his umform, had entered, and perceived Jack alone, with the dinner table laid out in the best style for eight a considerable show of plate for even the Iountain Inn, and everything, as well as the apartment itself, according to Mr Saubridge's opinion, much more he for a commander in chief than a midshipman of a rloop of

Now Mr Saubridge was a good officer, one who had really worked his way up to the present rank-that is to say, that he had served seven and twenty years, and he I nothing but his pay. He was a little souted in the service, and certainly had an aver ion to the young men of family who were now fast crowding info it- still with some grounds, as he perceived his own chance of promotion decrease in the same ratio as the numbers He considered that in proportion as in b increased shipmen assumed a cleaner and more gentleman's appearance, so did they become mole thelet, and it may therefore he easily unagened that his life was raised in this parade and display in a lal who was very shortly to be, and ought three years before to have been, shrinking from his from n. Mr Sawbridge, who imagined that the name of the first heutenant would strike terror to a culprit midship man, threw himself back in the chair and assumed an air of importance.

'Really, sir,' replied Jack, 'what may be your exact situation on board, my ignorance of the service will not allow me to gness, but if I may judge from your behaviour, you have no small opinion of yourself'

'Look ye, young man, you may not know what a first heutenant is, and I take it for granted that you do not, by your behaviour, but depend upon it, I'll let you know very soon. In the meantime, sir, I insist upon it, that you go immediately on board.'

'I'm sorry that I cannot comply with your very moderate request,' replied Jack, coolly 'I shall go on board when it suits my convenience, and I beg that you will give yourself no further trouble on my account'

Jack then rang the bell, the waiter, who had been listening outside, immediately entered, and before Mr Sawbridge, who was dumb with astonishment at Jack's impertinence, could have time to reply—

'Waiter,' said Jack, 'show this gentleman downstairs.'

'By the god of war!' exclaimed the first lieutenant, 'but I'll soon show you down to the boat, my young bantam, and when once I get you safe on board, I'll make you know the difference between a midshipman and a first lieutenant'

'I can only admit of equality, sir,' replied Jack, 'we are all born equal—I trust you'll allow that'

'Equality—damn it, I suppose you'll take the command of the ship. However, sir, your ignorance will be a little enlightened by and by I shall now go and report your conduct to Captain Wilson, and I tell you plainly that, if you are not on board this evening, to morrow morning, at daylight, I shall send a sergeant and a file of marines to fetch you.'

'You may depend upon it, sir,' replied Jack, 'that I also shall not fail to mention to Captain Wilson that I consider you a very quarrelsome, impertinent fellow, and recommend him not to allow you to remain on board It will be quite uncomfortable to be in the same ship with such an ungentlemanly bear'

'He must be mad—quite mad,' exclaimed Sawbridge, whose astonishment even mastered his indignation 'Mad as a March hare—by God!'

'No, sır,' replied Jack, 'I am not mad, but I am a philosopher'

'A what?' evelaimed Sawbridge. 'Damme, what next?—Well, my joker, all the better for you, I shall put your philosophy to the proof'

'It is for that very reason, sir,' replied Jack, 'that I have decided upon going to sea and if you do remain on board, I hope to argue the point with you, and make you a convert to the truth of equality and the rights of man'

'By the Lord that made us both, I'll soon make you a convert to the thirty six articles of war—that is, if you remain on board, but I shall now go to the captain and report your conduct, sir, and leave you to your dinner with what appetite you may'

'Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you, but you need not be afraid of my appetite, I am only sorry, as you happen to belong to the same ship, that I cannot, in justice to the gentlemanly young men whom I expect, ask you to join them I wish you a very good morning, sir'

'Twenty years have I been in the service,' roared Sawbridge, 'and, damme, —— but he's mad—down right, stark, staring mad' And the first lieutenant bounced out of the room

Jack was a little astonished himself. Had Mr Saw bridge made his appearance in uniform it might have been different, but that a plain looking man, with black whiskers, shaggy hair, and old blue frock coat and vellow casimere waisteoat, should venture to address him in such a manner was quite incomprehensible. 'He calls me mad,' thought Jack, 'I shall tell Captain Wilson what is my opinion about his heutenant.' Shortly afterwards the company arrived, and Jack soon forgot all about it.

In the meantime Sawbridge called at the captain's lodgings, and found him at lione he made a very faithful report of all that had happened, and concluded his request by demanding, in great wrath, either an instant dismissal or a court martial on our hero, Jack

Cheeks and his Captain.

'Well, Mr Checks, what are the carpenters about?'

'Weston and Smallbridge are going on with the chairs—the whole of them will be finished to morrow'

'Well?'—'Smith is about the chest of drawers, to match the one in my Lady Capperbar's bedroom'

'Very good And what is IIIIton about?'—'He has finished the spare lenf of the dining table, sir, he is now about a little job for the second lieutenant'

'A job for the second heutenant, sir! How often have I told you, Mr Cheeks, that the carpenters are not to be employed, except on ship's duty, without my special permission!'—'His standing bed place is broken, sir, he is only getting out a chock or two'

'Mr Cheeks, you have disobeyed my most positive orders. By the bye, sir, I understand you were not sober last night '—'Please your honour,' replied the carpenter, 'I wasn't drunk—I was only a little fresh'

'Take you care, Mr Cheeks. Well, now, what are the rest of your crew about?'—'Why, Thomson and Waters are cutting out the pales for the garden out of the jib boom, I've saved the heel to return'

'Very well, but there won't be enough, will there?'

'No, sir, it will take a hand mast to finish the whole.'

'Then we must expend one when we go out again. We can carry away a top mast, and make a new one out of the hand mast at sea. In the meantime, if the sawyers have nothing to do, they may as well cut the palings at once And now let me see—oh, the painters must go on shore to finish the attics.'

'Yes, sir, but my Lady Capperbar wishes the jeal owises to be painted vermition, she says it will look more rural '—' Mrs Capperbar ought to know enough about ship's stores by this time to be aware that we are only allowed three colours. She may choose or mix them as she pleases, but as for going to the expense of buying paint, I can't afford it What are the rest of the men about?'—' Repairing the second cutter, and maling a new mast for the pinnace.'

'By the bye—that puts me in mind of it—have you expended any boat's masts?'—'Only the one carried away, sir'

'Then you must expend two more. Mrs C. has just sent me off a list of a few things that she wishes made while we are at anchor, and I see two poles for clothes lines. Saw off the sheave-holes, and put two pegs through at right angles—you know how I inean?'

'Yes, sir What am I to do, sir, about the eucumber frame? My Lady Capperbar says that she must have it, and I haven't glass enough They grumbled at the yard last time.'—'Mrs C. must wait a little. What are the armourers about?'

'They have been so bus; with your work, sir, that the arms are in a very bad condition. The first lieutenant said yesterday that they were a disgrace to the ship'

'Who dares say that?'-'The first lieutenant, sir'

'Well, then, let them rub up the arms, and let me know when they are done, and we'll get the forge up'

'The armourer has made six rakes and six hoes, and the two little hoes for the children, but he says that he can't make a spade.'

'Then I'll take his warrant away, by heavens' since he does not know his duty. That will do, Mr Cheeks I shall overlook your being in liquor this stime, but take care. Send the boatswain to me'

(From The King's Own)

Marryat's Life and Letters (2 vols. 1872) was published by his daughter Florence, successively Mrs Ross Church and Mrs Lean, and herself a prohific novelist. See also the sketch by Mr D Hannay in the 'Great Writers' series (1889).

William Nugent Glascock (1787–1847) served with credit in the navy from 1800 till the year of his death, with long intervals of half-pay, during which he produced many good pictures of maritime life and adventures, based largely on his varied experiences affoat in the Bultic and the Mediterranean, off Portugal, Newfoundland, and the West Indies The Naval Sketch-Book (1826), Sailors and Saints (1829), Tales of a Tar (1836), Land Sharks and Sea Gulls (1838), are all genuine tales of the sea, and display a hearty comic humour, a rich phraseology, and a cordial contempt for regularity of plot Captain Glascock's Naval Service, or Officer's Manual, passed through several editions, and translated was used in the French, Russian, Swedish, and Turkish services

Edward Howard, a naval heutenant who died still a comparatively young man in 1841, was a shipmate of Marryat's, and his sub editor on the Metropolitan Magazine, and was the author of Rattlin the Reefer (1836), a capital sea-story sometimes published with Marryat's works, and wrongly attributed to Marryat, who was said to have edited it. It was very well received, and was followed by Outward Bound, Jack Ashore, Sir Henry Morgan the Buccaneer, and other stories Several of these are better managed as to fable, particularly Outward Bound, but have not the same breadth of humour as Captain Glascock's novels He ventured also on a poem, The Centiad (1841) Tom Hood, on whose staff in the New Monthly he served, spoke warmly of his work, and said Howard 'had just felt the true use of his powers when he was called to resign them'

Frederick Chamier (1796-1870) served in the navy from 1809 till 1827, and then produced, in imitation of Marryat, The Life of a Sailor (1832), Bun Brace, The Arethusa, Jack Adams, and Tom Bowling (1841), stories which for a time were very popular, and were mostly reprinted as recently as 1881-90 Count Konigsmark (1845) was a historical romance Captain Chamier continued James's Naval History, recorded his experiences of the French Revolution of 1848, and published in 1855 a painfully facetious book of travels in France Switzerland, and Italy

Charles Wentworth Dilke (1789-1864), editor of the Athinaum, served twenty years in the Navy Pay Office, and on returng with a pension devoted himself wholly to literary occupations He had long been a zealous student of literature, had in 1814-16 edited a continuation of Dodsley's 'old plays,' and had contributed much to the magazines and reviews, especially to the Retio-In 1829 he became part proprietor of the Athenaum (founded by Silk Buckingham in 1828, and owned for a few months by John Sterling and others), and speedily became its supreme and highly effective editor He soon had Charles Lamb, Tom Hood, Leigh Hunt, Allan Cunning ham, Barry Cornwall, Chorley, and George Darley on his staff or amongst his contributors, and from abroad-an innovation in English journalism-he enlisted the services of Sainte Beuve and Jules To ensure perfect impartiality, the editor withdrew from general society, saw as little as possible of authors and publishers, and so long as he edited the paper did not himself contribute to its columns He resigned the editorial charge in 1846, for three years edited the Duily News, and now began to contribute to the Athenæum the famous articles on Junius, Pope Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Burke, Wilkes, and Peter Pindar, which were published as The Papers of a Critic by Dilke's grandson, Sir Charles, in 1875 Dr Carruthers, who did not wholly agree with him, said that 'the personal history of Pope was never properly understood till it was taken up by Mr Dilke,' and his views were substantially adopted by Mr Elwin and Mr Courthope in the magistral Dilke's contribution to the Junius contro versy, mainly destructive of current theories, was the most important that had been made.

Thomas Keightley (1789–1872), born in Dublin and educated at Trinity College, settled in London in 1824 as a writer of books, and published a series of histories of Greece, Rome, and England, long used as school manuals, books on the Greek War of Independence and on the Crusades, notes to Virgil and Horace, a Life of Milton and an edition of his works. His Fairy Mythology (1850) is, however, by far his most important work, and is still useful, though, like all books of that date dealing with folklore, it must be read with a certain caution.

William Maginn (1793-1842) was one of the wittiest, most accomplished, and versatile writers of his time in prose and verse, but has left little permanent memorial of his genius or acquire-He was born at Cork, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, assisted his father in conducting an academy in his native city, 'and in 1816 (not in 1819, as is usually said) was made LLD by his alma mater It was in 1819 that he began to write for Blackwood's Magazine His papers were lively, learned, often abusive, and sometimes libellous, he was a keen political partisan, a Tory of the old Orange stamp, who gave no guarter to an opponent. At the same time there was so much scholarly wit and literary power about Maginn's contributions that all parties read and admired him For nine years he was one of the most constant writers in Blackwood, and his Odoherty papers (prose and verse) were eagerly welcomed He had removed to London in 1823, and adopted literature as a profession In 1824 John Murray the publisher commenced a daily newspaper, The Representative, and Maginn was engaged as Paris correspondent. His residence in France was short, the Representative soon col lapsed, and Maginn returned to London to 'spin his daily bread out of his brains' He was asso ciated with Dr Stanley Lees Giffard in conducting the Standard newspaper, and when Fraser's Magazine was established in 1830, he became one of its chief literary supporters, contributing thereto the famous 'Gallery of Literary Characters,' illustrated by Maclise, probably neither Thackeray nor Carlyle did as much for the popularity of Fraser as Maginn did One article in this periodical (1836), a review of the poor novel of Berkeles Castle, led to a hostile meeting between Maginn and its author, the Hon Grantley Berkeley Berkeley had brutally assaulted Fraser, the publisher of the offensive criticism, when Maginn wrote to him, declaring that he was the authorhence the challenge and the duel The parties exchanged shots thrice, Maginn being slightly Maginn's life, literary and personal, became very irregular, intemperance gained upon him, the indisputable original of Thackeray's 'Captain Shandon,' he was often arrested and in jul, but his good humour seems never to have forsaken him His burlesque review of Southey's Doctor was called 'a farrago of Rabelaisian wit and learning'-a description that applies to a good deal of his work. He wrote a series of really admirable Sliakespeare papers for Blackwood in 1837, and in the following year he commenced a series of sixteen Homeric ballads In 1842 he was again in prison, and his health gave way. One of his friends wrote to Sir Robert Peel, describing the lamentable condition of the decayed wit, and the minister sent him £100, which Maginn did not live to receive He died a discharged but in solvent debtor at Walton on-Thames The esteem in which he was held by his contemporaries may be gathered from the so-called epitapli on him by Lockhart—or, rather, the genial elegy

Here, early to bed, lies kind WILLIAM MAGINN, Who, with genius, wit, learning, life's trophies to win, Had neither great lord nor rich eit of his kin, Nor discretion to set himself up as to tin, So his portion soon spent—like the poor heir of Lynn— He turned author while yet was no beard on his chin, And, whoever was out, or whoever was in, For your Tories his fine Irish brains he would spin, Who received prose and rhyme with a promising grin-'Go ahead, you queer fish, and more power to your fin,' But to save from starvation stirred never a pin Light for long was his heart, though his breeches were thin, Lise his acting for certain was equal to Quin, But at last he was beat, and sought help of the bin-All the same to the doctor from elaret to gin-Which led swiftly to jail and consumption therein It was much when the bones rattled loose in his skin, He got leave to die here out of Babylon's din Barring drink and the girls, I ne'er heard of a sin Many worse, better few, than bright, broken MAGINN

Even at his best he had more copiousness, clever ness, and wit than judgment or good feeling, and some of his work was in execrable taste-his treatment of Christabel and of Adonais, for example. The parodies of Carlyle and Disraeli in the 'Gallery,' on the other hand, are brilliant and blameless The 'Story without a Tail' and 'Bob Burke's Duel with Ensign Brady,' both for Blackwood, were reckoned his masterpieces Some of his Latin verse, classical as well as doggerel, was His 'Homeric Ballads' are very good brilliant ballads, but are not in the least Homeric, his blank verse reconstruction of Lucian's dialogues as comedies did not preserve much of Lucian's spirit Wit and humour he always had at command, and he was an extraordinary improvisator 'The Maxims of Odoherty' vary from pointed apopli thegms such as 'The next best thing to a really good woman is a really good-natured one,' and 'The next worst thing to a really bad man (in other words, a knave) is a really good natured one (in other words, a fool), to disquisitions—some of them tedious-on the impropriety of mixing your liquors or of taking lobster sauce with salmon, the best method of discomfiting a punster during dinner, and facetious literary criticism somewhat of the Noctes order 'The Vision of Purgatory' is not solemnising. The value or entertainment to be derived from Maginn's Latin versions of 'Chevy Chase' and 'Back and side go bare' may be guessed from a verse of the former > Persaeus ex Northumbria Vovebat dis iratis, Venare inter dies tres In montibus Cheviatis, Contemtis forti Douglaso Et omnibus cognutis.

Byron and Cumpbell are treated only less contemptuously in several articles than are Keats and Shelley, as types of the Cockney school, the 'Adonais' is ridiculed as mere trash 'Mazeppa' is proved to be a version of 'John Gilpin' Moore is more playfully dealt with by parody, thus

The last lamp of the alley
Is burning alone!
All its brilliant companions
Are shivered and gone.

No lamp of her kindred, No burner is nigh, To rival her glimmer, Or light to supply

I'll not leave thee, thou lone one l
To vanish in smoke,
As the bright ones are shattered,
Thou too shalt be broke

Thus kindly I scatter
Thy globe o'er the street,
Where the watch in his rambles
Thy fragments shall meet

In a not unjustified protest against the acceptance of Irish songs manufactured for the English market, he comments on the rhyming of 'girls' and 'bells 'The rhyme here marks this brute [the author] to be a bestial Cockney' The Berkeley Castle review not merely calls the novel 'in conception the most impertinent, in execution about the stupidest it has ever been our misfortune to read,' and comments on its 'horribly vulgar and ungrammatical writing,' but on the moral side speaks of 'looseness and dirt' and 'these bestialities towards the ladies of England, asks (by name) the peer to whose wife the novel was dedicated if he could not borrow a horsewhip to avenge such an insult, and to emphasise the bad taste of the author's family pride in naming the novel, dwells on the fact that the author's mother lived with his father as his mistress before she was married to him

From Bob Burke's Duel.'

'The day of that hunt was the very day that led to my duel with Bridy He was a long, straddling, waddle mouthed chap, who had no more notion of riding a hunt than a rhinoceros He was mounted on a showy enough looking mare, which had been nerved by Rodolphus Bootiman, the horse doctor, and though "a good 'un to look at, was a rum 'un to go," and before she was nerved, all the work had been taken out of her by long Lanty Philpot, who sold her to Brady nfter dinner for fifty pounds, she being not worth twenty in her best day, and Brady giving his bill at three months for the fifty. My friend the ensign was no judge of n horse, and the eveat showed that my cousin Lantv was no judge of n bill-not a cross of the fifty having been prid from that day to this, and it is out of the question now, it being long past the statute of limitations, to say nothing of Bridy having since twice taken the benefit of the Act So both parties jockeyed one another, having that pleasure, which must do them instead of profit

'She was a bay chestnut, and nothing would do Bridy but he must run her at a little gap which Miss Dosy was going to clear, in order to show his gallantry and agility, and certainly I must do him the credit to say that he did get his mare on the gap, which was no small feat, but there she broke down, and off went Brady, neck and crop, into as fine a pool of stagment green mud as you would ever wish to see lik was ducked regularly in it, and he came out, if not in the jacket, yet in the colours, of the Rifle Brigade, looking rueful enough at his misfortune, as you may suppose But he had not much time to think of the figure he cut, for before he could well get up, who should come right slap over him but Miss Dosy herself upon Iom the Devil, having cleared the gap and a yard beyond the pool in fine style Bridy ducked, and escaped the horse, a little fresh daubing being of less consequence than the knocking out of his brains, if he had any, but he did not escape a smart rap from a stone which one of Tom's heels flung back with such unlucky accuracy as to lit Brady right in the mouth, knocking out one of his eye teeth (which I do not recollect) Bridy chipped his hand to his mouth, and bawled, as any man might do in such a case, so loud that Miss Dosy checked Iom for a minute, to turn round, and there she saw him making the most horrid faces in the world, his mouth streaming blood, and himself painted green from head to foot with as pretty a coat of shining slime as was to be found in the province of Munster "That's the gentle man you just leapt over, Miss Dosy," said I, for I liad joined her, "and he seems to be in some confusion " "I am sorry," said she, "Bob, that I should have in any way offended him or any other gentleman by leaping over him, but I can't wait now Take him my compliments, and tell him I should be happy to see him at tea nt six o'clock this evening, in a different suit " Off she went, and I rode back with her message (by which means I was thrown out), and, would you believe it, he had the ill manners to say "the h-," but I shall not repeat what he said It was impolite to the last degree, not to say profine, but perhaps he may be somewhat excused under his peculiar circumstances There is no knowing what even Job lumself might have said immediately after having been thrown off his hoise into a green pool, with his eye tooth knocked out, his mouth full of mud and blood, on being asked to a tea party

'He-Bridy, not Job-went, nevertheless-for, on our return to Miss Dosy's lodgings we found a triangular note, beautifully perfumed, expressing his gratitude for her kind invitation, and telling her not to think of the slight accident which had occurred. How it happened, he added, he could not conceive, his more never having broken down with him before-which was true enough as that was the first day he ever mounted her-nnd she having been bought by himself nt a sale of the Earl of Darlington's horses last year, for two hundred guincas She was a great favourite, he went on to say, with the Earl, who often rode her, and ran nt Doncaster by the name of Miss Russell All this latter part of the note was not quite so true, but then it must be admitted that when we talk about horses we are not tied down to be exact to n letter If we were, God help Tattersal's

'To tea, accordingly, the ensign came at six, wiped elean, and in a different set out altogether from what he appeared in on emerging from the ditch. He was, to make use of a phrase introduced from the motion Latin into the modern Greek, togged up in the most approved style of his Majesty's Forty eighth foot. Bright was the scarlet of his cont—deep the blue of his facings.'

'I beg your pardon,' said Antony Harrison, licre in terrupting the speaker, 'the Forty eighth are not royals, and you ought to know that no regiment but those which are royal sport blae facings. I remember, once upon a time, in a coffee shop, detecting a very smart fellow, who wrote some clever things in a Magazine published in Edinburgh by one Blackwood, under the character of a military man, not to be anything of the kind, by his talking about ensigns in the fusileers—all the world knowing that in the fusileers there are no ensigns, but in their place second heutenants. Let me set you right there, Bob, the facings your friend Brady exhibited to the wondering gaze of the Mallow tea table must have been buff—pale buff.'

Buff, black, blue, brown, yellow, Pompadour, brick dust, no matter what they were,' continued Barke, in no wise pleased by the interruption, 'they were as bright as they could be made, and so was all the lace, and other traps which I shall not specify more minutely, as I am in presence of so sharp a critic. He was, in fact, in full dress-as you know is done in country quarters-and being not a bad plan and elevation of a nian, looked well enough. Miss Dosy, I perceived, had not been perfectly ignorant of the rank and condition of the gentleman over whom she had leaped, for she was dressed in her purple satin body and white skirt, which she always put on when she wished to be irresistible, and her hair was suffered to flow in long ringlets down her fair neck-and, by Jupiter ' it was fair as a swan's, and as majestic too-and no mistake. Yes! Dosy Macnamara looked divine that evening

'Never mind! Tea was broaght in by Mary Keefe, and it was just as all other teas have been and will be. Do not, however, confound it with the wafer sliced and hot watered abominations which are inflicted, perhaps justly, on the wretched individuals who are guilty of haunting soirées and conversaziones in this good and bad The tea was congou or souchong, or city of London some other of these Chinese affairs, for anything I know to the contrary, for, having dined at the house, I was mixing my fifth tumbler when tea was brought in, and Mrs Machaniara begged me not to disturb inyself, and she being a lady for whom I had a great respect, I complied with her desire, but there was a potato cake, an inch thick and two feet in diameter, which Mrs Macaamara informed me in a whisper was made by Dosy after the hunt.

"Poor chicken," she said, "if she had the strength, she has the willingness, but she is so delicate. If you saw her handling the potatoes to day."

"Madam," said I, looking tender and putting my hand on my heart, "I wish I was a potato!"

'I thought this was an uncommonly pathetic wish, after the manner of the Persian poet Hafiz, but it was scarcely out of my month when Ensign Brady, taking a cup of tea from Miss Dosy's hand, looking upon me with an air of infinite condescension, declared that I must be the happiest of men, as my wish was granted before it was made. I was preparing to answer, but Miss Dosy laughed so loud that I had not time, and my only resource was to swallow what I had just made. The ensign followed up his victory without mercy.'

See the Life by R. W. Montagu, prefixed to Maginn's Miscel Innes (2 vols. 1885). The Gallery was republished in 1874 and edited by Bates, in 1883.

Francis Sylvester Mahony (1804-66), the creator of Father Prout and the Oliver Yorke of Fraser's Magazine, was, like Maginn, a native of Cork, and even more scholarly, accomplished, versatile, witty, and gifted with facile and felicitous utterance in prose and verse. He was educated at St Acheul, the Jesuit college at Amiens, and in Paris, among the Jesuits he lived, as he said, in an atmosphere of Latin, and became a first rate Latin scholar He was admitted to the Society, taught in an Irish college, but for extraordinarily unconventional irregularities in a seminarist (including coursing and deep drinking) was pronounced to be no longer a Jesuit in 1830, and, obtaining with some difficulty priest's orders in 1832, offi ciated at Cork. But erelong he quarrelled with his bishop, and, settling in London, became one of the writers in Fraser's Magazine, and during 183,1-36 he contributed a series of papers, afterwards collected as The Religues of Father Prout From the gay tavern life of the 'Fraserians,' Maliony went abroad and travelled, 1837-41, in Hungary, Greece, and Asia Minor He became in 1846 Roman correspondent of the Daily News, and his letters were in 1847 collected and published as Facts and Figures from Italy, by Don Jeremy Savonarola, Benedictine Monk For the last eight years of his life-quite Bohemian, though latterly his wit became more caustic and his ways less sociable—he lived chiefly in Paris, and was the correspondent of the Globe, his letters forming the chief attraction of that journal died reconciled to the Church. A volume of Final Memorials of Father Prout, published in 1876 by Blanchard Jerrold, sufficiently illustrated Mahony's wonderful facility in Latin composition, his wit, quaint sayings, genial outbursts of sentiment, pathos, absurdity and satire jumbled together and a certain reverence for religion among all his convivialities James Hannay said of him 'Mahoney's fun is essentially Irish-fanciful, playful, odd, irregular, and more grotesque than Northern fun In one of his own phrases, he is an Irish potato, seasoned with Attic salt.'

Much of the fun of the Reliques arises out of Father Prout's regretful proof that the best songs of some of the most admired modern authors are the merest plagiarisms or translations from uncient Greek, medieval Latin, or old French originals, which he solemnly produces with dates and all necessary particulars to authenticate them-the poems and the facts all alike out of his own head And he often pursued his jest beyond the limits prescribed by piety to the dead and by good taste, and the fun evaporates in tedium or annoyance Father Prout declares himself to have been the son of Dean Swift by Stella, to whom the Dean had been privately married, and the Dean's mad ness was wholly occasioned, not by the causes usually alleged, but by the kidnapping of this (purely supposititious) son by William Wood, the halfpenny hero whom Swift denounced. In the article Wolfe (Vol II p 788) we have given a verse of Father Prout's French original for 'The Burial of Sir John Moore' 'John Anderson, my jo,' was a mere translation by Buris into Scotch of the Latin original, duly produced by the Admirable Crichton—the Scotch version is even extended to seven verses. The good Father lind special joy in proving Moore's 'Irish Melodies' to be the merest translations from Greek, Latin, or French, as the case might be. This is part of a chapter of the Reliques.

From 'The Rogueries of Tom Moore'

The Blarney stone in my neighbourhood has attracted hither many an illustrious visitor, but none has been so assiduous a pilgrim in my time as Tom Moore. While he was engaged in his best and most unexceptionable work on the melodious ballads of his country, he came regularly every summer, and did me the honour to share He knows well how often my humble roof repeatedly he plagued me to supply him with original songs which I had picked up in France among the merry troubidours and carol loving inhabitants of that once happy had, and to what extent he has transferred these foreign inventions into the 'Irish Melodies' Like the robber Cacus, he generally dragged the plundered cattle by the tail, so as that, moving backwards into his cavern of stolen goods, the foot tracks might not lead to detection Some songs he would turn upside down, by a figure in rhetoric talled votepor trottepor, others he would dis guise in various shapes, but he would still worry me to supply him with the productions of the Gallie muse, 'for, d'ye see, old Prout,' the rogue would say,

'The best of all ways
To lengthen our lays,
's to steal a few thoughts from the French

Is to steal a few thoughts from the French, "my dear "'

Now I would have let him enjoy unmolested the renown which these 'Melodies' have obtained for him, but his last treachery to my round tower friend [a bogus plagin rism from an Irish antiquary] has raised my bile, and I shall give evidence of the unsuspected robberies

'Abstract reque boves abjurat reque rapin re Coclo ostendentur'

It would be easy to point out detrehed fragments and stray metaphors, which he has scattered here and there in such gay confusion that every page has within its limits a mass of felony and plagarism sufficient to lining him. For instance, I need only advert to his 'Bard's Legrey' Even on his dying bed this 'dying bard' cannot help indulging his evil pranks, for, in bequeathing his 'heart' to his 'mistress dear,' and recommending her to 'borrow' balmy drops of port wine to bathe the relie, he is all the while robbing old Clement Marot, who thus disposes of his remains

'Quand je suis mort, je veux qu'on m'entere Dans la cave ou est le vin, Le corps sous un tonneau de Madère, Et la bouche sous le robin'

But I won't strain at a gnat when I can capture a camel—a huge dromedary laden with pilfered spoil, for, would you believe it if you had never learned it from Prout, the very opening and foremost song of the collection, 'Go where glory waits thee,' is but a literal and servile translation of an old French ditty which is nmong my papers, and which I believe to have been composed by that beautiful and interesting 'ladye,' I rançoise de Foix, Comtesse de Chateaubriand, born in 1491, and the favourite of Francis I, who soon abandoned her, indeed, the lines appear to anticipate his infidelity. They were written before the battle of Pavia

Chanson de la Comtesse de Chateaubriand à François I

Vn ou la gloire t'invite,
Et quand d'orgueil pulpite
Ce cœur, qu'il pense à moi '
Quand I cloge enslumme
Toute l'ardeur de ton ame,
Pense encore à moi '
Autres charmes peut être
Tu voudras connuitre,
Autre amour en maître
Regnera sur toi,
Mais quand ta levre presse
Celle qui te caresse,
Mechant, pense a moi '

Tom Moore's Translation of this Song in the Go where glory waits thee,

But while fame elates thee,
Oh, still remember me!
When the praise thou meetest
To thine ear is sweetest,
Oh, then remember me!
Other arms may press thee,
Dearer friends caress thee—
All the joys that bless thee Dearer far may be
But when friends are dearest,
And when joys are nearest,
Oh, then remember me!

A page or two later he gives the Latin original of 'Lesbia linth a beaming eye,' as written originally by himself, and sung by him to Moore in his parsonage of Watergrasshill ('Lesbia semper hic et inde Oculorum tela movit')

Mahony either in his own character or as Father Prout made really brilliant and melodious verse renderings from the classics and from the French and Italian, his renderings from Horace are in a wonderful and apt variety of the me and measure. Thus he renders the first verse of the Second Ode

Since Jove decreed in storms to vent
The winter of his discontent,
Thundering o'er Rome impenitent
With red right hand,
The flood gates of the firmament
Have drenched the land

And Ode Ninth begins thus

See how the winter blanches
Soracte's giant brow!
Hear how the forest branches
Groin from the weight of snow!
While the fixed ice impanels
Rivers within their channels

And he translated English songs, as we have seen, into most plausible Latin and French His translation of Gresset's Vert Vert, the Pairot, reads wonderfully like an Ingoldsby Legend. His chapter on 'Modern Latin Poets' contains articles on and translations from Vida, Sarbiewski, Beza, Sannazar, Fricastoro, George Buchman, and others. It is not always easy to know whether the Father is citing historical fact or giving pure imagination with circumstantial details, as in the case of 'the celebrated poem, De Connubus Florum,' by Diarmid M'Encroe from Kerry, published at Paris in 1727, which was the sole original of Erasmus Darwin's Loves of the Plants 'The Groves of Blarney' would seem to exist in Greek, Latin, French, and old Irish MSS, of we believe this veracious authority. He may, like one of his protégés, be said 'to have defied the Royal Irish Academy, a learned assembly which, alas! has neither a body to be kicked nor a soul to be damned? 'The Shandon Bells' was one of the songs sung by Father Prout to Tom Moore, and on it, we are told, the ungracious guest, without acknowledgment, rings the changes in his 'Evening Bells'

The Shandon Bells

With deep affection
And recollection,
I often think of Those Shandon bells,
Whose sounds so wild would,
In the days of childhood,
Fing round my cridle
Their magic spells

On this I ponder
Where'er I wander,
And thus grow fonder,
Sweet Cork, of thee,
With thy bells of Shandon,
That sound so grand on
The pleasant waters
Of the river Lee

I've heard bells elaming, Full many a clime in, Tolling sublime in Cathedral shane, While at a glib rate, Brass tongues would vibrate-But all their music Spol e nought like thine, I or memory dwelling On each proud swelling Of the belfry knelling Its bold notes free. Made the bells of Shandon Sound far more grand on The pleasant waters Of the river Lec

I've heard bells tolling Old 'Adrian's Mole' in. Their thunder rolling From the Vatican, And eymbals glorious Swinging uprorrious In the gorgeous turrets Of Notre Dame But thy sounds were sweeter Than the dome of Peter Tlings o'er the Tiber, Pealing solemnly -O the bells of Shandon Sound far more grand on The pleasant waters Of the river Lee

There's a bell in Moscow, While on tower and knosk O, In Saint Sophia, The Turkman gets, And loud in air Calls men to prayer, From the tapering summits Of tall minarets Such empty phantom I freely grant them, But there is an anthem More dear to me-'Tis the bells of Shandon, That sound so grand on The pleasant waters Of the river Lee

Besides the volume of Final Reliques, there is an edition of The Works of Father Prout by Charles Lent (1881).

Pierce Egan (1772-1849), a Londoner by birth, and the most popular sporting journalist of his day, is remembered as the author of Life in London, or the Days and Nights of Jerry Hawthorne and his elegant friend Cormthian Tom, a tale, or rather a series of sketches, which is said to have taken town and country by storm when it appeared in Thackeray has immortalised it in one of the best of his Roundabout Papers, where, however, he very fairly indicates its literary worth by confessing that on reperusal he found it 'a little sulgar," and as a description of the sports and amusements of London in the Regency days, 'more currous than amusing. Not a little of its interest is due to Cruikshank's illustrations. Its author, who spent his life in frequenting and reporting all the more notable races, prize fights, cock fights, cricket matches, and executions in Lugland, produced many other ephemeral works of a similar kind, among which Bostona (1818) and The Loves of Horzel and Perdila (the Prince Regent and Mary Robinson, 1814) may be mentioned also published in 1828 a continuation of Life in Londor (republished in 1871), mordising its theme and killing off or converting its characters son, Pierce Egan the vounger (1814-80), an etcher who illustrated his own and his father's works, was also a diligent journalist, and wrote more than twenty indifferent novels, one of which, The Snake is the Grass, published first in 1858, was reprinted in 1887

George Combe (1788-1858), phrenologist, was born, a brewers son, in Ldinburgh, and, bred a Writer to the Signet, practised till 1837, when he devoted himself to popularising his views on phrenology and education. A disciple of Spurzheim, he wrote two works on phrenology (1819 and 1824), one of shich passed through a dozen editions, but his most important was The Constitution of Mar. (1828, 12th ed 1900), which was violently opposed as materialist, subversive of the belief in immortality, and inimical to revealed religion He Inboured carnestly to reform education on rational and scientific principles travelled ind lectured at home, on the Continent, and in the United States, and published bools on popular education, moral philosophy, criminal legislation, currency questions, and the relation between science and religion. Combe's ideas on popular education, anticipating modern methods, were carried out for some years in a secular school which he founded in Edinburgh in 1848, where the sciences were systematically trught, including physiology—and, as was inevitable, phrenology He was an intunate friend of Robert Chambers, Richard Cobden, and Georgé Eliot, and his wife was a daughter of the great Mrs Siddons is a Life by Charles Gibbon (1878), and Combe's views and articles on Education were collected by Jolly (1879) George Combe wrote also a Life of his brother Andrew (1797-1847), physician to the king of the Belgians and to Queen Victoria, and author of a successful work on physiology Combe lectureship seeks to awaken public interest in the importance of physiology and hygiene in equication and morals

Thomas Erskine (1788-1870) of Linlathen was admitted advocate in 1810, but ceased to practise after his elder brother's death gave him the estate of Linlathen near Dundee He was a man of a warmly devotional religious temperament, and the main aim of his half dozen theological works, next to the promotion of pure religion and undefiled, was to maist on the ultimate universal salva tion of mankind, and to argue that the conscience, and not miracle, was the chief evidence for a divine revelation. He strongly supported Macleod Campbell, deposed by the Church of Scotland for his doctrine of universal pardon and atonement through Christ, and amongst his intimate friends were men so unlike in their theological sympathies as I D Maurice, Dean Stankey, Carlyle, Prévost-Paradol, Vinet, and the Monods See Erskine's Letters, edited by Dr Hanna (1877-78)

Sir Francis Palgrave (1788-1861) was long deputy keeper of the Public Records and an in defatigable student of our early history the son of Meyer Cohen, a Jewish stockbroker in London, but at his marriage (1823), having be come a Christian, he assumed his mother's maiden name of Palgrave lle was articled to a soli entor, in 1827 was called to the Bar, pleading mainly in pedigree cases before the House of I ords, was a frequent contributor to the reviews. and in 1831 contributed to Murray's 'Pamily Library' a History of England in the Anglo Sixon period. Next year appeared his Rive and Progress of the Erglist Commonwealth-a work which contains a mass of information regard ing the most obscure part of our annals, with original records concerning the political institutions of ancient Lurope. He afterwards wrote a more elaborate history, the last two volumes of which were published after his death-The Ilis tory of Normands and England (4 vols 18,1-64), which brings down the history to the death of Rufus England owes him a debt of grantide for the light he threw on the origin of its people and institutions. Hallain and Freeman, though dissenting from some of his conclusions, both highly praised his great achievement-that of making medicand history intelligible. He insisted, rightly, as Freeman says, that Furopean society and civilisation depended on the influence of Rome long after the fifth century, even when she had fallen and was 'tattered, sordid, and faded as was her imperial robe,' the chiefs of the barbarian dynasties assumed the semblance of the Casars, and employed their titles and symbols Francis, who was knighted in 1832 and was FRS, carefully arranged heretofore maccessible piles of national documents, reported on them as deputy-keeper, and edited for the Record Commission Calendars of the Treasury, Documents illustrative of the History of Scotland, &c, wrote on the feudal system, Truths and Fictions of the Middle Ages, and a Hand book for Travellers in Northern Italy His style was sometimes too discursive.—William Glifford Palgrave, Jesuit, traveller, consul, and author of books of travel, and Professor F T Palgrave, poet and critic, were his sons.

John Lewis Burckhardt (1784–1817), though he spent but a year or two in England, ranks almost as an English author in virtue of his books of travel, virtten by him in English and revised by English friends Born at Lausanne, he was educated at Neuchatel, Leipzig, and Gottingen In 1806 he brought an introduction from Blumenbach to Sir Joseph Banks, of the African Association, and in 1809 was sent to explore the interior of Africa At Aleppo he studied more than two years, then, disguised as an Oriental, he visited Palmyra, Damiscus, Lebinon, Nubia, and thence in 1814 as 'Sheikh Ibrahim' made the pilgrimage to Mecca, where, one of the first European Chris tians to enter the sacred city, he was accepted not only as a true believer but as a great Moslem scholar In 1815 he returned to Cairo, and in 1816 ascended Mount Sinai When at last on the point of joining the Fezzan caravan, the opportunity for which he had waited so long, he was carried off by dysentery at Cairo The records of his journeys (three series), with volumes on Bedouins and Wahabis and on Arabic proverbs, were published in 1819-30

William Scoresby (1789–1857), Arctic explorer, born at Cropton near Whitby, sailed to the Greenland seas as a boy with his father, a whaling captum, and himself made several vovages to the whaling-grounds. He attended Edinburgh University, carried on investigations in natural history, botany, meteorology, and magnetism, and published the results in The Arctic Regions (1820) and Magnetical Investigations (2 vols 1839–52). In 1822 he surveyed four hundred miles of the east coast of Greenland. After a course of study at Cambridge he was ordained (1825), and laboured at Liverpool, Exciter, and Bradford, but failing health compelled him to retire to Torquay in 1849. He was D.D., and was elected F.R.S. in 1824. There is a Life of him by his nephew (1861).

Charles Knight (1791-1873), author and publisher was the son of a Windsor bookseller, and with his father he in 1811 established the Windsor and Eton Eapress, editing it until 1821, and at the same time printing the Etonian. The Plain Englishman (1820-22), a first attempt to produce good cheap literature, was jointly edited by Knight and Commissioner Locker of Greenwich Hospital In London from 1822 on, Knight, now a general publisher, founded Knight's Quarterly Magazine. I or the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge he published many works and serials, including the Penny Magazine (1832-45). The Penny Cyclopædia was begun in 1838, and was followed by the English Cyclopædia (1854-61), the British Almanac, and its Companion He edited a Pictorial Shakespeare, and wrote a Life of Shake speare. Other works were The Land IVe Live In, Once Upon a Time, and Knowledge is Power In 1862 he completed his Popular History of England Half-hours with the Best Authors, Half hours of English History, and Half-hours with the Best Letter-writers were compilations by himself, and from 1860 he was publisher of the London Gazette He wrote autobiographical Passages of a IVorking Life (1863-65), and there is a Life of him by Alice Clowes (1892)

Dionysius Lardner (1793-1859), after serving for four years as clerk to his father, a Dublin solicitor, studied at Trinity College. He attracted attention by works on algebraic geometry (1823) and the calculus (1825), but 15 best known as the originator and editor of Lardner's Cyclopædia (132 vols 1830-44). This was followed by the historical Cabinet Library (12 vols 1830-32) and Muscum of Science and Art (12 vols 1854-56) Lardner had been appointed Professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in University College, London, but in 1840, married man though he was, he ran away with the wife of an army officer, and went to the United States, where he made £40,000 by lecturing He lived in Paris from 1845 to 1859, and died at Naples He was not related to Nathaniel Lardner (Vol. II p 247)

Sir Francis Bond Head (1793-1875), born of Portuguese-Jewish ancestry at Higham in Kent, was educated at Rochester and Woolwich Academy, and served 1811-25 in the Engineers, being present at Waterloo Manager then of the unsuccessful La Plata Mining Company, he published Rough Notes taken during some Rapid Journeys across the Pampas and among the Andes (1827) The work was exceedingly popular, and the reputation of 'Galloping Head,' as the gay captain was termed, was increased by his Bubbles from the Brunnens of Nassau (1834) Governor of Upper Canada 1835-37, and created a baronet in 1836, he published a narrative of his not very successful administration, which was more amusing than con-Turning again to purely literary pursuits, Sir Francis wrote The Emigrant (1852), and a series of essays in the Quarterly Review, afterwards republished as Stokers and Pokers-Highways and Byways He wrote a Life of Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, for the 'Family Library' The national defences of this country appearing to Sir Francis lamentably deficient, he issued a note of warning, The Defenceless State of Great Britain Visits to Paris and Ireland produced A Faggot of Trench Sticks, or Paris in 1851, and A Fortnight in Ircland (1852) In 1869 he produced a practical work, The Royal Engineer -His brother, Sir George Hend (1782-1855), a Peninsular veteran, wrote Forest Scenery in the Walds of North America (1829), Home Tours in England, 1835-37, and some other works

Tawell the Murderer

Whatever may have been his fears, his hopes, his fancies, or his thoughts, there suddenly flashed along the wires of the electric telegraph, which were stretched close beside him, the following words 'A murder has just been committed at Salthill, and the suspected mur derer was seen to take a first class ticket for London by the train which left Slough at 7 h 42 m PM. He is in the garb of a Quaker, with a brown greatcoat on, which reaches nearly down to his feet. He is in the last compartment of the second first class carriage' And yet, fast as these words flew like lightning past him, the information they contained, with all its details, as well as every secret thought that had preceded them, had already consecutively flown millions of times faster, indeed, at the very instant that, within the walls of the little cottage at Slough, there had been uttered that dreadful scream, it had simultaneously reached the judgment seat of heaven !

On arriving at the Paddington station, after mingling for some moments with the crowd, he got into an omni bus, and as it rumbled along, taking up one passenger and putting down another, he probably felt that his identity was every minute becoming confounded and con fused by the exchange of fellow passengers for strangers that was constantly taking place. But all the time he was thinking, the cad of the omnibus-1 policeman in disguise-knew that he held his victim like a rit in a cage. Without, however, apparently taking the slightest notice of him, he took one sixpence, gave change for a shilling, handed out this lady, stuffed in that one, until, arriving at the Bank, the guilty man, stooping as he walked towards the carriage door, descended the steps paid his fare, crossed over to the Duke of Wellington's statue, where pausing for a few moments, anxiously to gaze around him, he proceeded to the Jeru salem Cossee house, thence over London Bridge to the Leonard Coffee house in the Borough, and finally to a lodging house in Scott's Yard, Cannon Street. He probably fancied that, by making so many turns and doubles, he had not only effectually puzzled all pur suit, but that his appearance at so many coffee houses would assist him, if necessary, in proving an alibi, but, whatever may have been his motives or his thoughts, he had scarcely entered the lodging when the policemanwho, like a wolf, had followed him every step of the way-opening the door, very calmly said to him-the words no doubt were infinitely more appalling to him even than the scream that had been haunting him-'Haven't you just come from Slough?' The monosyl lable 'No,' confusedly uttered in reply, substantiated his guilt. The policeman made him his prisoner, he was thrown into jail, tried, found guilty of wilful marder, and hanged

A few months afterwards we happened to be travel ling by rul from Paddington to Slough, in a carriage filled with people all strangers to one another. Like English travellers, they were all mute. For nearly fifteen miles no one had uttered a single word, until a short bodied, short necked, short nosed, exceedingly respectable looking man in the corner, fixing his eyes on the apparently flecting posts and rails of the electric telegraph, significantly nodded to us as he muttered aloud. 'Them's the cords that hung John Tawell!'

(From Stokers and Pokers)

John Edmund Reade (1800-70), son of the squire of Barton Manor in Berkshire, published in 1825 The Broken Heart and other Poems, followed by a series of epics, tragedies, and novels, including Cain the Wanderer and the Revolt of the Angels (1830), Italy (1838), and Catiline (1839) In much of his verse he modelled himself closely on Byron, not hesitating to plagrarise pretty extensively, passages and phrases can also be traced directly to Scott and Wordsworth, as well as to many other English authors ancient and modern

Sir Roderick Impey Murchison (1792-1871) was born at Tarradale, Ross shire, and educated at Durham and the Military College, Great Marlow, he served in Spain and Portugal, and was present at Vimeiro and Corunna the army in 1816, he devoted himself to geology, and erelong his establishment of the Silurian system won him the Copley Medal and European fame, increased by his exposition of the Devonian, Permian, and Laurentian systems He explored parts of Germany, Poland, and the Carpathians, and in 1840-45, with others, carried out a geological survey of the Russian Empire. It was now that, struck with the resemblance between the Ural Mountains and some Australian ranges, he startled the world by foreshadowing (1844) the discovery of gold in Australia. In 1855 he was made director-general of the Geological Survey and director of the Royal School of Mines His investigations into the crystalline schists of the Highlands led him to a theory (not free from important error) of regional metamorphism on a large scale. He was Vice-President of the Royal Society, and President of the Geological Society and of the British Association (1846), a KCB from 1846, he was made a baronet in 1863 principal works were The Silurian System (1839) and The Geology of Russia in Europe and the Urals (1845, 2nd ed 1853) There is a Life of him by Sir Archibald Geikie (1875)

Albany William Fonblanque (1793-1872), son of a London Commissioner of Bankruptcy and great-grandson of a naturalised Huguenot, was bred a lawyer, but soon became a journalist, writing for the Times and other papers As editor from 1830 of the Examiner, he exercised great influence on public opinion, his best articles were reprinted as England under Seven Administrations (1837) In 1847 he became Statistical Secretary to the Board of Trade There is a Life of him (1874)

William Hamilton Maxwell (1792-1850), the first conspicuous writer of the roistering, rollicking military novels Lever was afterwards identified with, was a Newry Ulsterman, Scottish both on the father's and the mother's side He studied—or enjoyed life—at Trinity College, Dublin, and as captain fought in the Peninsula and at Waterloo

Country sports exhausted his finances, and in 1820 he took orders and was presented to the rectory of Ballagh in Connemara. His novel of O'Hara was followed by his Wild Sports of the West (1832), and that by Stories from Waterloo Though his congregation was practically non extant and his duties were nominal, he was ultimately deprived for Having produced a score of works, non residence including a Life of the Duke of Wellington and a history of the Irish rebellion, but none of them bearing remotely on theology, he died at Musselburgh in Midlothian Dr Maginn prefixed a Life of him to an edition of his Erin go-Bragh, or Irish Life Pictures (2 vols 1859)

John Hamilton Reynolds (1796-1852) was born at Shrewsbury, educated at St Paul's, and practised law in London pretty regularly till about 1840, when he accepted a post as clerk to the County Court at Newport in the Isle of Wight Devotion to literature interfered with his pro fessional success, as early as 1814 he liad pub lished poems, and these were followed by several volumes of poetry - The Natad (1816), The Garden of Florence, from Boccaccio (1821)-in which he showed successively the influence of Byron, Scott, Wordsworth, Leigh Hunt, Keats, and Shelley produced also several farces, a burlesque of Words worth's Peter Bell, and some humorous poems He is best remembered as the intimate friend of Keats, who wrote many letters to him and a poetical epistle. One of Reynolds's best sonnets is addressed to Keats, and Reynolds was for a time associated with his brother in law, Thomas Hood, in some of his literary ventures. He latterly wrote for the magazines, and till 1831 was one of the proprictors of the Athenaum

John Abraham Heraud (1799–1887), an author of curious and varied erudition, was born in I ondon of Huguenot stock, studied in Germany, and sought to make Schelling's philosophy known in England He had begun writing for the magazines, and in 1820 published his first Later he made two attempts at epic grandeur in his poems, The Descent into Hell (1830) and Judgment of the Flood (1834) He was also a contributor to the drama, having written several tragedies, one of which, Videna, was suc cessfully acted in 1854 Mr Heraud was in poetry what Martin was in art, a worshipper of the vast, the remote, and the terrible. His Descent and Judgment are psychological curiosities, displaying much misplaced intellectual and poetic power Mr Herrud published also books on Savonarola and Shakespeare, books of travel and history, an historical romance, lyrical ballads, sonnets, and The If ar of Ideas, a poem on the Franco Prussian war, and The Sibyl among the Tombs (1886) He did much editorral and magazine work, and was dramatic critic for the Athenaum and for the Illustrated London News

Edward Irving (1792-1834) came at thirteen from Annan to the Edinburgh University, and after graduating in 1809 did school work for some years He had been Carlyle's schoolfellow at Annan, and the two friends were teachers in Kirkcaldy at the same time, and everybody knows how ultimately Carlyle married the pupil to whom Irving had lost his heart when teaching at Haddington Licensed to preach, in 1819 he was appointed assistant to Dr Chalmers in Glasgow In 1822 he was called to the Caledonian Church, Hatton Garden, London, his success as a preacher there was such as had never been known Quincey thought him 'the greatest orator of his times,' Coleridge was an intimate, Canning heard the Scotch minister preach the 'most eloquent sermon he ever listened to,' Scott, meeting him at a dinner-table, 'could hardly keep his eyes off him,' Hazlitt and Wordsworth were more or less attracted by this meteor, and around him in London, as Carlyle said, were 'mad extremes of flattery, followed by madder contumely, by indiffer ence and neglect' In 1825 he began to announce his convictions in regard to the imminent second advent of Christ, this was followed by the trans lation of The Coming of the Messiah (1827), by 'Aben Ezra'—really the work of a Spanish Jesuit. Before 1828, when his Homilies on the Saciaments appeared, he had begun to elaborate his views of the Incirnation, and he was charged with heresy as maintaining the sinfulness of Christ's nature. He was now deep in the prophecies, and when in the beginning of 1830 he heard of extra ordinary manifestations of prophetic power in Dumbartonshire, he gladly believed them was arraigned before the (Scottish) Presbytery of London in 1830 and convicted of heresy, ejected from his new church in Regent's Square in 1832, and finally deposed in 1833 by the Presbytery of Annan, which had licensed him The majority of his congregation adhered to him, and a new communion, the Catholic Apostolic Church, was developed, commonly known as Irvingite, though Irving had little to do with the establishment of its doctrine, ritual, or hierarchy Shortly after his health failed, and soon after returning to Scot land he died of consumption Irving's works hardly betray the secret of his power, which was partly due to his imposing figure and commanding personality His books are almost all written in a rhetorical and evalted style, not without really majestic and noble passages Their titles are significant of his eschatological monomanin-For the Oracles of God, For Judgment to Come, The Last Days, and the like.

True Political Reformation

Almost all the high genius and enterprise of this age, at home and abroad, calculate that these effects which we claim for divine government will result from political reformation, and they have drawn after them the sympathies of by far the most disinterested part of onr nation, with whom the watchword of domestic and foreign renovation is well balanced and well administered political institutions Now, from all I can understand and learn of the nature of civil polity, it will stretch no farther than to protect and defend us in our several rights, and when it would enter farther in, to take an oversight of our private, our domestic, our personal con duct, it then becomes tyranny Why, then, should there be any dispute between us and the politicians, or why should they scowl on us, and we look scowling back on them? Let them mind the ontworks and defences of each man's encampment, guard the crust of priests and the power of governors from coming in to molest it, we will in the meantime set all things in order within the poor man's cottage, which their good endeavours have made to be revered as 'the poor man's castle' Let them keep the king from daring to enter it, we will endeavour to keep the devil from daring to enter it And in our turn we will do them as good a service as they have done us, for we will touch the lethargic bosoms of the sluggish people with the Promethean spark of religion, which persecution and power cannot quench, and which will light and feed the lamp of freedom when need be, we will give them a people fearful of no one save God, armed in religion and virtue, which alone are incorruptible by the bribes, reckless of the power, and more terrible to the measures of wicked governors than an army with banners-a people who will stand for hberty on the earth and shape themselves for glory in And we will satisfy the legislators no less than the reformers, we will give them a people obedient to wholesome laws, and examples of peaceable conduct to all around, but as refrictory against conscientious bonds or arbitrary measures as the Puntans and Covenanters were of old And we will satisfy the economists no less, for we will give them a people industrious upon prin ciple, independent upon principle, and who will refrain their natural instincts rather than cover a country with pauperism and misery

The Day of Judgment.

Imagination cowers her wing, unable to fetch the compass of the ideal scene. The great white throne descending out of heaven, guarded and begirt with the principalities and powers thereof—the awful presence at whose sight the heavens and the earth flee away, and no place for them is found—the shiking of the mother elements of nature, and the commotion of the hoary deep to render up their long dissolved dead—the rushing together of quickened men upon all the winds of heaven down to the centre, where the Judge sitteth on His blazing throne. To give form and figure and utterance to the mere circumstantial pomp of such a scene no imagination availeth. Nor doth the understanding labour less.

The Archangel, with the trump of God, riding sublime in the midst of heaven, and sending through the widest dominions of death and the grave that sharp summons which divideth the solid earth, and rings through the caverns of the hollow deep, piercing the dull, cold ear of death and the grave with the knell of their departed reign, the death of Death, the sprouting of the grave with vitality, the reign of life, the second birth of hving things, the reunion of body and soul—the one from unconscious sleep, the other from appreliensive and un quiet abodes—the congregation of all generations over whom the stream of time hath swept This outstretches my understanding no less than the material imagery confuses my imagination And when I bring the picture to my heart, its feelings are overwhelmed, when I fancy this quick and conscious frame one instant reawakened, the next reinvested, the next summoned before the face of the Almighty Judge-now begotten, now sifted through every secret corner, my poor soul possessed with the memory of its misdeeds, submitted to the scorching eye of my Maker, my fate depending upon His lips, my everlasting, changeless fate-I shriek and shiver with mortal apprehension, and when I fancy the myriads of men all standing thus explored and known, I seem to hear their shiverings like the aspen leaves in the still evening of autumn Pale fear possesseth every countenance, and blank conviction every quaking heart They stand like men upon the perilous edge of battle, withholden from speech and pinched for breath through excess of struggling emotions-shame, remorse, mortal apprehension, and trembling hope.

There was a collected edition of Irving's works (5 vols. 1864-65) his 'prophetical works' were separately edited (2 vols. 1867-70), and there was a volume of Miscellanies (1867). The standard Life is that by Mrs Olipliant (1862), Carlyle's Life Essays, and Reminiscences give an even more vivid picture of his fascination and his aberrations.

Augustus and Julius Hare, joint authors of the Guesses at Iruth, were the sons of the impoverished squire of Hurstmonceaux, who made a romantic marriage with the brilliant cousin of the Duchess of Devonshire, and lived mainly abroad, writing dramas, a novel, and histories of the Helvetic republics and of Germany during the Thirty Years' War Augustus William (1792-1834), born in Rome, was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, and became rector of Alton Barnes near Devizes Besides his share in the Guesses he left two volumes of sermons Julius Charles (1795-1855), born near Vicenza, from the Charterhouse passed in 1812 to Trinity 1 College, Cambridge, where he became a Fellow in 1818, and in 1822 classical lecturer orders in 1826, and succeeded his uncle in the rich family living of Hurstmonceaux, Sussex, in 1832, in 1844 married Frederick Denison Maurice's sister, became Archdeacon of Lewes in 1840, and in 1853 chaplain to the Queen annual charges awakened Englishmen to the fact that they had much to learn in theology from Germany, and helped to mark him out as a leader of the Broad Church party In 1820 he translated Fouque's Sintram, in 1827 he and his brother Augustus published anonymously Guesses at Truth -a volume of reflections, suggestions, and short essays on a great variety of subjects, varying in length from brief aphorisms like, 'Our poetry in the eighteenth century was prose, our prose in the seventeenth poetry,' to disquisitions of twenty pages on art, religion, literature, and philosophy In so far as they dealt with theological questions, they, like some of their other works, gave to many the impression that the brothers were dangerously liberal Unitari inism, Calvinism, and popery are equally condemned, Shakespeare, Bacon, Cole ridge, and Byron are commented on, Schleiermacher and Kant furnish matter for meditation, South and Voltaire are contrasted, and pregnant thoughts often relieve what now seem rather trite or commonplace elucubrations. The next work of Julius was the translation of Niebuhr's History of Rome (1828-32) in collaboration with Thirlwall, and his own l'indication of Niebulir's History (1829) In 1848 he published the Essays and Tales of his friend and somewhile curate, John Sterling, with a Memoir to which Carlyle's mas terpiece was meant to be a corrective-Carlyle holding that Hare made too much of Sterling as a doubting theologian and clergyman Hare wrote also a Vindication of Luther (1854) and several volumes of sermons The quotations are all from the Guesses

Wastefulness of Moral Gifts

Among the numberless marvels at which nobody marvels, few are more marvellous than the recklessness with which priceless gifts, intellectual and moral, are equandered and thrown away Often have I gazed with wonder at the produgality displayed by Nature in the cistus, which unfolds hundreds or thousands of its white -starry blossoms morning after morning, to shine in the light of the sun for an hour or two, and then fall to the ground But who, among the sons and daughters of men-gifted with thoughts 'which wander through eternity,' and with powers which have the godlike privilege of working good and giving happiness-who closs not daily let thousands of those thoughts drop to the ground and rot? Who does not continually leave his powers to driggle in the mould of their own leaves? The imagination can hardly conceive the heights of greatness and glory to which mankind would be raised if all their thoughts and energies were to be animated with a living purpose—or even those of a single people, or of the educated among a single people. But as in a forest of oaks, among the millions of acorns that fall every autumn, there may perhaps be one in a million that will grow up into a tree, somewhat in like manner it fires with the thoughts and feelings of man then must be our confusion when we see all these wasted thoughts and feelings rise up in the judgment and bear witness against us!

But how are we to know whether they are wasted or not? We have a simple, infallible test. Those which are laid up in any heavenly work, those whereby we in any way carry on the work of God upon earth, are not wasted. Those which are laid up on earth, in any mere earthly work, in earrying out our own ends or the ends of the Spirit of Fail, are heirs of death from the first, and can only rise out of it for a moment, to sink back into it for ever

Age lays open the Character

Age seems to take away the power of acting a character, even from those who have done so the most successfully during the main part of their lives. The real man will appear, at first fitfully, and then predominantly. Time spares the chiselled beauty of stone and inarble, but makes sad havoe in plaster and stucco.

Loss of the Village Green.

What a loss is that of the village green! It is a loss to the picturesque beauty of our English landscapes. A village green is almost always a subject for a painter who is fond of quiet home scenes, with its old, knotty, wide spreading onk or elm or ash, its gray church tower, its cottages scattered in pleasing disorder around, each looking out of its leafy nest, its flock of geese sailing to and fro across it. Where such spots are still found, they refresh the wayworn traveller, wearied by the intermin able hedge walls with which 'restless ownership'—to use an expression of Wordsworth's—excludes profane feet from its domain consecrated to Mammon

The main loss, however, is that to the moral beauty of our landscapes-that to the innocent, wholesome plea sures of the poor The village green was the scene of their sports, of their games It was the playground for It served for trapball, for encket, for their children manly humanising amusements, in which the gentry and farmers might unite with the peasantry How dreary is the life of the English husbandman noy! 'Double, double toil and trouble,' day after day, month after month, year after year, uncheered by sympathy, unen livened by a smile, sunless, moonless, starless He has no place to be merry in but the beer shop, no amusements but drunken brawls, nothing to bring him into innocent, cheerful fellowship with his neighbours. The stories of village sports sound like legends of a mythical age, prior to the time when 'Sabbathless Satan,' as Charles Lamb has so happily termed him, set up his throne in the land

For the Hares see the Memorials of a Quiet Life (1872), largely a life of Mrs Augustus Hare, by Mr A J C. Hare, a nephew of the brothers, and also the same authors supendous Autobiography (6 vols. 1896-1900). This Mr Hare is well known by his Walls in Rome and many other charming topographical works, his Two Noble Lives, and The Gurneys of Earlian

John Sterling (1806-43), born at Kames Castle, Bute, was the son of Captain Edward Sterling, at that time a farmer, but by-and by, settled in London, to be known as the 'thunderer' of the Times-not the editor, but a very influential contributor to the great journal sixteen John went to Glasgow University, and at nincteen to Cambridge, where he distinguished himself at the Union, he left without a degree in 1827, and soon was busy on the Athenaum, which he partly owned and with F D Maurice largely edited and wrote for a few months Influenced by Coleridge, and liberal in sympathies, he was nearly sailing on that crazy expedition to overthrow the tyrant, Ferdinand of Spain, which ended in the execution at Malaga of his friend General Torrijos and his own cousin He married in November 1830, but soon fell dangerously ill, and spent fifteen months in St Vincent In 1833 he published anonymously a novel, Arthur Coningsby, containing the ballad quoted below In 1833 he took orders, and served eight months as Julius Hare's curite at Hurstmon ceaux. His health again giving way, he resigned, and never advanced to priest's orders, the divergence between his opinions and the Church's soon widened beyond even Coleridgean accommodation He contributed, to Blackwood's and the IVestminster, planned tragedies (Strafford one of them, printed in 1843), and wrote poems, one of which, The Election, humorous or even comic rather than Crabbean, was published in 1841 An earlier poem was The Sexton's Daughter, a later one, a serio comic or Bernesque piece, unfinished, on Richard Cœur de Lion For Maga he wrote The Palace of Morgana, a singular prose poem were also remarkable essays on Montaigne and on Carlyle, which showed he had drifted farther from Broad-Church semi-orthodoxy He ultımately accepted some of the main positions of D F Strauss, and it is significant that the intimate of his later years, to whom he confided the guardianship of his son, was Francis William Newman In August 1838 he founded the (later so-called) Sterling Club, among whose members were Carlyle, Allan Cunningham, G C Lewis, Malden, Mill, Milnes, Spedding, Tennyson, Thirlwall, W H Thompson, and Venables Julius Hare edited his Essays and Tales (1848), with a Memoir, which seemed to Carlyle so inadequate, and as dealing with Sterling mainly as theologian and Christian clergyman, so misleading, that he himself undertook that masterpiece of biography which, more probably than any of Sterling's own writings, will preserve the memory of an interesting and significant personality

Ballad.

A maiden came gliding o'er the sea,
In a boat as light as boat could be,
And she sang in tones so sweet and free,
'O, where is the youth that will follow me?'
Her foreliead was white as the pearly shell,
Her form was finer than tongue can tell,
Her bosom heaved with a gentle swell,
And her voice was a distant vesper bell
And still she sang, while the western light
Fell on her figure so soft and bright,
'O, where shall I find the brave young sprite
That will follow the track of my boat to night?'
To the strand the youths of the village run,
When the witching song has scarce begun,

Tifteen bold lovers the maid has won.

They hoisted the sail, and they plied the oar, And away they went from their native shore, While the damsel's pinnace flew fast before, But never, O never! we saw them more

And ere the set of that evening's sun,

(From Arthur Coningsby )

Robert Vaughan (1795–1868), born in England but of Welsh descent, was Independent minister at Worcester and Kensington, Professor of History in London University 1830–43, and president of the Independent College at Manchester 1843–57. He founded the British Quarterly in 1845, and edited it till 1867. Among his score of books are, besides works in devotional and polemical theology, a Life of Wycliffe (1828), a History of England under the Stuarts (1840), and Revolutions in History (1859-63), and he edited an edition of Milton, with a Life.

Sir John Bowring (1792-1872) was born in Exeter, and on leaving school entered a merchant's office, where he pursued that course of polyglot study that enabled him ultimately to boast he knew two hundred languages and could speak a hundred The national poetry of different peoples had special attractions for him, and he translated folk songs of most of the languages of Europe, including not merely Dutch and Spanish, but Russian, Polish, Boliemian, Servian, and Hungarian (some of them by help of German 'cribs') In 1821 he formed a close friendship with Bentham, and in 1824 became the first editor of his Radical Westminster Review After visiting Switzerland, Italy, Egypt, Syria, and the countries of the Zollverein, he prepared valuable government reports on their commerce, and he sat in Parliament for Kilmarnock (1835-37) and for Bolton (1841-49), actively promoting the adoption of Free Trade From 1849 to 1853 he was British consul at Hong-kong, in 1854 he was knighted and made Governor His active policy in the 'affair of the lorcha Arrow,' involving the bombardment of Canton (1856), nearly upset the Palmerston Ministry In 1855 he concluded a commercial treaty with Siam, in 1858 made a tour through the Philippines, and his accounts of those two visits are about the most readable of thirty-six works. His own poems were accounted of less consequence than his translations (not merely the folk-songs, but from Goethe, Schiller, and Heine) But some of his religious poems and hymns found wide acceptance, and though in not a few his Unitarian theology repels the orthodox, the hymn 'In the cross of Christ I glory' is Catholic enough to have been written by Watts or Wesley, and is actually sung by Christians of all denominations His Autobiographical Reminiscences (1877) are hardly so entertaining as might have been expected

Henry Francis Lyte (1793-1847), author of 'Abide with me' and some others of the bestknown English hymns, was born at Ednam near Kelso, in Scotland, but was the son of an English officer, a member of a very ancient Somersetshire He was educated at Trinity College, family Dublin, and for twenty-four years laboured faithfully, in spite of feeble health, at Lower Brixham His best-known hymn was in Devonshire. written on the evening of the Sunday on which he for the last time administered the communion to his congregation before starting for that sojourn 'Jesus, 1 my at Nice whence he never returned cross have taken,' is another of his hymns, many of them are paraphrases of the Psalms, such as 'Pleasant are thy courts above,' 'Sweet is the solemn voice that calls,' 'Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven,' and 'God of mercy, God of grace.' His Poems, chiefly Religious (1833), were reprinted as Miscellaneous Poems (1868) There is a Life prefixed to the Remains (1850)

Sir Thomas Noon Talfourd (1795-1854), son of a biewer at Reading, was educated at its grammar-school under the famous Dr Valpy, was called to the Bar in 1821, and in 1833 got his silk As Serieant Talfourd he was conspicu ous for his popul ir eloquence and his Liberalism, and was Whig member for his native town 1835-41 and 1847-49, in 1849 he became a Justice of Com mon Pleas, and was knighted He wrote much for the reviews, was dramatic critic to a monthly, and produced books or long articles on Greek and Roman history and Greek poetry In 1835 he printed privately his tragedy of Iou, which was next year performed at Covent Garden Theatre His next tragedy, The Athenian Captive (1838), was almost equally successful, as was also The Massacri of Gleucoe (1840), The Castilian (1853) was only privately printed. He died of apoplexy while delivering his charge to the grand jury at Stifford Iou, his highest effort, rims (somewhat meffec tively) at reproducing the grandeur of the Greek drama, and its plot is a story embodying the Greek conception of destiny The oracle of Delphi had announced that the punishment of pestilence drawn down on the people by the misrule of the royal race could only be stayed by the destruction of Ion dedicates himself to the the royal stock business of slaying the tyrant, who falls by another hand, and Ion, discovered to be himself the son of the king, recognises his doom and patriotically accepts it. The play is not without poetry or power, but is, like the author's prose, too copious and rhetorical Not even Ion has lived on fourd is remembered as the admirer and the faithful friend and literary executor of Charles Lamb (see page 72), and as having published in two sections Lamb's Memoir (Letters, 1837, Final Memorials, 1848). This work—the standard and authoritative life-appeared in one volume in 1875, and again in 1892 Tulfourd helped Bulwer to edit Hazhtt's works, and he deserves honour for introducing in 1837 the Copyright Bill, which, amended, passed in 1842

Ion.

Ion, our sometime darling, whom we prized As a stray gift, by bounteous Heaven dismissed From some bright sphere which sorrow may not cloud, To make the happy happier I Is he sent To grapple with the miseries of this time, Whose nature such ethereal aspect wears As it would perish at the touch of wrong ! By no internal contest is he trained For such hard duty, no emotions rude Hath his clear spirit vanquished-Love, the germ Of his mild nature, hath spread graces forth, Expanding with its progress, as the store Of rambow colour which the seed conceals Sheds out its tints from its dim treasury, To flush and circle in the flower No tear Hath filled his eye save that of thoughtful joy When in the evening stillness lovely things Pressed on his soul too busily, his voice,

If in the earnestness of children sports
Raised to the tone of anger, checked its force,
As if it feared to break its being's law,
And faltered into music, when the forms
Of guilty passion have been made to live
In pictured speech, and others have waxed loud
In rightcons indignation, he hath heard
With sceptic smile, or from some slender vein
Of goodness, which surrounding gloom concented,
Struck simhight o'er it—so his life hath flowed
Trom its mysterious urn a sacred stream,
In whose calm depth the beautiful and pure
Alone are mirrored, which, though shapes of ill
May hover round its surface, glides in light,
And takes no shadow from them

Ion acclaimed King

Ion I thank you for your greetings—shout no more, But in deep silence ruse your hearts to heaven, That it may strengthen one so young and fruit As I am for the business of this hour — Must I sit here?

Medon My son! my son!
What hals thee? When thou shouldst reflect the joy
Of Argos, the strunge paleness of the grave
Marbles thy face

Ion Am I indeed so pale?

It is a solemn office I assume,
Which well may make me falter, yet sustained

By thee, and by the gods I serve, I take it—

[Sits on the threne.

Stand forth, Agenor

Agenor I await the will

Ion Io the I look as to the wisest friend
Of this afflicted people, thou must leave
Awhile the quiet which thy life has earned,
To rule our conneils, fill the seats of justice
With good men, not so absolute in goodness
As to forget what human frailty is,
And order my sad country

Igenor Pardon me—
Ion Nay, I will promise 'tis my last request,
Grant me thy help till this distracted state
Rise tranquil from her griefs—'twill not be long,
If the great gods smile on us now Remember,
Meanwhile, thou hast all power my word can give,
Whether I live or die.

Agenor Die! Ere that hour, May even the old man's epitaph be moss grown!

Ion Death is not jealous of the mild decay. That gently wins thee his exulting youth. Provokes the ghastly monarch's sudden stride, And makes his horrid fingers quick to clasp. His prey benumbed at noontide—Let me see The captain of the guard.

Crythes I kneel to crive II umbly the fivour which thy sire bestowed On one who loved him well

I cannot mark thee,
That wak'st the memory of my father's weakness,
But I will not forget that thou hast shared
The light enjoyments of a noble spirit,
And learned the need of luxury — I grant
For thee and thy brave comrades ample share
Of such rich treasure as my stores contain,
To grace thy passage to some distant land,

Where, if an honest cause engage thy sword, May glorious issues wait it In our realm We shall not need it louger

Cryther Dost intend
To banish the firm troops before whose valour
Barbarian millions shriuk appalled, and leave
Our city naked to the first assault
Of reckless foes?

No, Crythes, in ourselves, In our own honest hearts and chanless hauds, Will be our safeguard, while we do not use Our power towards others so that we should blush To teach our children, while the simple love Of justice and their country shall be born With dawning reason, while their sinews grow Hard 'midst the gladness of heroic sports, We shall not need, to guard our walls in peace, One selfish passion or one venal sword I would not grieve thee, but thy valiant troop-For I esteem them valiant-must no more With luxury which suits a desperate camp See that they embark, Agenor, Infect us Tre night

Crythes My lord-

Ion No more—my word liath passed — Medon, there is no office I can add
To those thou hast grown old in, thou wilt guard
The shrine of Phœbus, and within thy home—
Thy too delightful home—befriend the stranger
As thou didst me, there sometimes waste a thought
On thy spoiled inmate.

Medon Think of thee, my lord?

Long shall we triumph in thy glorious reign

Ion Prithee, no more. - Argives! I have a boon To crave of you Whene'er I shall rejoin In death the father from whose heart in life Stern fate divided me, think gently of him ' Think that beneath his panoply of pride Were fur affections crushed by bitter wrongs Which fretted him to madness, what he did, Alas ' ye know, could you know what he suffered, Ye would not curse his name Yet never more Let the great interests of the state depend Upon the thousand chances that may sway A piece of human frailty, swear to me That ye will seek hereafter in yourselves The means of sovereignty our country's space, So liappy in its smallness, so compact, Needs not the magic of a single name Which wider regions may require to draw Their interest into one, but, circled thus, Like a hlest family, by simple laws May tenderly be governed-all degrees, Not placed in dexterous balance, not combined By bonds of parchment or by iron clasps, ~ But blended into one-a single form Of nymph like loveliness, which finest chords Of sympathy pervading, shall endow

That ye will do this!

Medon Wherefore ask this now?

Thou shalt live long, the paleness of thy face,

Which late seemed death like, is grown radiant now,

Of foreign power should threaten Swear to me

With vital beauty, tint with roseate bloom

With one brave impulse, if ambitious bands

In times of happy peace, and bid to flash

And thine eyes kindle with the prophecy Of glorious years

Yet I will use the function of a king,
And claim obedience Swear that if I die
And leave no issue ye will seek the power
To govern in the free born people's choice,
And in the prudence of the wise

Medon and others We swear it !

Ion Hear and record the oath, immortal powers!

Now give me leave a moment to approach

That alter unattended [He goes to the alter

Gracious gods!

In whose mild service my glad youth was spent,
Look on me now, and if there is a power,
As at this solumn time I feel there is,
Beyond ye, that hall breathed through all your shapes
The spirit of the beautiful that lives
In earth and heaven, to ye I offer up
This conscious being, full of life and love,
For my dear country's welfare Let this blow
End all her sorrows' [Stabs himself]

Clementhe [rushing for-vard]. Hold 'Let me support him—stand away—indeed I have best right, although ye know it not, To cleave to him in death

Ion This is a joy I did not liope for—this is sweet indeed Bend thine eyes on me!

Clem And for this it was Thou wouldst have weaned me from thee! Couldst thou think

I would be so divorced?

Ion Thon art right, Clemanthe—
It was a shallow and an idle thought,
'Tis past, no show of coldness frets us now,
No vain disguise, my girl I et thou wilt think
On that which, when I feigned, I truly spoke—Wilt thou not, sweet one?

Clem I will treasure all

Irus [entering] I bring you glorions tidings—

Ha! no joy

Can enter here

Ion \ \ cs--is it as I hope?

Irus The pestilence abates

Ion [springing to his fee'] Do ye not hear?

Why shout ye not? ye are strong—think not of me

Hearken! the curse iny ancestry had spread

O'er Argos is dispelled!—My own Clemanthe!

Let this console thee—Argos lives again—

The offering is accepted—all is well!

Henry Fothergill Chorley (1808-72), born of Quaker stock near Wigin in Lancashire, was educated at Liverpool, and became musical critic on the staff of the Athenaum, which he joined in 1833. He was also a literary critic, a verse writer, a playwright, and a novelist, producing three dramas and four or five artificial and long-forgotten romances, the earliest of which were Conti (1835) and The Lion (1839), and the latest Roccabella (1859). His best work, and that by which he is remembered, is found in his Music and Manners in France and Germany (1841) and his charming Thirty Years' Musical Recollections (1862). He was a keen but rather acrid critic of music and literature, and a strenuous foe of Berlioz and Wagner His Autobiography was edited by H G Hewlett in 1873

Cliot Warburton (1810-52), born at Aughrim, County Galway, was the son of the Inspector-General of Constabulary in Ireland He studied it I rinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the Bar, but soon devoted himself to literature, travel, and the improvement of his Irish estates In 1843 he made the tour in the East of which the record, first printed in the Dublin University Magazine (then edited by Charles Lever) in that year and the next, was issued at the end of 1844 in its finished form as The Crescent and the Cross Singularly enough it was in 1844 also that Warburton's friend and fellow pupil, Kinglake, published Lothen, the book with which it is naturally compared and which it in many ways resembles—a book rather of im pressions and experiences and opinions than of objective description and detail. From the first it was greeted with acclamation for 'its glowing descriptions of the East, was by contemporary criticism voted equal to Beckford at his best, and was soon declared (by Sir Archibald Alison) to be 'indelibly engraven on the national mind' Modern critics have said that it might well be used as a (glorified) guide-book to Egypt, and have found in it clear suggestions of improvements put into practice under the British occupation The style is elaborate and eloquent, with too many purple patches and too much 'fine writing' By the end of the century it had gone through a score of editions, and was still being from time to time reprinted Warburton published in 1849 The Memoirs of Prince Rupert and the Cavaliers, in 1850 an unsuccessful novel, Reginald Hastings, dealing with the same period, and in 1851, shortly before starting on his last and fatal voyage, another historical romance, Darien, dealing with Paterson and his Scots fellow adventurers, and, ominously, describing a fire at sea. He edited the Memoirs of Horace Walpole and his Contemporaries by N F Williams, and Hochelaga, or England in the New World, a brightly written description of Canada by his brother, Major George Warburton, who was also the author of The Conquest of Canada and of a Memoir of the famous Earl of Peter-In 1851 Eliot Warburton (whose full name was Bartholomew Elliott George Warburton, though he used the abridged form as nom de guerra) had been deputed by the Atlantic and Pressic function Company to visit the Indians of the 1sthmus of Darien, establish a friendly understanding with them, and make himself thoroughly acquainted with their country. He sailed in the Amazon steamer, and was among the passengers who perished by fire on board that ill fated ship

Woman in the Hareem

The Eastern woman seems as happy in her lot as her European sister, notwithstanding the plurality of wives that her lord indulges in or ventures upon. her 'public opinion's law' there is no more disparage ment in occupying the second place as a wife than there is in Europe as a daughter. The manners of patriarchal ages remain in Egypt as unchanged as its monuments, and the people of Cairo think as little of objecting to a man's marrying a second wife as those of Memphis of questioning the legitimacy of Joseph The Koran, following the example of the Jewish doctors, allows only four waves to each Mussulman, and even of this limited allowance they seldom avail themselves to its Some hareems contain two hundred fullest extent. females, including wives, mothers in law, concubines, and the various slaves belonging to each, but these feminine barracks seem very different from what such establishments would be in Europe, in the hareem there is as much order and decorum as in an English Quaker's home it is guarded as the tiger guards his young, but its inmates consider this as a compliment, and fancy themselves neglected if not closely watched This cause for complaint seldom occurs, for the Egyptian has no blind confidence in the strength of woman's character or woman's love He holds to the aphorism of Maliomet in this matter, 'If you set butter in the sun, it will surely melt,' and considers it safer, if not more glorious, to keep her out of the reach of tempta tion than to run the chance of her overcoming it when exposed to its encounter

Born and brought up in the harcem, women never seem to pine at its imprisonment like cage born birds, they sing among their bars, and discover in their arranes a thousand little pleasures invisible to eyes that have a wider range. To them in their calm seclusion the strifes of the battling world come softened and almost bushed, they only hear the far off murmur of life's stormy sea, and if their human lot dooms them to their cares, they are as transient as those of childhood

Let them laugh on in their happy ignorance of a better lot, while round them is gathered all that their lord can command of luxury and pleasautness wealth is hourded for them alone, and the time is weary that he passes away from his home and his harcem The sternest tyrants are gentle there, Mehemet Alı never refused a woman's prayer, and even Alı Pasha was partly humanised by his love for Emineh time of the Mamelukes erininals were led to execution blindfolded, because if they had met a woman and could touch her garment they were saved, as by a sanctuary, whatever was their crime Thus idolised, watched, and guarded, the Egyptian woman's life is nevertheless entirely in the power of her lord, and her death is the inevitable penalty of his dishonour. No piquant case of crim con ever amuses the Egyptian public, the injured husband is his own judge and jury, his only 'gentlemen of the long robe' are his cunuchs, and the knife or the Nile the only damages The law never interferes in these little domestic arrangements

Poor Faima ' shrined as she was in the palace of a tyrant, the fame of her beauty stole abroad through Cairo. She was one amongst a hundred in the harcem of Abbas Pasha, a man stained with every foul and louthsome vice, and who can wonder, though many may condemn, if she listened to a daring young Albanian who risled his life to obtain but a sight of her? Whether she did listen or not, none can ever know, but the cunuclis saw the glitter of the Arnaut's arms as he leaped from the terrace into the Nile and vanished in The following night a merry Luglish the darkness party dined together on board Lord Exmouth's boat as it lay moored off the Isle of Rhoda, conversation had sunk into silence as the calin night came on, a funt breeze floated perfumes from the gardens over the star lit Nile and searcely moved the clouds that rose from the elubouque, a dreamy languor seemed to pervade all nature, and even the city by hushed in deep reposewhen suddenly a boat, crowded with dark figures among which arms gleamed, shot out from one of the arches of the palace, it paused under the opposite bank, where the water rushed deep and gloomily along, and for a moment a white figure glimmered amongst that boats dark crew, there was a slight movement and a faint splash, and then-the river flowed on as merrily as if poor I atima still sang her Georgian song to the murniur of its waters

I was riding one evening along the banks of the Marcotis, the low land, half swamp, half desert, was level as the lake there was no sound, except the ripple of the waves along the far extended shore, and the heavy flapping of the pelican's wings as she rose from the water's edge. Not a palm tree raised its plumy head, not a shrub crept along the ground, the sun was low, but there was nothing to cast a shadow over the mono tonous waste, except a few Moslein tonils with their sculptured turbans these stood apart from every sign of life, and even of their kindred dead, like those upon the Lido at Venice As I paused to contemplate this seene of desolution, an Egyptian liurned past me with a bloody knife in his hand, his dress was mean and ragged, but his countenance was one that the father of Don Carlos might have worn, he never rused his eyes as he rushed My groom, who just then came up, told me he had slain his wife, and was going to her father's village to denounce her

My boat was moored in the little harbour of Assouan, the old Syene, the boundary between Tgypt and I thiopia, opposite lies Lleplantina, the 'Isle of Flowers,' strewed with ruins and shided by magnificent palm trees the last eddies of the catarnet of the Nile foam round dark red granite cliffs, which rise precipi tously from the river, and are piled into a mountain crowned by a ruined Saracenie castle. A forest of palm trees divides the village from the quiet shore on whose silvery sands my tent was pitched. A man in an Egyp tian dress saluted me in Italian, and in a few moments was smoking my chibouque, by invitation, and sipping coffee by my side he was very handsome, but his faded check and sunken eye showed hardship and suffering, and he spoke in a low and humble voice. In reply to my question as to how a person of his appearance came into this remote region, he told me that he had been lately practising as a surgeon in Alexandria, he had married a Levantine girl, whose beauty was to him as 'la faceia del cielo 'he had been absent from his home, and she had betrayed him. On his return he met her with a smiling countenance, in the evening he accomprinted her to a deep well, whither she went to draw water, and as she leant over it he threw her in he said this he paused and placed his hands upon his eurs, as if he still heard her dying shriek He then continued 'I have fled from Alexandria till the affair I was robbed near Stout, and have 15 blown over supported myself miserably ever since by giving medical advice to the poor country people I shall soon return, and all will be forgotten. If I had not avenged myself, her own family, you know, must have done so? And so this woman murderer smoked on, and continued talking in a low and gentle voice till the moon was high, then he went his way, and I saw hun no more

The Lgyptian has no home—at least, in the English sense of that sacred word, his sons are only half brothers, and generally at enmity with each other, his daughters are transplanted while yet children into some other harcein, and his wives, when their beauty is gone by, are frequently divorced without a cause, to male room for some vounger rival. The result is, that the Lgyptian—a sensualist and slave—is only fit to be a subject in what prophecy forctold his country should become—'the basest of all kingdoms'

The women have all the insipidity of children without their innocence or sparkling freshness. Their beauty, voluptuous and soulless, appeals only to the senses, it has none of that pure and ennobling influence.

'That made us what we are—the great, the free—And bade earth bow to England's chivalry'

The Moslem purchases his wife as he does his horse he laughs at the idea of honour and of love the armed cunuch and the close barred window are the only safe guards of virtue that he relies on Every luxury lavished on the Odalisque is linled vith some precaution, like the from fruit and flowers in the madhouse at Naples, that seem to smile round those whom they imprison is it for her own sake, but that of her master, that woman is supplied with every luxury that wealth can procure As we gild our aviance and fill them with evotics native to our foreign birds in order that their song may be sweet and their plumage bright, so the King of Babylon built the Hanging Gardens for the mountain girl who pined and lost her beauty among the level plains of The Lgyptian is quite satisfied if his the Enphrates Nourmahal be in 'good condition' mindless himself, what has he to do with mind?

The Lgyptian woman, obliged to share her hisband's nflection with a hundred others in this world, is yet further supplanted in the next by the Houris, a sort of she angel, of as doubtful a character as even a Moslem paradise could well tolerate, may, more, it is a very moot point among Mussulman D.D.s whether women have any soul at all, or not I believe their clinnee of immor tality rests chiefly on the tradition of a conversation of Mahomet with an old woman who importuned him for a good place in paradise. ' Frouble me not,' said the vexed husband of Cadipali, 'there can be no old women in paradise. Whereupon the aged applicant made such troublous lamentation that he diplomatically added, because the old will then all be made young again I can find no allusion to woman's immortality in all the Koran, except meidentally, as where 'all men and women are to be tried at the last day,' and this is but poor comfort for those whom 'angels are painted fair to look like.

Women are not enjoined to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca, but they are permitted to do so. They are not enjoined to pray, but the Propliet seemed to think that it could do them no harm, provided they prayed in their own houses and not in the mosques, where they might interfere with or share the devotion of those who had real business there

In fine, women receive no religious education, they seldom, if ever, pray, and their heaven, if they have one, is some second hand sort of paradise, very different from that of their husbands—unless, as I have observed, 'by particular desire.'

Nothing can be more hideous than the Arab woman of the street, nothing more picturesque than her of the hareem. The former presents a mass of white, shroud like drapery, waddling along on a pair of enormous yellow boots, with one brilliant eye gleaming above the veil which is drawn across the face. The lower classes wear only a very loose, long blue frock, and appear anxious to conceal nothing except their faces, in which they consider that identity alone consists. As these women cannot spare the hands to the exclusive use of their veils, they wear a sort of snout, or long, black, tapering veil, bound over the cheek bones, and supported from the forchead by a string of beads.

Take one of these, an ugly, old, sun scorched hag, with a skin like a hippopotamus and a veil snout like an elephant's trunk, her seanty robe scarcely serving the purposes of a girdle, her hands, feet, and forehead tattooed of a smoke colour, and there is scarcely a more ludeous spectacle on earth. But the Lady of the Hareem, on the other hand-couched gracefully on a rich Persian carpet strewn with soft pillowy cushionsis as rich a picture as admiration ever gazed on eyes, if not as dangerous to the heart as those of our country, where the sunshine of intellect gleams through a heaven of blue, are nevertheless perfect in their kind, and at least as dangerous to the senses Languid, yet full-brimful of life, dark, yet very lustrous, liquid, yet clear as stars, they are compared by their pocts to the shape of the almond and the bright timidness of the gazelle's The face is delicately oval, and its shape is set off by the gold fringed turban, the most becoming head dress in the world, the long, black, silken tresses are braided from the foreliead, and liang wavily on each side of the face, falling behind in a glossy cataract, that sparkles with such golden drops as might have glittered upon Danac after the Olympian shower A light tunie of pink or pale blue crupe is covered with a long silk robe, open at the bosom, and buttoned thence downward to the delicately slippered little feet, that peep daintily from beneath the full silken trousers Round the loins, rather than the waist, a cachemire shawl is loosely wrapt as a girdle, and an embroidered jacket or a large silk robe with loose open sleeves completes the costume Nor is the fragrant water pipe, with its long variegated serpent and its jewelled mouthpiece, any detraction from the portrait.

Picture to yourself one of Eve's brightest daughters in I ve's own loving land. The woman dealer has found among the mountains that perfection in a living form which Praxitcles scarcely realised when inspired funcy wrought out its ideal in maible. Silken scarfs, as nichly coloured and as airy as the rainbow, wreathe her round, from the snowy brow to the finely rounded limbs, half buried in hillowy cushions the attitude is the very poetry of repose—languid it may be, but glowing life thrills beneath that flower soft exterior, from the varying check and flashing eye to the henna-dyed, taper fingers that capriciously play with her rosary of beads. The blaze of sunshine is round her kiosk, but she sits in the softened shadow so dear to the painter's eye. And so she dreams away the warm hours in such a calm of thought within, and sight or sound without, that she starts when the gold fish gleams in the fountain or the breeze ruffled roses shed a leaf upon her bosom

The mystery, the seclusion, and the danger that sur round the Odalisque may be perilously interesting to the romantic, but to matter of fact people like myself an English fireside, a Scottish mountain, or an Irish glein has more attractions in this respect than any Zenana in Arabia, and the women who inhabit them, with purity in the heart and intellect on the brow, and a cottage bonnet on the head, are better worth risking life (nay, liberty) for than all the turbaned voluptuous beauty of the East. (From The Crescent and the Cross)

Frances Trollope (1780-1863) was born at Stapleton, Bristol (the birthplace also of Hannah More), but brought up at Heckfield vicarage, North Hampshire. In 1809 she married Thomas Anthony Trollope, barrister and Fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1827, on his falling into the direst embarrassment, she went out to Cincinnati with her second boy and her two little girls There was a scheme for starting a European fancy bazaar there, which swallowed up £2000, but ended in absolute ruin, her three years' residence and travels in the States bore fruit, however, in her Domestic Manners of the Americans It appeared in 1832, when its author was over fifty, and at once excited atten-She drew so uncomplimentary a picture of American ways and American faults and foibles that the whole republic was-not without reason, for her representations, even when based on fact, were grossly overcharged-incensed at their English satirist. A novel, The Refugee in America, published in the same year, had much in common with the earlier work, and showed little art in the construction of the fable. Mrs Trollope now tried new ground In 1833 she published The Abbess, a novel, and in 1834 a book on Belgium and Western Germany, countries where she travelled in better humour, the most serious grievance she had against Germany being the tobacco-smoke, which slie vituperates with unwearied persever-In 1836 she renewed her war with the Americans in The Adventures of Jonathan Jefferson Whitlaw, in which she gives touching pictures of the miseries of the coloured population of the Southern States Paris and the Parisians belongs to the same year The Vicar of Wrexhill (1837), The Widow Barnaby (1839), and its sequel The Widow Married (1840) are among her best novels, and contain amusing sketches of manners and eccentricities Vienna and the Austrians (1838) was of the same cast as Belgium and Germany, but unhappily showed much more unreasonable prejudice. Between 1838 and 1843 Mrs Trollope threw off seven or eight novels and an account of a Visit to Italy Her smart caustic style was not so well suited for sketching classic scenes and the antiquities of Italy as for satirising the eccentricities of national life and character, and this work was hardly so successful as her previous publications Her later books are decidedly inferior the old characters are reproduced, and coarseness is too often substituted for strength Her husband having died near Bruges in 1835, she settled in Florence in 1843, and here she died in the eighty-fourth year of her age. She published in all a hundred and fifteen volumes, of which twelve were travels and the remainder novels

Mrs Trollope was an acute and observant writer, but was overweeningly and self complacently English, cherishing a profound belief in the mestimable blessings of the British constitution, of the English Church, and English culture generally, with an equally frank abhorrence of the manifest and inevitable consequences of democracy She constantly returns to her maxim that commonsense revolts at the mischievous sophistry of the false and futile axiom, due, she believes, to her bête noire Jefferson, that 'all men are born free and equal' She admits that many of her remarks apply to the Wild West rather than to the long-settled States, but the eccentricities of the pioneers in the Mississippi valley coloured her judgments of Washington and New York. She does not approve of slavery 'I conceive it to be essentially wrong, but so far as my observation has extended, I think its influence is far less injurious to the manners and morals of the people than the fallacious ideas of equality which are so fondly cherished by the workingclasses of the white population of America.' And nothing excited her 'horror and disgust' so much as what she saw of revivals and camp meetings The dialect she makes her Americans speak, though it abounds with admitted Americanisms, seems even to an English eye impossible, and while her observations are, to say the least, highly coloured, many of the stories she reports as having reached her about the enormities of representative Americans are quite incredible No doubt she did note a vast number of things deserving amendment, but the most convinced Tory cannot believe she saw so little worth commendation, and would disapprove the sneering and censorious tone in which many of her tales are told

The Fourth of July

To me the dreary coldness and want of enthusiasm in American manner is one of their greatest defects, and I therefore hailed the demonstrations of general feeling which this day clicits with real pleasure. On the 4th of July the hearts of the people seem to awaken from a three hundred and sixty four days' sleep, they appear high spirited, gay, animated, social, generous, or at least liberal in expense, and would they but refrain from spitting on that hallowed day, I should say that, on the 4th of July at least, they appeared to be an amiable people. It is true that the women have but little to do with the pageantry, the splendour, or the gaiety of the day, but, setting this defect aside, it was indeed a glorious sight to behold a jubilee so heartfelt as this, and had they not the bad taste and bad feeling to utter an annual oration with unvarying abuse of the mother country, to say nothing of the warlike manifesto called the Declaration of Independence, our gracious king himself might look upon the sceue and say that it was good, nay, even rejoice that twelve millions of bustling bodies, at four thousand miles distance from his throne and his altars, should make their own laws and drink their own tea after the fashion that pleased them best

American Freedom

Cuyp's clearest landscapes have an atmosphere that approaches nearer to that of America tlian any I remember on canvas, but even Cuyp's air cannot reach the lungs, and therefore can only give an idea of half the enjoyment, for it makes itself felt as well as seen, and is indeed a constant source of pleasure

Our walks were, however, curtuled in several directions by my old Cincinnati enemies, the pigs, immense droves of them were continually arriving from the country by the road that led to most of our favourite walks, they were often fed and lodged in the prettiest valleys, and worse still, were slaughtered beside the prettiest streams. Another evil threatened us from the same quarter that was yet heavier. Our cottage had an ample piazza (a luxury almost universal in the country houses of America), which, shaded by a group of acacias, made a delightful sitting room, from this favourite spot we one day perceived symptoms of building in a field close to it, with much anxiety we hastened to the spot, and asked what building was to be erected there

"Tis to be a slaughter house for hogs," was the dread ful reply As there were several gentlemen's houses in the neighbourhood, I asked if such an erection might not be indicted as a nuisance.

'A what?'

'A nuisance,' I repeated, and explained what I meant

'No, no,' was the reply, 'that may do very well for your tyrannical country, where a rich man's nose is more thought of than a poor man's mouth, but hogs be profitable produce here, and we be too free for such a law as that, I guess'

During my residence in America little circumstances like the foregoing often recalled to my mind a conver sation I once held in France with an old gentleman on the subject of their active police and its omnipresent gens-d'armerie, 'Croyez moi, Madame, il n'y a que ceux à qui ils ont à fure qui les tronvent de trop ' And the old gentleman was right, not only in speaking of France, but of the whole human family, as philosophers call us The well disposed, those whose own feeling of justice would prevent their annoying others, will never complain of the restraints of the law All the freedom enjoyed in America, beyond what is enjoyed in England, is enjoyed solely by the disorderly at the expense of the orderly, and were I a stout knight, either of the sword or of the pen, I would fearlessly throw down my gauntlet, and challenge the whole republic to prove the contrary, bnt, being as I am, a feeble looker-on, with a needle for my spear and 'I talk' for my device, I must be contented with the power of stating the fact, perfectly certain that I shall be contradicted by one loud shout from Maine to Georgia

On a Mississippi Steamer

The total want of all the usual courtesies of the table, the voracious rapidity with which the viands were seized and devoured, the strange uncouth phrases and pronunciation, the loathsome spitting, from the containing nation of which it was absolutely impossible to protect our dresses, the frightful manner of feeding with their knives, till the whole blade seemed to enter into the mouth, and the still more frightful manner of cleaning the teeth afterwards with a pocket knife, soon forced us to feel that we were not surrounded by the generals, colonels, and majors of the Old World, and that the dinner hour was to be anything rather than an hour of enjoyment

Her sons, Anthony and Thomas Adolphus Trollope, are elsewhere noticed See Frances Trollope (2 vols. 1895), by Frances Eleanor Trollope, the second wife of Thomas Adolphus, and herself a novelist.

The Countess of Blessington (1789-1849), long known in the world of fashion and light literature, was born at Knockbrit near Clonmel Her father, Edmund Power, was an Irish 'squireen,' who forced his daughter, when only fourteen, into a marriage with a drunken Captain Farmer The marriage was unhappy, Marguerite soon left her husband, who was killed in 1817 by a fall from a Four months later she was promoted from mistress to be countess of an Irish peer, Charles Gardiner, Earl of Blessington Her acquired rank, her beauty, and literary tastes now rendered her the centre of a brilliant circle, and she revelled in every species of extravagant display In 1822 the pair set out on a Continental tour They visited Byron in Genoa, and Lady Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron (1834, new ed 1894) present on the whole a faithful—though inevitably incomplete-picture of the noble and then notorious poet. In May 1829 Lady Blessington was agran left a widow-this time with a jointure of about £2000 a year A daughter of the deceased earl, by a former marriage, became the wife of Count Alfred d'Orsay, the famous dandy of the This marriage also proved unfortunate, the pair separated, and while Madame d'Orsay remained in Paris, the count accompanied Lady Blessington to England. This close association, broken only by death, gave rise to scandalous rumours, yet the countess and her friend maintained a conspicuous place in society D'Orsay, accomplished both as painter and sculptor, was the acknowledged leader of fashion, but a career of gaiety and splendour soon involved the coun-She made a considerable income tess in debt. by writing, yet her expenditure greatly exceeded her resources Her first novel, Grace Cassidy, or the Repealer, appeared in 1833, and was followed by nearly a dozen others, including Strathern's Life at Home and Abroad (1843) and Marmaduke Herbert (1847) There were also tales in verse and innumerable contributions to magazines and annuals Perhaps Lady Blessington's best book was her Idler in Italy, but she was better known as the editor for years of the annual Book of Beauty and The Keepsake Finally D'Orsay had to flee to the Continent (April 1849), and the countess followed, having broken up her establishment in Gore House, Kensington, every- 1 thing was sold off, and Lady Blessington and D'Orsay settled in Paris, where she died the same year, while the count survived her just three years The friendliest-perhaps the truest-estimate of this brilliant creature is given in the epitaph written for her tomb by Barry Cornwall 'In her lifetime she was loved and admired for her many graceful writings, her gentle manners, her kind and generous heart. Men famous for art and science in distant lands sought her friendship, and the historians and scholars, the poets and wits and painters, of her own country found an unfailing welcome in her ever-hospitable home. She gave cheerfully, to all who were in need, help and sympathy, and useful counsel, and she died lamented by many Those who loved her best in life, and now lament her most, have reared this tributary marble over the place of her rest' Her Life has been written by Madden (3 vols 1855) and Molloy Her poems were verses at most, often not quite that, in a collection of her Maxims, Thoughts, and Reflections, separately published in 1839, these are as characteristic as any

Deceivers

We are born to deceive or to be deceived. In one of these classes we must be numbered, but our self respect is dependent upon our selection. The practice of deception generally secures its own punishment, for callous indeed must be that mind which is insensible to its ignominy! But he who has been duped is conscious, even in the very moment that he detects the imposition, of his proud superiority to one who can stoop to the adoption of so foul and sorry a course. The really good and high minded, therefore, are seldom provoked by the discovery of deception, though the cunning and artful resent it as a humiliating triumph obtained over them in their own vocations.

Society

'Be prosperous and happy, never require our services, and we will remain your friends.' This is not what society says, but it is the principle on which it acts.

The Poetry of Life

The poetry of our lives is, like our religion, kept apart from our every day thoughts—neither influence us as they onght. We should be wiser and happier if, instead of secluding them in some secret shrine in our hearts, we suffered their humanising qualities to temper our habitual words and actions

Virtue

Horne Tooke said of intellectual philosophy that he had become better acquainted with it, as with the country, through having sometimes lost his way. May not the same be said of virtue? for never is it so truly known or appreciated as by those who, having strayed from its path, have at length regained it

Infirmitles of Genius

The infirmities of genius are often mistaken for its privileges

Love

Love in France is a comedy, in England a tragedy, in Italy an opera seria, and in Germany a melodrame

Mrs Bray, born Anne Eliza Kempe (1790-1883), a Londoner, was intended for the stage, but in 1818 married Stothard the artist, who died in 1821. In 1825 she married the Rev. E. A. Bray, vicar of Tavistock, and after his death in 1857 she settled in London. Between 1820 and 1874 she published a score of romances, books of travel, and other works, the best being The Borders of the Tamar and the Tavy (1836, 2nd ed. 1879), the Life of Thomas Stothard, R.A. (1851), and A. Peep at the Pixies (1854). Her Autobiography and also a twelve-volume edition of her romances were published in 1884.

Catherine Grace Frances Gore (1709-1861) was born the daughter of Charles Moody. a wine merchant at East Retford in Nottingham She was already known as a poetess when in 1823 she married Captain Charles Arthur Gore of the Life Guards She was able to support her family by her voluminous literary labours, and she con tinued to supply the circulating libraries with one or two novels a year till, quite blind, she after 1850 retired from work and from society, having produced some two hundred volumes of novels and shorter tales, with comedies and poems Her first publications were two or three volumes of poems, her first novel, Theresa Marchmont, was published in 1823, the two tales, The Lettre de Cachet and The Reign of Terror-one of the times of Louis XIV, and the other of the French Revolution-in 1827 Next appeared a series of Hungarian Tales Women as they Are, or the Manners of the Day (3 vols 1830), was an easy, sparkling tale of modern society, with much lady like writing on dress and fashion, and some rather misplaced contempt for 'excellent wives' and 'good sort of men' Pictures of gay life-balls, dinners, and fêtes-with clever sketches of character and amusing dialogues, make up the three volumes of Mothers and Daughters (1831) The Fair of May Fair (1832) was hardly so well received, and thereafter the authoress lived in France for some years Mrs Armytage appeared in 1836, and in the next years (1837-38) Mary Raymond, Memoirs of a Peeress, The Heir of Selwood, and The Book of Roses, or Rose-fancier's Manual, a delightful little work on the history of the rose, its propagation and culture, based on Mrs Gore's knowledge of French gardening Cecil, or the Adventures of a Coxcomb (1841), and The Banker's Wife (1843) are among her more notable works She had seen much of the world both at home and abroad, and was never at a loss for character or incident. The worst of her works must be pronounced clever, their interest consists in their lively and caustic pictures of fashionable society, but the want of passion and simplicity in her living models, and the endless frivolities of their occupations-though not unknown in modern fashionable novels-usually weary and repel readers nowadays Thackeray caricatured her manner in one of the 'Novels by Emment Hands'

A Worldly Lady

Lady Liffeld was a thoroughly worldly woman-a worthy scion of the Mordaunt stock. She had professedly accepted the hand of Sir Robert because a connection with him was the best that happened to present itself in the first year of her debut-the 'best match' to be had at a season's warning! She knew that she had been brought out with the view to dancing at a certain number of balls, refusing a certain number of good offers, and accepting a better one, somewhere between the months of January and June, and she regarded it as a propitious dispensation of Providence to her parents and to herself that the comparative proved a superlative-even a high sheriff of the county. a baronct of respectable date, with ten thousand a year! She felt that her duty towards herself necessitated an immediate acceptance of the dullest 'good sort of man' extant throughout the three kingdoms, and the whole routine of her after life was regulated by the same rigid code of moral selfishness. She was penetrated with a most exact sense of what was due to her position in the world, but she was equally precise in her appreciation of all that, in her turn, she owed to society, nor, from her youth upwards-' Content to dwell in decencies for ever' -had she been detected in the slightest infraction of these minor social duties She knew with the utmost accuracy of domestic arithmetic, to the fraction of a course or an entrée, the number of dinners which Beech l'ark was indebted to its neighbourhood-the complement of laundry maids indispensable to the maintenance of its county dignity—the aggregate of pines by which it must retain its horticultural precedence. She had never retarded by a day or an hour the arrival of the family coach in Grosvenor Square at the exact moment ereditable to Sir Robert's senatorial punctuality, nor procrastinated by half a second the simultaneous bobs of her ostentatious Sunday school as she sailed majestically along the aisle towards her tall, stately, pharisaical, squire archical pew. True to the execution of her tasks and her whole life was but one laborious task-true and exact as the great bell of the Beech Park turret clock, she was enchanted with the monotonous music of her own cold iron tongue, proclaiming herself the best of wives and mothers because Sir Robert's rent roll could afford to command the services of a first rate steward and butler and housekeeper, and thus ensure a well ordered household, and because her seven sub stantial children were duly drilled through a daily portion of rice pudding and spelling book, and an annual dis tribution of mumps and measles! All went well at Beech Park, for Lady Lilfield was 'the excellent wife' of 'a good sort of man'!

So bright an example of domestic merit—and what country neighbourhood cannot boast of its displicate?—was naturally superior to seeking its pleasures in the vapid and varying novelties of modern fashion. The habits of Beech Park still affected the dignified and primeval purity of the departed century. Lady Lilfield remained true to her annual eight rural months of the county of Durham, against whose claims Kemp Town pleaded, and Spi and Baden bubbled in vain. During her pastoral seclusion, by a careful distribution of her stores of gossiping, she contrived to prose, in undetected tautology, to successive detachments of an extensive neighbourhood, concerning her London importance, her court dress, her dinner parties, and her refusal to

London Life

A squirrel in a cage, which pursues its monotonous round from summer to summer, as though it had for gotten the gru green wood and glorious air of liberty, is no condemned to a more monotonous existence than the fusionable world in the unvarying routine of its amasements and when a London beauty expands into cestisies concerning the delights of London to some comire sughbour on a foggy autumn day, vaguely allading to the 'countless' pleasure and 'diversified' ama ements of I ondon, the country neighbour may be as are I that the truth is not in her. Nothing can be more minitely mono onous than the recreations of the really fa linonable, monutony being, in fact, essential to that distinction. Figers may amuse themselves in a the indirectable diverting way, but the career of a g na ne exclusive is one to which a mill horse would scarcely look for rulief London houses, London estab lishments, are formed after the same unvarying model At the fifty or sixty balls to which she is to be indebted for the excitement of her season, the fine lady listens to the same band, is refreshed from a buffet prepared by the same skill, looks at the same diamonds, hears the same trivial observations, and but for an incident or two, the growth of her own follies might find it difficult to from out the slightest difference between the fete of the country on the first of June and that of the marquis on the 'ir t of July But though twenty seasons' experience of the a devoluting facts might be expected to damp the redour of certain do sagers and dandies who are to be for all hurrying along the golden railroad year after year, it i no i orderful that the young girls their daughters should be easily allured from their dull schoolrooms by All the promises of pleasure

Catherine Crowe (1800-76), born Stevens at Bo ough Green in Kent, in 1822 married Lieut Colonel Crowe, and spent great part of her after life in Lamburgh, there she came under George Combe's inhuence. Her mind was morbid and dispondent, ever hovering on the border line of insire 2, 4 hely crossed once in one violent but helf arrick. Her translation of Kerner's Sceress of the rife (1845) prepared the way for her well known Night's to of Vature (1848), a collection of a think stories of the supernatural by an uncritical lawser. She wrole also tragedies, juvenile lieute and no ets—the bes. Suran Hopley (1841) and tela Directi (1847).

Mrs S. C. Hall (1800-81) was born in Dublin and brought up at Wexford, though on her mother's side she was of Swiss descent. Her maiden name. Anna Maria Fielding, was unknown in the literary world, her first work was not published till after her marriage to Samuel Carter Hall in 1824 fifteen she had come with her mother to England, and it was some time before she revisited her native country, but the scenes which were familiar to her as a child had made such a vivid and lasting impression on her mind, and all her sketches showed so much freshness and vigour, that her readers might well imagine she had spent her life among the scenes she describes. To her early absence from her native country is partly at least to be traced one noteworthy characteristic of all her writings-the absence of party feeling on politics or religion Mrs Hall's Sketches of Irish Character (1828) are much liker Miss Mitford's tales than they are to the Irish stories of Banim or Griffin, no doubt it was Miss Edgeworth that gave Mrs Hall her impulse to set forth the inde feasible traits of Irish character The Sketches have much fine description, and are instinct not merely with sound and kindly feeling but true and delicate humour, the coquetry of her Irish girls is admirably given A second series of Sketches of Irish Character (1831) was quite equal to the first, some of the saturcal presentations are hit off with great truth and liveliness In 1832 Mrs Hall ven tured on a historical romance, The Buccaneer, the scene being laid in England at the time of the Protectorate, and Oliver himself appearing among the characters The plot is well managed, and some of the characters-notably that of Barbara the Puritan-are excellent, but the work is too feminine, and has too little of energetic passion for the stormy times in which it is east Tales of Woman's Trials (1834) are short stories in her happiest style. Uncle Horace (1835) was a Lights and Shadows of Irish Life (3 vols 1838), originally published in the New Monthly Magazine, were extraordinarily popular, the principal story, 'The Groves of Blarney,' was dramatised and played with eminent success Marian, or a Young Maid's Fortunes (1840), males full use again of Mrs Hall's knowledge of Insh character, Katey Macane, the cook who adopts the foundling Marian and watches over her with untiring affection, is equal to any Irish portruture after those of Miss Edgeworth of the Irish Peasantry, contributed to Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, were afterwards published in a collected form In 1840 Mrs Hall aided her husband in an elaborately illustrated work in three volumes, Ireland, its Seenery and Character, skil fully blending topographical and statistical information with the poctical and romantic features of the country, the legends of the peasantry, and scenes and characters of humour or pathos The White bos (1842) is usually reckoned her best novel Other v orks were a fairy tale, Midsummer Eve

(1845), A Woman's Story (1857), Can Hrong be Right? (1862), The Fight of Faith (1868-69) her husband's Art Journal Mrs Hall contributed many picturesque sketches, some of which were reissued as Pilgrimages to English Shrines and The Book of the Than es She also produced some pleasing children's books Her humour is not so broad or racy as Lady Morgan's, nor her observation so acute and profound as Miss Her husband, Samuel Corter Hall Edgeworth's (1800-89), who was born near Waterford, the son of an English officer, came to London in 1831, reported and wrote for various papers, sub-edited the John Bull, and founded (1839) and edited the Art Journal The works written and edited by him and his wife, alone or often conjointly, exceed five hundred volumes, of these his Retrospect of a Let g Life (2 vols 1883) is a series of joitings, not a set autobiography. Both husband and wife are buried it Addlestone, Surrey

Shane Thurlough [15] 'as discent a boy,' and Shane's wife as 'clane skinned a girl as any in the world There is Shane, an active handsome looling fellow, leaning over the half-door of his cottage, kicking a hole in the wall with his brogue, and picking up all the large gravel rathin his reach to pelt the ducks with-those useful Insh scavengers. Let us speak to him 'Good morrow, Shane I' 'Och! the bright baines of heaven on ye every dry! and kindly welcome, my lady, and won't ye step in and rest?-it's powerful hot, and a beautiful summer, sure-the Lord be praised!' 'Think you, Shine thought you were going to cut the hay field to day, if a heavy shower comes it vill be spoiled, it has been fit so the scythe these two days." "Sure it's all owing to that thief o' the world, Tom Parrel, my lady he promise me the loan of his scytlie? and, by the same tolen, I was to pay him for it, and definding on that, I didn't but one, which I have been threatening to do for the last two years' 'But why don't you go to Carrick and purchase one?' 'To Carrick! Och!'tis a good step to Carrick, and my toes are on the groundsaving your presence-for I defended on Tim Jarvis to tell Andy Cappler, the brogue maker, to do my shoes, and, bad luck to him, the spalpeen' he forgot it' 'Where's your pretty wife, Shane?' 'She's in all the voc o' the world, ma'am dear And she puts the blame of it on me, though I'm not in the faut this time anyhow The child's talen the smallpox, and she depended on me to tell the doctor to cut it for the cowpox, and I definded on Kitty Cackle, the limmer to tell the doctor's own man, and thought she would not forget it, becase the boy's her bachelor, but out o' sight, out o' mindthe never a word she tould him about it, and the babby has got it natural, and the woman's in heart trouble—to say nothing o' myself-and it the first, and all ' 'I am very sorry indeed, for you have got a much better wife than most men' 'That's a true word, my lady, only slie's fidgety like sometimes, and says I don't hit the nail on the head quick enough, and she takes a dale more trouble than she need about many a thing ' 'I do not think I ever saw Ellen's wheel without flax before, Shane.' 'Bad cess to the wheel '-I got it this morning about that too I depended on John Williams to bring the flax from O'Flaherty's this day week, and he forgot it, and she says I ought to have brought it myself, and I close to the spot "But where's the good?" says I, "sure he'll bring it next time."' 'I suppose, Shane, you will soon move into the new cottage at Clurn IIill? I passed it to day, and it looked so cheerful, and when you get there you must take Ellen's advice, and depend solely on yourself' 'Och, ma'nm dear, don't mintion it, sure it's that makes me so down in the mouth this very minit Sure I saw that born blackguard, Jack Waddy, and he comes in here quite innocent like "Shane, you've nn eye to squire's new lodge," says he. "Maybe I have," says I "I'm yer man," says he. "How so?" says I "Sure I'm as good as married to my lady's maid," said he, "and I'll spake to the squire for you my own self" "The blessing be about you," says I, quite grateful-and we took a strong cup on the strength of it -and, definding on him, I thought all safe. And what d'ye think, my lady? Why, himself stalks into the place—talked the squire over, to be sure—and without so much as by yer live, sites himself and his new wife on the larse in the house, and I may go whistle was a great pity, Shane, that you didn't go yourself to Mr Clurn' 'That's a true word for ye, ma am dear, but it's hard if a poor man can't have a frind to defind on '

Miss Agnes Strickland (1796-1874) was a daughter of Thomas Strickland of Reydon Hall in Suffolk, originally a dock manager at Norwich, who after his retirement from business took entire charge of his daughters' education. Agnes soon took to writing, producing a poetical narrative, Worcester Field, or the Cavalus, a series of historic scenes and stories for children, and in 1835 The Pilgrams of Walsingham, somewhat on the plan of Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims She then, aided by her sister Elizabeth (1794-1875), entered upon her copious and elaborate Lives of the Queens of England from the Norman Conquest (12 vols 1840-48, new ed, 6 vols, 1864-1865) The Times said this work possessed 'the fascination of a romance united to the integrity of a history,' while other critics more justly complained of its feebleness of thought and poverty of The method is wholly uncritical, but the volumes give, nevertheless, vivid pictures of court ceremonial and domestic life, and were largely based on unpublished documents in the public offices and in private mansions More than a dozen of the Lives were the sole work of the elder sister, who preferred not to have her share in the enterprise acknowledged on the title-page of any of the joint-works The English history was followed by Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses connected with the Regal Succession of Great Britain (8 vols 1850-59), also written by the sisters jointly Miss Strickland was a strong partisan of the Stuarts, and her Life of Mary Queen of Scots (originally in the Queens, but separately published in 1873) is written with great fullness of detail and illustration, many new facts having been added by study of the papers in the Register House, Edinburgh, and doru nents in the possession of the Earl of Moray and the representatives of other ancient families. O per works borgues (in some cases with help from Lizabeth, were Lives of the Seven Bishops, Is et of the Tudor Princesses, The Last Four Vivit Princesses, and Bachelor Kings of Englished. It need hardly be said that the following story of Moray's deceit and Lindsay's ferocity, from the Queens of Scotland, must not be accepted as historical truth.

Mary of Scotland at Lochleven.

The con pirators, calling them elves the Lords of Secret Council, having completed their arrangements for the long meditated project of depriving her of her crown summoned Lord Lindsay to I dinburgh, and on the 23r1 of July delivered to him and Sir Robert Melville three deeds to which they were instructed to obtain her signature, either by flattering words or absolute force. The first contained a declaration, as if from herself, that, being in infirm health and worn out with the cares of government, she had taken purpose voluntarily to resign her crown and office to her dearest son, James, Prince of Scotland. In the second, ther trusty brother James, Earl of Morry, was constituted regent for the prince her son, during the minority of the royal The third appointed a provisional council of repency consisting of Morton and the other Lords of Secret Council, to carry on the government till Moray's return, or, in ca e of his refusing to accept it, till the prince arrived at the legal age for exercising it him Aware that Mary would not easily be induced to execute such instruments, Sir Kobert Mckille was e pecially employed to cajole her into this political That ungrateful courtier, who had been em placed and trusted by his unfortunate sovercign ever since her re urn from brance, and had received nothing but benefits from her, undertool this office. Having oldrings a private interview with her, he decentfully en rented her 'to sign certain deeds that would be presented to her by Lindsay, as the only means of preserving her life, which, he assured her, was in the mest imminent danger. Then he gave her a turquoise ring telling her 'it was sent to her from the Earls of Argsle Huntly, and Athole, Secretary Lethington, and the Land of Gringe v ho loved her Majesty, and had by that token accredited him to exhort her to avert the peril to r luch she would be exposed if she ventured to the requisition of the Lords of Secret Council. reli who r designs, they well linew, were to take her life, either ferretly or by a mock trial among themselves? Finding the queen impatient of this insidious advice, h podocol a leter from the Linglish ambassador Thro I mor on, out of the scabbard of his sword telling her 'he h d concerded it there at peril of his o'en life, in order a convex it to her '-a paltry plece of acting, worthy of the parties by s hom it had been devised, for the letter had been written for the express purpose of ir aing Mary to accole to the demission of her regul dim to " her her as if in confidence "that it was the queen of hegh nis case by advice that she should impre thre who had her in their power by refire tir on's erices on that could save her life, and at ming that robin that was done under her promit errors and a still be of any force when the true and her frodom. Man, he ever, resolutely refused to sign the deeds, declaring, with truly royal courage, that she would not make herself a party to the treason of her own subjects by according to their lawless requisition, which, as she truly alleged, 'proceeded only of the ambition of a few, and was far from the desire of her people.'

The fur spoken Melville having reported his ill success to his condjutor Lord Lindsay, Moray's brother in law, the hully of the party, who had been selected for the honourable office of extorting by force from the royal captive the concession she denied, that brutal ruffian burst rudely into her presence, and, flinging the deeds violently on the table before her, told her to sign them without delay, or worse would befall her 'What I' exclaimed Mary, 'shall I set my hand to a deliberate falsehood, and, to gratify the ambition of my nobles, relinquish the office God hath given to me, to my son, an infant little more than a year old, incapable of governing the realm, that my brother Moray may reign in his name?' She was proceeding to demonstrate the unrersonableness of what was required of her, but Lindsay contemptuously interrupted her with scornful laughter, then, seewing ferociously upon her, he swore with a deep oath, 'that if she would not sign those instruments, he would do it with her heart's blood, and east her into the lake to feed the fishes? Full well did the defenceless woman know how capable he was of performing his threat, having seen his ripier recking with human blood shed in her presence, when he assisted at the butchery of her unfortunate secretary The int was scarcely dry of her royal signature to the remission she had granted to him for that outrage, but, reckless of the fact that he owed his life, his forfeit lands, yea, the very power of injuring her, to her generous elemency, he thus requited the grace she had, in evil hour for herself, accorded to him heart was too full to continue the unequal contest 'I am not yet five and twenty,' she pathetically observed, somewhat more she would have said, but her utterance failed her, and she began to weep with hysterical emotion Sir Robert Melville, affecting an air of the deepest concern, whispered in her ear an earnest en treaty for her 'to save her life by signing the papers,' reiterating 'that whatever she did would be invalid because extorted by force '

Mary's tears continued to flow, but sign she would not, till Lindsay, infuriated by her resolute resistance, swore 'that, having begun the matter, he would also finish it then and there,' forced the pen into her reluctant hand, and, according to the popular version of this scene of lawless violence, grasped her arm in the struggle so rudely as to leave the prints of his mail clad fingers visibly impressed. In an access of pain and terror, with streaming eyes and averted head, she affixed her regal signature to the three deeds, without once looking upon them. Sir Walter Scott alludes to Lindsay's barbarous treatment of his hapless queen in these nervous lines.

'An I haggard I indsay's fron eye,
That saw fair Mary weep in vain'

George Douglas the youngest son of the evil lady of Lochleven, being present indignantly remonstrated with his savage brother in law, Lindsay, for his mis conduct, and though hitherto employed as one of the persons who coffice it was to leep guard over her, he became from that hour the most devoted of her friends and champions, and the contriver of her escape. His elder brother, Sir William Douglas, the castellan, absolutely refused to be present, entered a protest against the wrong that had been perpetrated under his roof, and besought the queen to give him a letter of exon eration, certifying that he had nothing to do with it, and that it was against his consent—which letter she gave him

William and Mary Howitt, like-minded helpmates and fellow-labourers, were annable, earnest, and industrious compilers and authors, with a sincere love for letters, and the secret of a charm which secured them popularity in their own days, though now little of their work is remembered but a few of Mary's verses William Howitt (1792-1879) was born at Heanor, Derby shire, and educated at Ackworth and Tamworth, and he served a four years' apprenticeship to a builder and carpenter, but meanwhile wrote poems and an account of a country excursion In 1821 he married Mary Botham (1799-1888, born at Coleford, Gloucestershire, and brought up at Uttoveter), they settled at Hanley to conduct a chemist's business, whence they removed in 1823 to Nottingham for twelve years of successful literary industry. Later places of abode were Esher in Surrey, London, Heidelberg, and Rome. In 1852-54, at the height of the gold-fever, William Howitt, with two sons, spent two years in Australia. Husband and wife quitted the Society of Friends in 1847, and later became believers in spiritualism, Mary in 1882 joined the Catholic communion Both died at Rome. The widow enjoyed a public pension of £100 1 year from the time of her husband's death. Mary Howitt wrote from her earliest years, translated Frederika Bremer and Hans Andersen, and contributed poems, stories, essays, to the People's Journal, Howitt's Journal, Chambers's Journal, &c productions of husband and wife were The Forest Mustrel (poems, 1827), Desolation of Lyam (1827), The Book of the Seasons (1831), Stories of English Life (1853), and Ruined Abbeys and Castles of Great Britain Among Mary's works (over a hundred, if translations and books edited by her are included) were Wood Leighton, or a Year in the Country, a history of the United States, a three volume novel called The Cost of Caergavyu, and several volumes of poetry, 'tales in verse,' and books for children Of the husband's fifty works, among the chief were a History of Priester aft (1833), Rural Life in England (1837), Visits to Remarkable Places (1838-41), Colouisation and Christianity (1838), The Boy's Country Book (1839), The Student Life of Germany (1841), Homes and Haunts of the Poets (1847), Land, Labour, and Gold (1855), Illustrated History of England (1856-61), History of the Supernatural (1863), Discovery in Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand (1865), and The Mad War Planet and other Poems (1871) His books on Germany and German life were regarded by Germans as about the most intelligent and sympathetic written by any foreigner. ### Mountain Children

By MARY HOWITT

Dwellers by lake and hill!

Merry companions of the bird and bee!

Go gladly forth and drink of joy your fill,

With unconstrained step and spirits free!

No crowd impedes your way,
No city wall impedes your further bounds,
Where the wild flock can wander, ye may stray
The long day through, 'mid summer sights and sounds

The sunshine and the flowers,
And the old trees that east a solemn shade,
The pleasant evening, the fresh dewy hours,
And the green hills whereon your fathers played

The gray and ancient peaks
Round which the silent clouds hing day and night,
And the low voice of water as it makes,
Like a glad creature, murmurings of delight

These are your joys! Go forth—
Give your hearts up into their mighty power,
For in His spirit God has clothed the earth,
And speaketh solemnly from tree and flower

The voice of hidden rills
Its quiet way into your spirits finds,
And awfully the everlasting hills
Address you in their many toned winds.

Ye sit upon the earth
Twining its flowers, and shouting full of glee,
And a pure mighty influence, 'mid your mirth,
Moulds your unconscious spirits silently

Hence is it that the lands
Of storm and mountain have the noblest sons,
Whom the world reverences The patriot bands
Were of the hills like you, ye little ones!

Children of pleasant song

Are taught within the mointain solitudes,

For houry legends to your wilds belong,

And yours are haunts where inspiration broads.

Then go forth—earth and sky
To you are tributary, joys are spread
Profusely, like the summer flowers that lie
In the green path, beneath your gamesome tread!

From 'The Rural Life of England' By William Howitt

When you leave [the shepherds of Salisbury Plain], plunge into the New Forest in Hampshire. There is a region where a summer month might be whiled away as in a fairy-land. There, in the very heart of that old forest, you find the spot where Rufus fell by the bolt of Tyrell, looking very much as it might look then. All around you he forest and moorland for many a mile. The fallow and red deer in thousands herd there as of old. The squirrels gambol in the oaks above you, the swine rove in the thick fern and the deep glades of the forest as in a state of nature. The dull tinkle of the entile bell comes through the wood, and ever and anon, as you wander forward, you eated the blue smoke of some ludden abode, curling over the tree tops, and come to sylvan bowers and little bough overslandawed cottages, as primitive as my that the reign of the Conqueror himself could have shown. What haunts are in these glades for poets what streams flow through their bosky banks, to soothe at once the ear and eye enamoured of peace and beauty. What endless groupings and colourings for the painter. At Boldre you may find a spot worth seeing for it is the parsonage once inhabited by the venerable William (alpin—the descendant of Barnard Gilpin, the apostle of the north—the author of Iorest Scener) and near it is the school which he built and endowed for the poor from the sale of his drawings. Not very distant from this stands the rural dwelling of one of England's truest hearted women, Caroline Bowles, and not far off you have the woods of Neiley Abbey, the Isle of Wight, the Solent, and the open sea.

But still move on through the fair fields of Dorset and Somerset, to the enchanted land of Devon. If you want stern grandeur, follow its north western coast, if peaceful beauty, look down into some one of its rich vales, green as an emerald, and pastured by its herds of red cattle if all the summer loveliness of woods and rivers, you may ascend the Tamar or the Tavy, or many another stream, or you may stroll on through valleys that for glorious solitudes, or fair English homes aimed their woods and hills, shall leave you nothing to desire. If you want sternness and loneliness, you may pass into Dartmoor There are wastes and wilds, erags of grante, views into far-off districts, and the sounds of waters hirrying away over their rocky beds, enough to satisfy the largest hungering and thirsting after poetical delight

But even there you need not rest, there lies a land of gray antiquity, of desolate beauty, still before youCornwall. It is a land almost without a tree nll its high and wild plains are destitute of them, and the bulk of its surface is of this character. Some sweet and slichtered vales it has, filled with noble wood, as that of Tresillian near Truro, but over a great portion of n extend gray heathy. It is a land where the wild force seems never to have been tooted up, and where the huge masses of stone that he about its fully and valleys are elad with the lichen of centuries. And yet how does this bare and barren land fasten on your may mation? It is a country that seem to have retained its ancient attachments longer than any oth r. The British ton, we here lingered till litely and the rains of King Arth i's palace still crown the storms steep of Lintagel, and the saint, that succeeds I the heroic race reem to have left their names on almost every town and village

Hugh Miller (1802-56) a self trught man of science with a marvillous command of a good I nglish style, surpressed all his predecessors as an expositor of geology 1 native of Cromarty, he come of a rate of scalaring ment of Scandin with descent and well to do in the world, who owned coasting vessels and built houses in their native One of them had done a little in the was of buccancering on the Spanish Main most of them perished at sea, including Hugh's father, lost in a storm in 1807. The mother was prentgranddinghter of a Celtic seer Donald Ross From boxhood Hugh vas a keen observer, given to collecting shells and stones, and at first selfwilled, wild, and some that intractable. By the aid of two maternal uncles he received the common education of a Scottish country school and it seventeen was by his own desire apprenticed to i stone mason. In the opening chapters of his worl on the Old Red Sandstone he has vavidly recorded his geological discoveries made while tothing at his craft in the Croniarts quarries, 'the necessity that had made him a quarteer taught him also to be a scologist? I owards the end of 1822 his apprenticeship was completed and he went to I'dinburgh for a venr (1824-25), where the strongest impression he experienced was from the preaching of Dr. Phomas M'Crie. Back in the north again Miller ventured on the publication of a volume of Poems, written is the Leisure Hours of a Journeyman Mason (1829), but though the pieces contain many passable things, his prose has more real poetry than his verse. About this time he made the acquaintance of his lifelong friend, Dr. Carruthers, collaborator with Robert Chambers in the first edition of this work, who had printed in the Inciriess Courter some admirably written letters of his on the fisherman's Miller had been a diligent student of life at sea the best English authors, and was already nice in his choice of language

This very remarkable mason was now too conspicuous to be much longer employed in hewing jambs, or even cutting inscriptions on tombstones, a department in which (like Telford the engineer in his early days) he greatly excelled. He carried on his geological studies and researches on the coast lines of the Moray Firth, and the ancient deposits of the line, with their mollusca, belemnites, ammonites, and nautili, involved a study of nomenclature very different from poetical diction Theological controversy also claimed his attention, and as Miller was always a stout polemic, and quite sufficiently pugnacious. he mingled freely in local Church disputes, fore runners of the great national ecclesiastical struggle in which he was also to take a prominent part The Reform Bill gave fresh scope for activity, and Miller was zealous on the popular side. Even before this he had become deeply attached to an accomplished girl in a higher social circle than his own, the course of true love was not quite smooth, but the devotion of the lovers triumphed, and they were married in 1837 Meanwhile Miller had been drawn away from his handicraft, in 1834 he began work as accountant in a Cromarts bank, and the year after he published Scenes and Legends in the North of Scotland, or the Traditional History of Cromarty—a book as remark able for the arrety of its triditional lore as for its admirable style. He was also a contributor to 'Tales of the Borders' and Chambers's Journal, producing stories almost always of a pensive or trigit cast

Lifteen years a stone mason and about six years a bank accountant, Miller was next moved into the post in which he spent the rest of his life ecclesiastical parts in Scotland then known as the 'Non-Intrusionists' or Free Church party projected a newspaper to advocate their views, Miller's sympathies drew him in the same direction, and he had sufficiently shown his literary talents and his zeal in the cause by his letter to Lord Brougham on the Auchterarder case in 1839 By Dr Candlish and other leaders he was now invited to Edinburgh, and in 1840 he entered upon his duties as editor of The II itness, a twice a week Diffident at first, he soon stamped his personality upon his paper, and inade a deep and permanent impression upon the Scottish people As Dr Chalmers put it, Miller took a long time to load, but was a great gun when he did go off He elaborated his leading articles with great care, so that they have been described is 'complete Journalistic essays, symmetrical in plan, finished in execution, and of sustained and splendid ability? Sir Archibald Geikie described Miller as he knew him at this time as 'a man of good height and broad shoulders, clad in a suit of rough tweed, with a shepherd's plaid across his chest and a stout stick in his hand His locks of sindycoloured hair escaped from under a soft felt hat, his blue eyes, either fixed on the ground or gazing dreamily ahead, seemed to take no heed of their His rugged features wore an exsurroundings pression of earnest gravity, softening sometimes into a smile and often suffused with a look of wistful sadness, while the firmly compressed lips betokened strength and determination of character The springy, elastic step with which he moved swiftly along the crowded pavement was that of the mountaineer rather than that of the native of a populous city'

During the remaining fifteen years of his life. besides contributing largely to his paper Miller wrote his work on The Old Red Sandstone (1841). part of which appeared originally in Chambers's Journal and part in the Witness Huxley wrote twenty years afterwards 'The more I study the fishes of the "Old Red" the more I am struck with the patience and sagacity manifested in Hugh Miller's researches and by the natural insight, which in his case seems to have supplied the place of special anatomical knowledge.' A long projected visit to England in 1845 furnished material for his First Impressions of England and its People (1847) Then followed Footbrints of the Creator, or the Asterolepis of Stromness (1850), a reply to the Vestiges of Creation, and a strenuous denial of the development theory. Schools and Schoolmasters, an autobiography (1854), and The Testimony of the Rocks, completed by him but not published till after his death (24th December 1856). He had overtasked his brain, and for some time suffered from visions and delusions combined with paroxysms of acute physical pain. In one of those moments of disordered reason, awaking from a hideous dream, he shot himself through the heart. Several posthumous works appeared—The Cruise of the

Betsey, or a Summer Ramble among the Lossiliferous Debosits of the Hebrides (1858), the Skitch Book of Popular Geology (1859), The Headship of 'Christ (1861), Lisais, reprinted from the Witness (1862), and Leading Articles (1870), Taks and Sketches (1863), Lamburgh and its Neighbourhood (1864) Sir Archibald Geikie lias declared that the debt which geology ones to Miller in deepening the interest in geological study by his writings has never been adequately repaid, and has insisted that for elegance of narrative, combined with clearness and vividness of description, he knew no writing in the whole of scientific literal ture superior or perhaps equal to Millers. In The Old Red Sandstone Miller was a discoverer, adding to our knowledge of organic remains various members of a great family of fishes, one of which bears now the name of Ptoschilly's He illustrated also the less known flori of Scotland-those of the Old Red Sindstone and But Miller's peculiar gift was his power of vivid description, which three a sort of romantic splendour over the fossil remains and gave life and beauty to the geological Lindscape

In The Testinous of the Rocks 1(57) he sought to reconcile his admission of the intiquity of the globe with the Mosaic account of the Creation He once believed with Buckland and Chalmers that the six dies of the Mosaic narrance were simply natural days of twenty four hours each but he was compelled by his heological researches I evisioned a transparent atmosphere - of a firmainen to hold that the days of creation were not natural but proplicite days -unincisured eras of time stretching for back into the largone eternite The revelation to Moses he supposed to have been optical—a series of visions seen in a recess of the Midian desert, and described by the propliet, in language fitted to the ideas of his times hypothesis of the Mosnic vision is old -25 old is the time of Whiston, who had propounded it a century and a half before this, but in Miller's hands the vision became a splendid piece of sacred poetry

The Mosaic Vision of Creation.

Such a description of the creative vision of Mo es as the one given by Milton of that vision of the future which he represents as conjured up before Adam by the archangel would be a task rather for the scientific poet than for the mere practical geologist or solar theologism. Let us suppose that it took place for from ninn, in an iintrodden recess of the Midian desert, cre yet the vision of the burning bush had been vouchsafed, and that, as in the vision of St John in Patnios, volces were mingled with scenes, and the car as certainly addressed as the eye A 'great darkness' first falls upon the proplict, like that which in an earlier age fell mpon Abraham, but without the 'horror' and as the Divine Spirit moves on the face of the wildly troubled waters as a visible aurora enveloped by the pitchs cloud, the great doctrine is orally enunciated, that 'in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth? Unreckoned ages, condensed in the vision into a few brief moments, pass awas, the creative source is gram heard, 'Let there be hight,' and straights up a gray diffused by his springs up in the east, and, casting its sielly glean over a cloud limited exponence streaming supporting the leavens to wards the wet. One heaves, unless day is made the representative of myriads, the faint light waxes for the severe of the drama closs upon the eart, and he is to while out his hill top in darkness, solitars last not rad, in what seems to be a culm and tasks on, bit

That lower stritum of the beatens over por in the piesson vision by cellung steam or gray, smale like fog is clear and transparent, and only in an upper region, where the previously invisible soper of the tepil sea he thickened in the cell, do the clouds appear I'm there, in the light e state of the remains cre, there he thel and monifold -an upper to of great naveeparated from the e-beneath hi the transferer, from ment, and, like him too, imported in rolling no me In the wind. A mighty change has taken place in creation, but its most on pirmy optical sign is the stratched out over the earth that separ tes the staters above from the waters below. But durknes elevenis for the third time upon the seer, for the evening and the morning have completed the second day

Let again the light reas under a caropa of cloud, but the some has changed, and there is no larger an unbroken expans of sea. The scene is one of mights fore-is of cone bearing trees-of palms and tree ferns and gigantic club mosses on the opener slopes, and of great reeds clustering in the sides of quiet lakes and dark rading There - deep gloom in the recesses of the thicker woods, and low thick mists creep along the dank march or sluggish stream. But there is a general lighten. ing of the sky overhead as the day declines a redder flush than had hitherto lighted up the pro pect falls athwart forn covered bank and long withdrawing glade And while the fourth evening has fallen on the prophet, he becomes sensible, as it weres on and the fourth dawn approaches, that yet another change has taken place The Creator has spol en, and the stars look out from openings of deep unclouded blue, and as day rises and the planet of morning pales in the east, the broken cloudlets are transmuted from bronze into gold, and anon the gold becomes fire, and at length the glorious sun arises out of the sea, and enters on his course rejoicing. It is a brilliant day, the waves, of a deeper and softer blue than before, dance and sparkle in the light, the earth, with little else to attract the gaze, has assumed a garb of brighter green, and as the sun declines amid even richer glories than those which had encircled his rising, the moon appears full orbed in the east—to the human eye the second great luminary of the heavens—and climbs slowly to the zenith as night advances, shedding its mild radiance on land and sea.

Again the day breaks, the prospect consists, as before, of land and ocean There are great pine woods, reed covered swamps, wide plains, winding rivers, and broad lakes, and a bright sun shines over all. But the landscape derives its interest and novelty from a feature unmarked before. Gigantic birds stalk along the sands or wade far into the water in quest of their ichthyic food, while birds of lesser size float upon the lakes, or scream discordant in hovering flocks, thick as insects in the calm of a summer evening, over the narrower seas. or brighten with the sunlit gleam of their wings the thick woods And ocean has its monsters great tanninim tempest the deep, as they heave their buge bulk over the surface, to inhale the life sustaining air, and out of their nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a 'seething pot or caldron' Monstrous creatures, armed in massive scales, haunt the rivers or scour the flat, rank meadows, earth, air, and water are charged with animal life, and the sun sets on a busy scene, in which unerring instinct pursues unremittingly its few simple ends-the support and preservation of the individual, the propagation of the species, and the protection and maintenance of the

Again the night descends, for the fifth day has closed, and morning breaks on the sixth and last day of creation Cattle and beasts of the field graze on the plains, the thick skinned rhinoceros wallows in the marshes, the squat hippopotamus rustles among the reeds or plunges sullenly into the river, great herds of elephants seek their food amid the young herbage of the woods, while animals of fiercer nature—the lion, the leopard, and the bear-harbour in deep caves till the evening, or lie in wait for their prey amid tangled thickets, or beneath some broken bank. At length, as the day wanes and the shadows lengthen, man, the responsible lord of crea tion, formed in God's own image, is introduced upon the scene, and the work of creation ceases for ever upon the The night falls once more upon the prospect, and there dawns yet another morrow—the morrow of God's rest-that Divine Sabbath in which there is no more creative labour, and which, 'blessed and sanctified' be yond all the days that had gone before, has as its special object the moral elevation and final redemption of man And over tt no evening is represented in the record as falling, for its special work is not yet complete. Such seems to have been the sublime panorima of creation exhibited in vision of old to

'The shepherd who first taught the chosen seed, In the beginning how the heavens and earth Rose out of chaos,' and, rightly understood, I know not a single scientific truth that militates against even the minutest or least prominent of its details

Beginnings of a Working-Man in Geology

It was eighteen years last Tebruary since I set out from my mother's cottage a little before sunrise, to male my first acquaintance with a life of labour and restraint, and I have rarely had a heavier heart than on that morn I was a slim, loose jointed boy at the time, fond of the pretty intangibilities of romance, and of dreaming when broad awake, and I was now going to work as a mason's apprentice in one of the Cromarty quarries. Bating the passing unersinesses occasioned by a few gloomy anticipations, the portion of my life which liad already gone by had been happy beyond the common lot I had been a wanderer among rocks and woods, a reader of curious little books, a gleaner of old tradi tionary stories I had written bad verses, too, without knowing they were bad, and indulged in unrealisable hopes, without being in the least aware that they were unrealisable, and I was now going to exchange all my day dreams and all my amusements for the kind of life in which men toil every day that they may be enabled to eat, and eat every day that they may be enabled to The time I had so long dreaded had at length arrived, and I felt that I was going down into a wilder ness more desolate than that of Sinai, with little prospect of ever getting beyond it, and no hope of return

The quarry in which my master wrought lies on the southern side of the bay of my native town, about an hundred yards from the shore, with a little clear stream on the one side, and a thick fir wood on the other has been opened in the old red sandstone of the district, and is overtopped by a huge bank of diluvial clay, which rises over it in some places to the height of nearly thirty feet, and which was at this time rent and shivered, wherever it presented an open front to the weather, by a recent frost A heap of loose fragments which had fallen from above blocked up the face of the quarry, and the first employment assigned me by my master was to clear them away. The friction of the shovel soon blistered my hands, but the pun was by no means very severe and I wrought hard and willingly, that I might see how the huge strata below, which presented us with so unbroken a frontage, were to be torn up and removed Picks and wedges and levers were applied by my brother workmen, and simple and rude as I had been accus tomed to regard these implements, I found I had much They all proved to learn in the way of using them insufficient, however, and we had to bore into one of the inferior strata, and employ gunpowder. The process was new to me, and I deemed it a highly amusing one, it had the mcrit, too, of being attended by some such degree of danger as a boating exentsion, and had thus an interest independent of its novelty We had a few capital shots, the frigments flew in every direction, and an immense mass of the diluvium came toppling down, bearing with it two dead birds that in a recent storm had crept into one of the deeper fissures to die in the shelter I felt a new interest in examining them The one was a pretty cock goldfinch, with its hood of vermilion, and its wings inlaid with the gold to which it owes its name, as unsoiled and smooth as if it had been preserved for a museum, the other, a somewhat rarer bird of the woodpecker tribe, was variegated with light blue and a greyish yellow I was engaged in admiring the poor little things, more disposed to be sentimental than if I had been ten years older, and thinking of the contrast between the warmth and jollity of their green summer haunts, and the cold and darkness of their last retreat, when I heard my master bidding the workmen has by their tools. I looked up, and saw the sun sunking behind the thick fir wood be ide us, and the long dark shadows of the trees stretching downwards towards the shore.

This was no very formidable beginning of the course To be sure, my hands of life I had so much dreaded were a little sore and I felt nearly as much fulf, well as if I had been chinbing among the rocks but I had wrought and been useful, and had yet enjoyed the day fully as much as usual. It was no small matter, too, that the evening, converted by a rare transmutation into the dehenous 'blink of rest' which Burns so truthfully describes, was all my own. I was as light of heart next morning as any of my brother worl menbeen a smart frost during the night, and the grawhite and crisp as we passed onward through the fields but the sun rose in a clear atmosphere, and the disincllowed as it advanced into on of those delightful days of early spring which give so pleasing an earne t of whitever is mild and genial in the better half of the year. We all rested at middiny and I went to emory my half hour alone on a mo sy knot in the neighbouring wood, which commands through the tree a wife propect of the bay and the opposite shore. There was not a wrinkle on the water nor a cloud in the slav and the branches were as moveless in the calm as if they had been traced on canvas. I rom a wooded promontory that stretches half was across the fieth there a centerla thin column of smoke. It to eas straight as the line of a plummer for more than a thou and yards, and then on reaching a thinner stratum of air, special out equally on every side like the foliage of a stately time. Hen Weavis [Wyris] rose to the west, white with the vet unwisted snows of writer, and as sharply defined in the clear ity of sphere as if all its sunny slop a and blue retiring hollows A line of snow ran along had been chiscled in marble the opposite hills, all above vas white, and all below was purple. They reminded me of the pretty I tench story in which an old must is decreased a tasking the ingenuity of his future son in his by giving him, as a subject for his pencil a flower piece composed of only white flowers the one half of them in their proper colour the other half of a leep purple, and yet all per feetly natural, and how the young min resolved the riddle and gained his mistre's by introducing a trans parent purple vase into the picture, and making the light pass through it on the flowers that were drooping over the edge. I returned to the quarry, convinced that a very exquisite pleasure may be a very cheap one, and that the busiest employments may afford leisure enough (From Chambers & Fdu b irgh Journal, 1837.)

The National Intellect of England and Scotland.

There is an order of I nglish mind to which Scotland has not attained our first men stand in the second rink, not a foot breadth behind the foremost of I-ng land's second rank men, but there is a front rank of British intellect in which there stands no Scotchman Like that class of the mighty men of David to which Abishai and Benaiah belonged—great captains who went down into pits in the time of snow and slew hons, or 'who lifted up the spear against three hundred men at once, and prevailed '—they attained not, with all their greatness, to the might of the first class. Sir Archibald Alison (1792-1867), author of the History of Lurope, was the eldest son of the Archibald Mison, author of the Excy on Inste (Vol II p 630), and his mother has a drughter of Dr John Gregory of Edinburgh He was born at his father's parsonage of Kealey in Shropshire, but Mr Alison having in 1800 removed to Edinburgh, Archibald studied at Edinburgh University, was admitted to the Bar in 1814, was ndvocate-depute (public prosecutor) in 1822-30 and in 1834 was appointed Sheriff of Lanark shire, thenceforward hving at Possil House near He was an industrious and prosperous Glasgon advocate, and a hard working and independent judge, who systematically so economised his time as never to allow his constant literary labours to encroach on his often harassing judicial

The Reign of Terror

This terminated the Reign of Terror, a period fraught with greater political instruction than any of equal duration which has existed since the beginning of the In no former period had the efforts of the people so completely triumphed, or the higher orders been so thoroughly crashed by the lower The throne had been overturned, the altar destroyed, the aristocracy levelled with the dust the nobles were in exile, the elergy in captivity, the gentry in affliction. A merciless sword had waved over the state, destroying alike the dignity of rank, the splendour of talent, and the graces of beauty All that excelled the labouring classes in situation, fortune, or acquirement had been removed, they had triumphed over their oppressors, seized their possessions, and risen into their stations. And what was the conse quence? The establishment of a more cruel and revolt ing tyrinny than any which mankind had yet witnessed, the destruction of all the charities and enjoyments of life, the dreadful spectacle of streams of blood flowing through every part of France. The earliest friends, the warmest advocates, the firmest supporters of the people were swept off indiscriminately with their bitterest enemies, in the unequal struggle, virtue and philan thropy sank under ambition and violence, and society returned to a state of chaos, when all the elements of private or public happiness were scattered to the winds Such are the results of unchaining the passions of the multitude, such the peril of suddenly admitting the light upon a benighted people. The extent to which blood was shed in France during this melaucholy period will hardly be credited by future age. The Republican Prudhomme, whose prepossessions led him to anything rather than an exaggeration of the horrors of the popular party, has given the following appalling account of the victims of the Revolution

In this enumeration are not comprehended the mas sacres at Versailies, at the Abbey, the Carmes, or other prisons on September 2, the victims of the Glaciere of Avignon, those shot at Toulon and Marseille, or the persons slain in the little town of Bedoin, of which the whole population perished. It is in an especial manner remarkable, in this dismal catalogue, how large a propor tion of the victims of the Revolution were persons in the middling and lower ranks of life. The priests and nobles guillotined are only 2413, while the persons of plebeian origin exceed 13,000! The nobles and priests put to death at Nantes were only 2160, while the infants drowned and shot are 2000, the women 764, and the artisans 53001. So rapidly in revolutionary convulsions does the career of cruelty reach the lower orders, and so widespread is the carriage dealt out to them, com pared with that which they have sought to inflict ou The facility with which a faction, com their superiors posed of a few of the most audaeious and reel less of the nation, triumphed over the immense majority of their fellow citizens, and led them forth like victims to the sacrifice, is not the least extraordinary or memorable part of that eventful period. The bloody faction at Paris never exceeded a few hundred men, their talents were by no means of the highest order, nor their weight in society considerable, yet they trampled under foot all the influential classes, ruled mighty armies with absolute sway, kept 200,000 of their fellow citizens in captivity, and daily led out several hundred persons, of the best blood in France, to execution effect of the unity of action which atrocious wickeduess produces, such the ascendency which in periods of anarchy is acquired by the most savage and lawless of the people. The peaceable and mossensive citizens lived and wept in silence, terror crushed every attempt at combination, the extremity of grief subdued even the firmest hearts. In despair of effecting any change in the general sufferings, apathy universally prevailed, the people sought to bury their sorrows in the delirium of present enjoyments, and the theatres were never fuller than during the whole duration of the Reign of Terror Ignorance of human nature can alone lead us to ascribe this to any peculiarity in the French character, the same effects have been observed in all parts and ages of the world as invariably attending a state of extreme and long continued distress. The death of Hebert and the anarchists was that of guilty depravity, that of Robes pierre and the Decemvirs, of sanguinary fanaticism, that of Danton and his confederates, of stoical infidelity, that of Midame Roland and the Girondists, of deluded virtue, that of Louis and his family, of religious forgive The moralist will contrast the different effects of virtue and wickedness in the last moments of life, the Christian will mark with thankfulness the superiority in the supreme hour to the sublimest efforts of human virtue which was evinced by the believers in his own faith.

Patrick Fraser Tytler (1791-1849), author of a History of Scotland, was the son of Alexander Fraser Tytler, Lord Woodhouselee, who wrote Elements of General History (1801), and grandson of William Tytler, who, as author of the Inquiry into the Evidence against Mary Queen of Scots (1759), was hailed by Burns as the 'revered defender of beauteous Stuart.' Patrick Fraser Tytler was, like his father, bred mainly at Edinburgh for the Scottish Bar, and wrote Lives of the Admirable Crichton (1819), Sir Thomas Craig (1823), the Scottish Worthies (1831-33), Sir Walter

Raleigh, and Henry VIII (1837) His History of Scotland (1828-43), from the accession of Alexander III to the union of the crowns in 1603, was an attempt to 'build the history of that country upon unquestionable muniments' The author claimed to have anxiously examined the most authentic sources of information, and conveyed a true picture of the times, without pre-By his conscientious possession or partiality study of original authorities he, like Pinkerton, Chalmers, and M'Crie, threw fresh light on many periods of Scottish history, and though he took up a few doubtful opinions on questions of fact (such as that John Knox was accessory to the murder of Rizzio), his work is in large departments of the subject still well worthy of study, and has by no means been superseded by his successorsin some respects his history is better proportioned and better written than Hill Burton's It was at Sir Walter Scott's suggestion that he undertook the task, and he devoted to it twenty years of hard work. In 1839 he edited two volumes of original documents illustrating the reigns of Edward VI and Queen Mary Tudor, a praiseworthy contribution to the study of historical records Dean Burgon wrote a Life of Tytler (1859)

Cosmo Times (1798-1874), most learned and accomplished of Scottish legal antiquaries, came up from Deeside to the Edinburgh High School, and graduated both at Glasgow and at Oxford Having passed as advocate in 1822, he became Sheriff of Moray in 1840, then an official of the Court of Session, and in 1846 Professor of Constitutional Law and History in the University of Edinburgh He is best known as the author of an eminently suggestive book on Scotland in the Middle Ages (1860) and of interesting Sketches of Early Scotch History (1861) He helped to edit some of the early Acts of the Scottish Parliament, was a member of the Bannatyne, Maitland, and Spalding Clubs, and edited for them several register-books of the old religious houses of Scot-His lectures (practically a manual) on Scottish Legal Antiquities (1872) have never been superseded, and he wrote several memoirs, including one of Dean Ramsay A Memoir of him was prepared by his daughter, Mrs Hill Burton (1874)

David Laing (1793-1878), a learned, laborious, and accurate antiquary, was the son of an Edinburgh bookseller, for thirty years followed his father's trade, and from 1837 till his death was librarian of the Signet Library Honorary secretary of the Bannatyne Club, he edited many of its issues, and his contributions to the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland were innumerable. An LLD of Edinburgh, he bequeathed many rare MSS to the university His more important works were his editions of Baillie's Letters and Journals (1841-42), of John Knov's works (1846-64), and of the Scottish poets, Sir David Lyndsny, Dunbar, and Henryson

Mark Napier (1798-1879), son of an Edinburgh lawyer sprung from the Merchiston stock, was educated at the High School and university of his native town, and having practised as advocate for near quarter of a century, was appointed Sheriff of Dumfries and Gallowing He published some legal works, but is best known for his Memoirs of the Marguis of Montrose (2 vols 1856) and Memorials of Graham of Claverhouse (1859-60), both written in a vehemently anti Presbyterian, Cavalier, and Jacobite temper, and, though conspicuously without the judicial and historical spirit, by no means lacking in historical value He rused a fierce controversy by attempting to prove that the 'Wigtown Martyrs' were pardoned, although they had certainly been condemned to be (and according to tradition were) drowned for refusing the abjurtion oath in 1685

George Lillie Craik (1798-1866), a Fife man from Kennoway, studied for the Church at St Andrews, but went to London in 1826, and an 1849 became Professor of History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast Among his works were The Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties (1831), a History of British Commerce (3 vols 1844), books on famous English trials, on Spenser, Bacon, the romance of the peerage, Shakespeare's English, and his best-known work, the History of English Literature and the English Lauguage (2 vols 1861), which passed through nine or ten editions. It was a modified form of a six-volume work, a History of Literature and Learning in England, issued in 1844. He wrote much for the Penny Magazine and the like, prepared a number of manuals, and was joint-author with another of The Pictorial History of England -His youngest daughter, Georgiana Marion Craik (1831-95), born in London, married Mr A. W. May, and from 1857 published over thirty novels—Lost and Won (1859) the most popular -Miss Mulock (Mrs Craik) the novelist married his nephew

Joseph Train (1779-1852), son of a farmgrieve in the upland Ayrshire parish of Sorn, became a weaver in Ayr, then served in the militia, and from 1806 was an excise officer in Ayr Here and later at Newton Stewart he read industriously, collected traditions, and wrote verses Strains of the Mountain Muse (1814), incorporating local traditions of the south-west of Scotland, supported by acute notes, secured Scott's esteem, and for many years Train sent all the scraps of song or folklore he could collect direct to Scott. Thus Scott got very valuable materials for poems and novels—for Red Gauntlet, Wandering Willie's Tale, and The Tales of my Landlord amongst others, as well as the characters of Old Mortality. Edie Ochiltree, and Madge Wildfire Trun was ultimately supervisor of revenue at Castle-Douglas till his retirement in 1850. He was a contributor to Chambers's Journal, and wrote a history of the Isle of Man and of the Buchanite sect.

He then settled in Edinburgh, and endeavoured to sub sist by his pen A collection of songs, The Forest Ifinstrel (1810), was followed by a periodical called The Spy, but it was The Queen's II ake (1813) that established his reputation 'legendary poem' consists of a collection of tales and ballads supposed to be sung to Mary, Queen of Scots, by the native bards of Scotland assembled at a royal wake at Holvrood, in order that the fair queen might prove 'the wondrous powers of Scottish song' Its design and execution both helped to rank Hogg among the first of modern Scottish poets. The imaginary lays of the local minstrels are strung together by an ingenious and often surprisingly graceful thread of narrative-in English, like the bulk of his longer poems, whereas his best-known songs are in vernacular Scotch Other works followed- Mador of the Moor, in Spenserian stanza, The Pilgrams of the Sun, in blank verse, The Hunting of Badlewe, The Pectic Mirror (imitations of Wordsworth, Byron, Scott, Coleridge, and others), Queen Hynde, Dia matic Tales, also several novels, including Winter Licining Tales, The Brownie of Bodsbeck, The Three Perils of Man, The Three Perils of II oman, The Confessions of a Justified Sinner 1 he last, also called Confessions of a Fanatic, is a powerful fragment, the authorship of which has sometimes been attributed to Lockhart, but on inadequate evidence Hogg collected two volumes of Jacobite Relics (1819-20), and some of the songs contri buted by his own pen are among the best known of the so called Jacobite lyrics ('Cam ye by Athol,' 'Flort Macdonald's Lament') Mr Henderson credits Hogg with the authorship of 'Auld Maitland' and parts of other fine ballads in Scott's Boider Minstrelsy A really valuable contributor to Blackwoo Ps Magazine, he was partly idealised, partly caricatured by Wilson as one of the interlocutors in the Noctes Ambrosiana was the 'half inspired, delightful talker of the Aactes,' but he was one of the most characteristic of the figures that brought 'Maga'its fame vanity and desire for notoriety were indeed portentous, his head was turned by his success, and his familiarity in society went beyond the bounds of good breeding. The suggestion of the famous Chaldee MS (October 1817) was his, he claimed, indeed, to have written most of it (specifically the first two chapters, part of the third and of the last), though much of the best is certainly Lockhart's On the other hand, Hogg complained, and with reason, that ballads and verses of all kinds which he had never seen were in 'Maga' put in his mouth An illustration of the Shepherd of the Aoches will be found in the article on Professor Wilson (page Later prose works were Lay Sermons, Montrose Tales, and his sadly all judged book on The Private Life of Sir Walter Scott Hogg's prose is very unequal. some of his stories are utter failures, yet some have many happy touches In 1817 he was back in the Three years later he married Border country the daughter of an Annandale farmer, who was twenty years his junior, and their married life was very happy He lived in a cottage he had built at Altrive, also called Mossend and Eldinhope, on a piece of moorland-seventy acresgranted to him at a nominal rent by the dying bequest of the Duchess of Buccleuch Though he had fulled as a sheep-farmer, he ventured again, and took another large farm, Mount Benger, from the Duke of Buccleuch Here too he was unsuccessful, and his sole support for the latter years of his life was what he earned by writing In the end of 1831 he visited London to arrange for a complete edition of his works, and had the satisfaction of being lionised there. In the autumn of 1835 he fell ill, and he died on the 21st of November

The truly amazing thing about the Shepherd is that, with his rollicking, boisterous, and almost coarse humour, and his notorious defects of taste, he nevertheless sustained unbroken flights in almost pure ether He could abandon himself entirely to the genius of local and legendary story, he certainly proved himself at home in scenes of visionary splendour and unimaginable purity and His Kilmeny is one of the finest of fairy tales, passages in the Pilgrims of the Sun have much of the same ethereal beauty. Akin to this feature in Hogg's poetry is the spirit of many of his songs—a lyrical flow that is sometimes inexpressibly sweet and musical, and is withal spontaneous and natural He wanted art to con struct a fable, and taste to make the most of his fertility in ideas and imagery, but few poets impress us more with the feeling of direct inspiration, or convince us so strongly that poetry is indeed an art 'unteachable and untaught'

Jeffrey greeted Hogg as 'a poet in the highest acceptation of the term,' Professor Ferrier described him, in accordance with the accepted opinions, as the greatest poet next to Burns that had ever sprung from the bosom of the common people. And speaking of Kilmeny and contemporary work of Hogg's, Professor Saintsbury has said that there is no such poetry in Crabbe or Rogers, little in Southey, and not much in Moore

The following is a bit of Hogg's Autobiography

For several years my compositions consisted wholly of songs and ballads, made up for the lasses to sing in chorus, and a proud man I was when I first heard the rosy nymphs chanting my uncouth strains, and jeering me by the still dear appellation of 'Jamie the poeter'

I laid no more difficulty in composing songs then than I have at present, and I was equally well pleased with them. But then the writing of them '—that was a job' I had no method of learning to write save by following the italic alphabet, and though I always stripped myself of coat and vest when I began to pen a song, yet my wrist took a cramp, so that I could rarely make above four or six lines at a sitting. Whether my manner of writing it out was new I know not, but it was not with out singularity Having very little spare time from my flock, which was unruly enough, I folded and stitched n few sheets of paper, which I carried in my pocket. I had no inkhorn, but in place of it I borrowed a small phial, which I fixed in a hole in the breast of my waist coat; and having n cork fastened by n piece of twine, it answered the purpose fully as well. Thus equipped, whenever a leisure minute or two offered, and I had nothing else to do, I sat down and wrote out my thoughts as I found them This is still my invariable practice in writing prose I cannot make out one sentence by study without the pen in my hand to catch the ideas as they arise, and I never write two copies of the same thing My manner of composing poetry is very different, and, I believe, much more singular. Let the piece be of what length it will, I compose and correct it wholly in my mind, or on a slate, ere ever I put pen to paper, and then I write it down as fast as the ABC When once it is written, it remains in that state, it being with the utmost difficulty that I can be brought to alter one syllable, which I think is partly owing to the above practice.

The first time I ever heard of Burns was in 1797, the year after he died One day during that summer a lialf dast man, named John Scott, came to me on the hill, and, to amuse me, repeated 'Tam O'Shinnter' I was I was for more than delighted-I was delighted ravished! I cannot describe my feelings, but, in short, before Jock Scott left me I could recite the poem from beginning to end, and it has been my favourite poem ever since. He told me it was made by one Robert Burns, the sweetest poe that ever was born, but that he was now dead, and his place would never be supplied told me all about him how he was born on the 25th of January bred a ploughman, how many beautiful songs and poems he had composed, and that he had died list liarvest, on the 21st of August This formed a new epoch of my life. Every day I pondered on the genius and fate of Burns I wept, and always thought with myself-what is to hinder me from succeeding Burns? I, too, was born on the 25th of January, and I have much more time to read and compose than any plough man could have, and can sing more old songs than ever ploughman could in the world. But then I wept ngain However, I resolved to be a because I could not write poet, and to follow in the steps of Burns

The enthusiasm with which he [Scott] recited and spoke of our ancient ballads during that first toar of his through the Forest inspired me with a determination immediately to begin and imitate them, which I did, and soon grew tolerably good at it. I dedicated The Mountain Bard to him

Where neighbouring hind or cot was none—
Our converse was with heaven alone—

That her youth and beauty never might fade, And they sauled on heaven when they saw her he

In the stream of life that wandered by,

And she heard a song, she heard it sung

She kend no where, but sae sweetly it rung,

It fell on her ear like a dream of the morn

*Oh, blest le the day Allmeny was born !

Not little it I en what a woman may be !

The sun that shines on the world see longht,

Nov shall the land of the spirits see, knew

A borrowed gleid frac the fountain of light,
And the moon that sleeks the sky sac dun,
Like a gowden bow or a beamless sun,
Shall wear away and be seen nae mair,
And the angels shall miss them travelling the air
But lang, lang after baith night and day,
When the sun and the world have elyed away,
When the sinner has gane to his waesome doom,
Kilmeny shall smile in eternal bloom 1'

Then Kilmeny begged again to see The friends she had left in her own countrye, To tell of the place where she had been, And the glories that lay in the land unseen With distant music, soft and deep, They lulled Kilmeny sound asleep, And when she awakened she lay her lane, All happed with flowers in the greenwood wene When seven lang years had come and fled, When grief was calm and hope was dead, When scarce was remembered Kilmeny's name, Late, late in a gloamin Kilmeny came hame 1 at dusk And oh, her beauty was fair to see, But still and steadfast was her ec, Such heauty bard may never declare, For there was no pride nor passion there, And the soft desire of maiden's een In that mild face could never be seen Her seymar was the hily flower, cymar, smock And her cheek the moss rose in the shower. And her voice like the distant melodye That florts along the twilight sea. But she loved to raike the lanely glen, wander through And keeped afar frae the haunts of men, Her holy lymns unlieard to sing, To suck the flowers and drink the spring, But wherever her peaceful form appeared, The wild beasts of the hill were cheered, The wolf played blithely round the field, The lordly bison lowed and kneeled, The dun deer wooed with manner bland, And cowered aneath her lily hand And when at eye the woodlands rung, When hymns of other worlds she sung, In ecstasy of sweet devotion, Oh, then the glen was all in motion, The wild heasts of the forest came, Broke from their bughts and faulds the tame, pens and folds And goved around, charmed and amazed, Even the dull cattle erooned and grzed, And murmured, and looked with anxious prin For something the mystery to explain The buzzard came with the throstle cock, The corby left her houf in the rock, raven-haunt The blackbird along wa' the eagle flew, The hind came tripping o'er the dew, The wolf and the kid their ruke began, And the too, and the lamb, and the leveret ran, The hawk and the hern attour them hung heron-above And the merl and the mavis forhoosed their young, forsook And all in a peaceful ring were hurled drawn It was like an eve in a sinless world 1 When a month and a day had come and gane, Kilmeny sought the greenwood wene, There laid her down on the leaves so green, And Kilmeny on earth was never mair seen !

To the Comet of 1811

How lovely is this wildered scene,
As twilight from her vaults so blue
'Steals soft o'er Yarrow's mountains green,
To sleep embalmed in midnight dew!

All hail, ye hills, whose towering height, Like shadows, secops the yielding sky ' And thou, mysterious guest of night, Dread traveller of immensity?

Stranger of heaven! I but thee hail!
Shred from the pall of glory riven,
That flashest in celestial gale,
Broad pennon of the King of Heaven!

Art thou the flag of woe and death,

From angel's ensign staff unfurled?

Art thou the standard of His wrath

Waved o'er a sordid, sinful world?

No, from that pure pellucid beam,
That erst o'er plains of Bethlehem shone,
No latent evil we can deem,
Bright herald of the eternal throne!

Whate'er portends thy front of fire,
Thy streaming locks so lovely pile—
Or peace to man, or judgments dire,
Stringer of heaven, I bid thee hal!

Where hast thou roamed these thousand years?
Why sought these polar paths again,
From wilderness of glowing spheres,
To fling thy vesture o'er the wain?

And when thou scal'st the Milky way
And vanishest from liuman view,
A thousand worlds shall hail thy ray
Through wilds of you empyreal blue!

Oh, on thy rapid prow to glide!

To sail the boundless skies with thee,
And plough the twinkling stars aside,
Like foam bells on a tranquil sea!

To brush the embers from the sun,
The reacles from off the pole,
Then far to other systems run,
Where other moons and planets roll 1

Stranger of heaven! oh, let thine eye
Smile on a rapt enthusiast's dream,
Eccentric as thy course on high,
And airy as thine ambient beam!

And long, long may thy silver ray
Our northern arch at eve adorn,
Then, wheeling to the cast away,
Light the gray portals of the morn

When the Kye comes Hame.

Come all ye jolly shepherds
That whistle through the glen,
I'll tell ye of a secret
That courtiers dinna ken,
What is the greatest bliss
That the tongue o' man can name?
'Tis to woo a bonny lassic
When the kye comes hame.

When the kyc comes hame,
When the kyc comes hame,
'Tween the gloamin and the mirk, dark
When the kyc comes hame

Tis not beneath the coronet,
Nor canopy of state,
'Tis not on couch of velvet,
Nor arbour of the great—
'Tis beneath the spreading birk,
In the glen without the name,
Wi' a bonny, bonny lasse,
When the kye comes hame.

There the blackbard bigs his nest
For the mate he lo'es to see,
And on the topinost bough,
Oh, a happy bird is he!
Then he pours his melting ditty,
And love is a the theme,
And he'll woo his bonny lassie
When the blewart bears a pearl, speedwelf

And the days turns a pea,

And the bonny lucken gowan marsh marigold

Has fauldit up her ec,

Then the laverock frac the blue lift tark

Draps down, and thinks mae shame

To woo his bonny lassic When the kye comes hame

See yonder panks shepherd
That langers on the hill—
Illis vowes are in the fauld,
And his lambs are lying still,
I et he down gang to bed,
I or his heart is in a flame
To meet his bonny lassie
When the lave comes hame

When the little wee bit heart
Rises high in the breast,
And the little wee bit tarn
Rises red in the east,
Oh, there's a joy sae dear,
That the heart can hardly frame,
Wi'a bonny, bonny lassic,
When the kye comes hange.

Then since all nature joins
In this love without alloy,
Oh, who wad prove a traitor
To nature's dearest jor?
Or wha wad choose a crown,
Wints perils and its fame,
And miss his bonny lassie
When the kye comes hame?
When the kye comes hame?
When the kye comes hame,
'Tween the gloanin and the mirk,
When the kye comes hame,

The Skylark,

Bird of the wilderness,
Blithesome and cumberless,
Sweet be thy matin o'er moorland and lea!
Emblem of happiness,
Blest is thy dwelling place—
O to abide in the desert with thee!

Wild is thy lay and loud,
Far in the downy cloud,
I ove gives it energy, love give it birth,
Where, on thy dewy wing,
Where art thou journeying?
Thy lay is in heaven, thy love is on earth

O'er fell and fountain sheen,
O'er moor and mountain green,
O'er the red streamer that heralds the day,
Over the cloudlet dim,
Over the rambow's rim,
Musical cherula, soar, singing, away'
Then when the gloaming comes,
Low in the heather blooms,
Sweet will thy welcome and bed of love beat miller of happine s,
Blest is thy dwelling place—
O to alade in the desert with thee!

John Galt. author of Ile Annals, of the Parish, was born and May 1779 at Irvine in Ayrshire, where his fither commanded a West India vessel, and when the box was in his eleventh year his people went to live at Greenock He got a borth in the custom house of the port. and continued at the desk, contributing verses to local papers and writing a good deal till about the year 1804, when, without any appointment or definite prospects he went to London to 'pash his fortune? He had written what he called an 'epic poem' on the Battle of Largs, and this he committed to the press but he did not prefix his name, and almost immediately suppressed the production An unlucky commercial connection embarrassed him for three years, and next he became a student of Lincoln's Inn. On a visit to Oxford he conceived, while standing in the quad rangle of Christ Church, the design of writing a Life of Cardinal Wolsey He set about the task with ardour, but his health failing, he went abroad with a commission to see if and how British goods might be exported to the Continent in spite of Napoleon's Berlin and Milan decrees. At Gibraltar he met Byron and Hobhouse, then on their way to Greece, and the three sailed in the same packet. Galt stayed some time in Sicily, then from Malta went to Greece, where he again met Byron, and interviewed Ali Pasha rambling for some time in Greece he reached Constantinople, Nicomedia and the Black Sea Quarantined for a time during these eccentric wanderings, Galt wrote or sketched six dramas, which were, according to Sir Walter Scott, 'the worst tragedies ever seen! On his return he published his Voyages and Travels and Letters from the Levant, which contain much interesting and debatable matter, and his Life of Wolsey, a poor book both in matter and style Galt next settled at Gibraltar, apparently to superintend the smuggling of goods into Spain, but the design was defeated by Wellington's success in the Peninsula. Back again in England, he contributed dramatic pieces to the 'New British Theatre,' designed mainly for the stage, but not produced One of his plays, The Appeal, was brought out at the Edinburgh theatre in 1818, and performed four nights, Sir Walter Scott having written an epilogue and some other friend (perhaps Wilson or Lockbart) a prologue Among Galt's innumerable compositions may be mentioned a Life of Benjamin West, Historical Pictures, The Wandering Jew, and The Earthquake, a novel in three volumes For Blackwood's Magazine in 1820 he wrote The Ayrshire Lega tees, a series of letters containing an entertuining and typical Scottish narrative, which was his first marked success The Annals of the Parish (1821), which instantly became popular, had been written twelve years earlier, before the appearance of Waverley and Guy Mannering, but was rejected by the publishers of those same works, with the assurance that a novel or work of fiction entirely Scottish would not take with the public. Mac kenzie and Scott both praised The Annals, and it was thence that Bentham adopted the word utilitarian, of Galt's coining Galt had now found where his strength lay, and Sir Andrew Wylie, The Entail, The Steam boat, and The Provost were successively published—the first two with decided success These were followed by Ringan Gilhaise, a story of the Scottish Covenanters, by The Spacwife, a tale of the times of James I of Scotland, and Rothelan, a historical novel on the reign of Edward Galt's fertility was enormous, but his ficulty intermittent, and he does not seem to have been able to discriminate between the good and the bad in his own work His strength unquestionably lay in depicting the humours of Scottish provincial life. The Provost and The Annals are his masterpieces, The Entail and Sir Andrew Wylie being the best of the others

We next find Galt engaged in the formation and establishment of the Canada Company, which involved him in a labyrinth of troubles After 1 brief visit to Canada in this connection, Galt wrote the little imaginative tale, The Omen (anonymously, 1825), reviewed by Scott with hearty commendation in Blackwood, and The Last of the Lairds, a novel descriptive of Scottish life He returned to America in 1826, a million of capital having been entrusted to his management. On the 23rd of April (St George's Day) 1827 Galt founded the town of Guelph, in Upper Canada, with much ceremony, taking himself the first stroke in the felling of a large maple tree, 'the silence of the woods that echoed to the sound was as the sigh of the solemn genius of the wilderness departing for ever' The city prospered, houses rising as fast as building materials could be prepared, but before the end of the year the founder was em broiled in difficulties He was accused of lowering the Company's stock, and his expenditure was complained of, and the Company sent out an accountant to act as cashier Feeling himself superseded, Galt returned to England disappointed and depressed, but resolved to battle with his fate, and he set himself down in England to build a new scheme of life. In six months he had six volumes ready His first work was another novel in three volumes, Lawrie Todd, in which he utilised his Canadian experiences Southennan illustrates the manners of Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary For a short time in the same year (1830) Galt conducted the Courter newspaper, but he gladly left the daily drudgery to complete a Life of Byion The brevity of this memoir (one small volume), Galt's name, and the interesting subject soon sold three or four editions, but it was indifferently executed, and was sharply assailed He produced next a series of Lives of the Players, an amusing compilation, and Bosh Corbet, another novel, the object of which was, he said, to give a view of society generally, and of the genteel persons sometimes found among emigrants - Ill health supped the robust frame of the novelist, but he wrote on, and in 1832-33 four other works of fiction issued from his pen-Stanley Burton, The Member, The Radical, and Eben Erskine, besides two volumes of Stories of the Study and a volume of Poems In 1832 a paralytic ailment prostrated him, but next year he was again at the press with a tale, The Lost Child He also composed a Memoir of his own life in two volumes—a curious but ill-digested melange. In 1834 he published Literary Life and Miscellanics, in three volumes, dedicated to King William IV, who sent him £200. He returned to Scotland a wreck, but continued to write for the periodicals and edited other people's books. After much suffering he died at Greenock on the 11th of April 1839.

Of the long list of Galt's works, the greater part are already forgotten Several of his novels, however, have taken a permanent place in literature In virtue of The Annals of the Parish Galt has been ranked as the father of 'the I ulyard school'-though in some degree he was inticipated by Mrs Hamilton with her Cottagers of Glenburme The Annals is the simple record of a country minister during the fifty years of his incumbency, and gives, with many amising and touching incidents, a picture of the rise and progress of a Scottish rural village, and its transition to a manufacturing town, as witnessed by a pious, simple minded man, imbued with old fashioned national feelings and prejudices This Presbyterian Pirson Adams, the Rev Micah Bilwhidder, in spite of his improbable name, is a fine representative of the Scottish pastor, diligent, biameless, lovil, and exemplify in his life, but without the hery zeal and 'kirk filling eloquence' of the supporters of the Covenant. He is easy, garrulous, fond of a quiet joke, and perfectly ignorant of the world, and chronicles among memorable events the arrival of a dancing master, the planting of a pear tree, the getting a new bell for the kirk, and the first appearance of Punch's Opera in the country side -incidents he mixes up indiscriminately with the breaking out of the American war, the establish ment of manufactures, and the spread of French revolutionary principles. An altogether admirable piece of narrative gives the story of a widow's son from his first setting off to sea till his death as a midshipman in an engagement with the French The book is admirable for its truth to nature, its quiet humour and pathos, its faithfulness as a record of Scottish feeling and manners, and its rich felicity of homely Scottish phrase and expression

The Ayrshire Legaties, a story of the same cast as The Annals, describes (chiefly by means of correspondence on the plan of Humphrey Clinker) the adventures of another country minister and his family on a journey to London to obtain a rich legacy left him by a cousin in India. The Provost illustrates the jealousies, contentions, local improvements, and 'jobbery' of a small Scottish burgh in the olden time Sir Andrew Wylu and The Enfail are more ambitious performances, thrice the length of the others The 'pawkie' Ayrshire laird is humorous, hardly natural, and often merely vulgar, but the character of Leddy Grippy in The Entail was a prodigious favourite with Byron Both Scott and Byron were said to have read this novel three times In Lawrie Todd, or the Settlers, there is no little vraisemblance, knowledge of human nature, and fertility of invention. The history of a real person named Grant Thorburn supplied the author with part of his incidents, as the story of Alexander Selkirl did Defoe, but Galt's own experience is stamped on almost every page. In his carlier stories Galt drew from his recollections of the Scotland of his youth, the mingled worth, simplicity, shre vdness, and enthusiasm he had seen or heard of about Irvine or Greenock in Larvine Lodd his observa tions in the New World present a different plase of Scottish character as displayed in the history of a nailmaker who emigrates with his brother to America, and from small beginnings becomes i prosperous settler, speculator, and landholder

Galt's poems are of no importance—unless, in deed, he prove to be the author of a famous 'Canadam Boat Song' imbued with the 'Celuc spirit' which was printed in the 'Noctes Ambro sian e' in Blackwood for 1829 as 'received from a friend in Canada'. As the Messrs Blackwood have recently (1902) suggested, Galt was at that time writing to them from Canada. But this particular poem (long absurdly attributed to Hugh, twelfth Earl of Eglinton, 1739–1819) is so unlike Galt's other verse that direct evidence would be required to prove it his. The poem has often been quoted, almost always inaccurately, and was rewritten (not for the better) by Sir John Skelton in Blackwood in 1889. The original second verse run

From the lone shedding on the misty island Mountains divide us and the waste of seas Yet still the blood is strong, the heart is Highland, And we in dreams behold the Hebrides

The Settlement of an Unpopular Minister

It was a great affair, for I was put in by the patron, and the people knew nothing whatsoever of me, and their hearts were stirred into strife on the occasion, and they did all that lay within the compass of their power to keep me out, insomuch that there was obliged to be a guard of soldiers to protect the presbytery, and it was a thing that made my heart grieve when I heard the dram beating, and the fife playing as we were going to the kirk. The people were really mad and vicious and flung dirt upon us as we passed, and revited us all, and held out the finger of scorn at me, but I endured it with a resigned spirit, compassionating their wilfulness and blindness. Poor old Mr Kilfuddy of the Brachill got such a clash of glaur [mire] on the side of his face that his eye was almost extinguished

When we got to the kirk door it was found to be nailed up, so as by no possibility to be opened. The sergeant of the soldiers wanted to break it, but I was afruid that the heritors would grudge and complain of the expanse of a new door, and I supplicated him to let it be as it was, we were therefore obligated to go in by a window, and the crowd followed us in the most unreverent manner, inaking the Lord's house like an inn on a fair day with their grievous velly hooing During the time of the psalm and the seriion they be haved themselves better, but when the induction came on their clamour was dreadful, and Thomas Thork.

the weaver, a pious zealot in that time, got up and protested, and said 'Verily, verily, I say unto yon, he that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber', And I thought I would have a hard and sore time of it with such an oustrapolous [obstreperous] people. Mr Given, that was then the ininister of Lugton, was a jocose man, and would have his joke even at a solemnity. When the laying of the hands upon me was a doing he could not get near enough to put on his, but he stretched out his staff and touched my head, and said, to the great diversion of the rest 'This will do well enough—timber to timber,' but it was an unfriendly saying of Mr Given, considering the time and the place, and the temper of my people.

After the ceremony we then got out at the window, and it was a lieavy day to me, but we went to the manse, and there we had an excellent dinner, which Mrs Watts of the new inn of Irville prepared at my request, and sent her chaise-driver to serve, for he was likewise her waiter, she having then but one chaise, and that not often called for

But although my people received me in this unruly manner, I was resolved to cultivate civility among them, and therefore the very next morning I began a round of visitations, but oh! it was a steep brae that I had to climb, and it needed a stout heart, for I found the doors in some places barred against me, in others, the bairns, when they saw me coming, run crying to their mothers 'Here's the feckless Mess John,' and then, when I went in into the houses, their parents would not ask me to sit down, but with a scornful way said 'Honest man, what's your pleasure here?' Nevertheless, I walked about from door to door, like a dejected beggar, till I got the almous deed of a civil reception, and-who would have thought it '-from no less a person than the same Thomas Thorl that was so bitter against me in the kirk on the foregoing day

Thomas was standing at the door with his green duffle apron and his red Kilmarnock night cap-I mind hun as well as if it was but yesterday—and he had seen me going from house to house, and in what manner I was rejected, and his bowels were moved, and he said to me in a kind manner 'Come in, sir, and ease yoursel', this will never do the elergy are God's corbics, and for their Master's sake it behaves us to respect them. There was no ane in the whole parish mair against you than mysel', but this early visitation is a symptom of grace that I couldna have expectit from a bird out of the nest of patronage' I thanked Thomas, and went in with him, and we had some solid conversation together, and I told him that it was not so much the pastors duty to feed the flock as to herd them well, and that, although there might be some abler with the head than me, there wisne a he within the bounds of Scotland more willing to watch the fold And Thomas said he had not by night and by day heard a mair sound observe for some time, and that if I held to that doctrine in the poopit, it wouldna be lang till I would work a change 'I was mindit,' quoth he, 'never to set my foot within the kirk door while you were there, but to testify, and no to condemn without a trial, I'll be there next Lord's Day, and egg my neighbours to be likewise, so ye'll no have to preach just to the bare walls and the laird's family '

An Execution.

The attrinment of honours and dignities is not enjoyed without a portion of trouble and care, which, like a shadow, follows all temporalities On the very evening of the same day that I was first chosen to be a bailie, a sore affair came to light, in the discovery that Jean Gaisling had murdered her bastard burn. She was the daughter of a donsie mother that could gie no name to her gets, of which she had two laddies, besides Jean The one of them had gone off with the soldiers some time before, the other, a douce well behaved callan, was in my lord's servitude, as a stable boy at the castle. Jeanie herself was the bonniest lassic in the whole town, but light headed, and fonder of outgat and blether in the causey than was discreet of one of her uncertain parentage She was, at the time when she met with her misfortune, in the service of Mrs Dalryinple, a colonel's widow, that came out of the army and settled among us on her jointure.

This Mrs Dalrymple, having been long used to the loose morals of camps and regiments, did not keep that strict hand over poor Jeanie and her other serving lass that she ought to have done, and so the poor guideless creature fell into the snare of some of the ne'er do weel gentlemen that used to play cards at night with Mrs Dalrymple. The truths of the story were never well known, nor who was the father, for the tragical issue buried all inquiry, but it came out that poor Jeanie was left to herself, and, being instigated by the Linemy after she had been delivered, did, while the midwife's back was turned, strangle the baby with a napkin. She was discovered in the very fact, with the bairn black in the face in the bed beside her.

The hemousness of the crime can by no possibility be lessened, but the beauty of the mother, her tender years, and her light headedness had won many favourers, and there was a great leaning in the hearts of all the town to compassionate her, especially when they thought of the ill example that had been set to her in the walk and conversation of her mother. It was not, however, within the power of the magistrates to overlook the accusation, so we were obligated to cause a precognition to be taken, and the search left no doubt of the wilful ness of the murder. Jeanie was in consequence removed to the tolbooth, where she lay till the lords were coming to Ayr, when she was sent thither to stand her trial before them, but from the hour she did the deed she never spoke.

Her trial was a short procedure, and she was east to be hanged-and not only to be hanged, but ordered to be executed in our town, and her body given to the doctors The execution of Jeanie was what to make an atomy all expected would happen, but when the news reached the town of the other parts of the sentence, the wail was as the sough of a pestilence, and fun would the council have got it dispensed with. But the Lord Advocate was just wad at the crime, both because there had been no previous concealment, so as to have been an extenuation for the shame of the birth, and because Jeanie would neither divulge the name of the father nor make answer to all the interrogatories that were put to her-standing at the bar like a dumbie, and looking round her, and at the judges, like a demented creature, and beautiful as a Flanders baby It was thought by many that her advocate might have made great use of her visible consternation, and pled that she was by herself, for in truth she had every appearance of being so. He was, however, a dure man, no doubt well enough versed in the particulars and punctualities of the law for an ordi nary plea, but no of the right sort of knowledge and talent to take up the case of a forlorn lassie, misled by ill example and a winsome nature, and clothed in the allurement of loveliness, as the judge himself said to the On the night before the day of execution she was brought over in a chaise from Ayr between two town officers, and placed again in our haids, and still she never spoke. Nothing could exceed the compassion that every one had for poor Jeanie, so she wasna committed to a common cell, but laid in the council room, where the ladies of the town made up a comfortable bed for her, and some of them sat up all night and prayed for her, but her thoughts were gone, and she sat silent

In the morning, by break of day, her wanton mother, that had been trolloping in Glasgow, came to the tol booth door, and made a dreadful wally waeing, and the ladies were obligated, for the sake of peace, to bid her be let in But Jeanie noticed her not, still sitting with her eyes cast down, writing the coming on of the The wicked mother first tried to hour of her doom rouse her by weeping and distraction, and then she took to upbraiding, but Icanic seemed to heed her not, save only once, and then she but looked at the misleart tinkler, and shook her head I happened to come into the room at this time, and seeing all the charitable ladies weeping around, and the randy mother talking to the poor lassie as loudly and vehiement as if she had been both deaf and sullen, I commanded the officers, with a voice of authority, to remove the mother, by which we had for a season peace, till the hour came.

There had not been an execution in the town in the memory of the oldest person then living, the last that suffered was one of the martyrs in the time of the per secution, so that we were not skilled in the business, and had besides no hangman, but were necessitated to borrow the Ayr one. Indeed, I being the youngest balle, was in terror that the obligation might have fallen on me

A scaffold was erected at the Iron, just under the tolbooth windows, by Thomas Gimblet, the master of work, who had a good penny of profit by the job, for he contracted with the town conneil, and had the boards after the business was done to the bargain, but Thomas was then deacon of the wrights, and himself a member of our body

At the hour appointed, Jennie, dressed in white, was led out by the town officers, and in the midst of the magistrates from among the ladies, with her hands tied behind her with a black riband. At the first sight of her at the tolbooth stairhead a universal sob rose from all the multitude, and the sternest e'e couldna refrain from shedding a tear. We marched slowly down the stair, and on to the foot of the scaffold, where her younger brother, Willy, that was stable boy at my lord's, was standing by himself, in an open ring made round him in the crowd, every one compassionating the dejected laddie, for he was a fine youth, and of an orderly spirit.

As his sister came towards the foot of the hidder he ran towards her, and embraced her with a wail of sorrow that melted every heart, and made us all stop in the imiddle of our solemnity. Jeanie looked at him (for her hands were tied), and a silent tear was seen to drop from her cheek. But in the course of little more than a minute all was quiet, and ve proceeded to ascend the scaffold. Willy, who had by this time dried his eyes, went up with us, and when Mr Pittle had said the prayer and sung the psalm, in which the whole multitude joined, as it were with the contrition of sorrow, the hangman stepped forward to put on the fatal cap, but Willy took it out of his hand, and placed it on his sister himself, and then kneeling down, with his back towards her, closing his eyes and shutting his ears with his hands, he saw not nor heard when she was hunched into eternity

When the awful act was over, and the stir was for the magistrates to return and the body to be cut down, poor Willy rose, and, without looking round, went down the steps of the scaffold, the multitude made a lane for him to pass, and he went on through them hiding his face, and gaed straight out of the town. As for the mother, we were obligated, in the course of the same year, to drum her out of the town for stealing thirteen choppin bottles from William Gallon's, the vintners, and selling them for whishy to Maggy Picken, that was tried at the same time for the reset.

See Galt's Autobiography (1833), Carlyle's Reminiscences (1821) the Memoir of Galt prefixed to D S Meldrum's edition of his works (8 vols. 1895-99) with introductions by S R Crockett Sir G Douglas, The Black-wood Group (1897), Mrs Oliphant, The House of Blackwood (1897)

Susan Edmondstone Ferrier (1782-1854) is known as the authoress of Marriage (1818), The Inheritance (1824), and Destiny, or the Chief's Daughter (1831) She was the voungest of the ten children of an Edinburgh Writer to the Signet, who was factor or agent for the Duke of Argyll's estates at Inveraray and Rosneath Ferrier, who spent most of her life in her native city, often stayed at Inveraray Castle, and it was in conjunction with Miss Clavering, a mece of the duke's, that before 1810 she under The 'History of Mrs took her first novel Douglas' (Chap XIII) was Miss Clavering's sole contribution, but she read the MS, and wrote letters of counsel and encouragement, from which it appears that many of the characters were drawn from the Inversity circle. Mairiage, like its successors, was published anonymously, and Miss Ferrier got for them £150, £1000, and £1700. Scott was a friend of her father's, and she visited Ashestiel in 1811, Abbotsford in 1829 and 1831. At the conclusion of the Tales of My Landlord the great novelist alludes to his 'sister shadow,' the author of 'the very lively work entitled Marriage,' as one of the labourers capable of gathering in the large harvest of Scottish character and fiction his diary he mentioned Miss Ferrier as gisted personage, having, besides her great talents, conversation the least erigeante of any author, female at least, whom he had ever seen among the long list he had encountered with, simple, full of humour, and exceedingly ready of repartee, and all this without the least affectation of the blue stocking' This is high praise, but the readers of Miss Ferrier's novels will at once recognise it as characteristic. She was a Scottish Miss Edgeworth-of a lively, practical, penetrating cast of mind, skilful in depicting character and seizing upon national peculiarities, caustic in her wit and humour, with a quick sense of the ludicrous, with a conscious design to cherish sound morality and the courtesies and charities of life. Sometimes there is a vein of edifying religious feeling, not unlike Hannah More's, but for the most part she is concerned with the foibles and oddities of mankind about her, and few have drawn them with greater breadth of comic humour or effect. Her scenes often recall our best old comedies, and she may boast, like Foote, of adding many new and original creations to our comic literature. There is a touch of caricature in some of the many portraits of Scottish ladies, even if we grant Miss Ferrier's proviso that their Scotland was not ours, when the education even in families of rank left much to be desired, and there was indisputably a raciness as of the soil in manners and ideas we should now seek in vain It is not only in satirising the foibles of her own sex that Miss Ferrier shows her humour Dr Redgill, a medical hanger-on and diner out, looks upon bad dinners as the source of much of the misery of married life, and compares a woman's reputation to a beefsteak-'if once breathed upon, 'tis good for nothing' Many sly satirical touches occur throughout the work, thus we are told that country visits should seldom exceed three days—the rest day, the dressed day, and the pressed day The three runts contrived to soothe their sorrow for the death of their brother, the old laird 'They sighed and mourned for a time, but soon found occupation congenial to their nature in the little department of life dressing crape, reviving black silk, converting narrow hems into broad hems, and, in short, who so busy, so important, as the ladies of Glenfern?'

Aware, doubtless, of the defective plan or story of her first novel, Miss Ferrier bestowed much more pains on the construction of The Inheritance, whose heroine, born in France, is heiress to a splendid estate in Scotland and peerage, to which, after various adventures and reverses, she finally succeeds The tale is well developed, but its chief attraction consists in the delineation of characters like Uncle Adam and Miss Pratt-the former a touchy, sensitive, rich East Indian, and the latter another of Miss Ferrier's inimitable Destiny, though set amidst Highland old maids scenery and Highland manners, is far from romantic, in spite of a sweet and gentle heroine and scenes of feeling and passion The chief, Glenroy, proud and irascible, is spoiled by the fawning of his inferiors, and in his family circle is generous without kindness and profuse without The Highland minister is an admirable creation, though by no means a prepossessing specimen of the country pastor

In the following extract from Marriage, Mrs Violet Macshake, tall and hard-favoured, and dressed in the most antiquated style, is visited in her lofty lodging in the Old Town of Edinburgh by her grand-nephew, Mr Douglas, and his niece Mary

A Scotch Lady of the Old School

As soon as she recognised Mr Douglas, she welcomed him with much cordiality, shook him long and heartily by the hand, patted him on the back, looked into his face with much seeming satisfaction, and, in short, gave all the demonstrations of gladness usual with gentlewomen of a certain age. Her pleasure, however, appeared to be rather an impromptu than a habitual feeling, for, as the surprise were off, her visage resumed its harsh and sarcastic expression, and she seemed eager to efface any agreeable impression her reception might have excited

'And who thought o' seein' ye enoo?' said she, in a quick gabbling voice 'What's brought you to the toon? Are you come to spend your honest faither's siller ere he's weel cauld in his grave, puir man?'

Mr Douglas explained that it was upon account of his niece's health

'Health' repeated she, with a sardonic smile, 'it wad mak an ool laugh to hear the work that's made aboot young fowk's health noon-days. I wonder what ve're a' made o',' grasping Mari's arm in her great bony hand—'a wheen puir feekless windlestries—ye maun awa' to England for your healths. Set ye up! I wonder what cam o' the lassies i' my time that bute [behoved] to bide at hame? And whilk o' ye, I sud like to ken, 'll e'er leive to see ninety sax, like me? Health! he, he!'

Mary, glad of a pretence to indulge the mirth the old lady's manner and appearance had excited, joined most heartily in the laugh

'Tak aff yer bannet, bairn, an' let me see your face, wha can tell what like ye are wi' that snule o' a thing on your head?' Then, after taking an accurate survey of her face, she pushed aside her pelisse 'Weel, it's ac mercy I see ye had neither the red head nor the muckle cuits [ankles] o' the Douglases I kenna whither your faither had them or no I ne'er set een on him neither him nor his braw leddy thought it worth their while to speer after me, but I was at me loss, by a' accounts'

'You have not asked after any of your Glenfern friends,' said Mr Douglas, hoping to touch a more sympathetic cord

'Time eneugh—wall we let me draw my breath, man?—fowk canna say awthing at ance. An'ye bute to hae an Inglish wife tu, a Scotch lass wadna ser'ye. An'yer wean, I'se warran' it's ance o' the warld's wonders—it's been unco lang o' comin'—he, he''

'He has begun life under very melancholy auspices, poor fellow!' said Mr Douglas, in allusion to his father's death

'An' wha's faut was that? I ne'er heard tell o' the like o' 11, to have the barn kirsened an' its grandfuther deem! But fowk are nather born, nor kirsened, nor do they wad or dee as they used to du—awthing's changed?

'You must, indeed, live witnessed muny changes '' observed Mr Douglas, rather at a loss how to utter anything of a conciliatory nature.

'Changes '-weel a vat I sometime wonder if it's the same world an if it's my ain heed that's upon my shoo bers'

*Lut with these changes you must also have seen many improvements?' send Mary in a tone of diffidence

'Improvements' turning shirply round upon her, 'what ken ye about improvements, bairn? A bonny improvement, or ens no to see tyleyors and selaters letvin what I min! jewks and yerls. An' that great gloverin New Toon there,' pointing out of her windows, 'vhat I used to sit an' luck oot at bonny green parks, an' see the coos milket, an' the bits o bairnies rowin' an tuinlin', an' the lasses trampin i' their tubs—what see I noo but stane an' lime, an stoor an' dirt, an' idle chieels an' dinkit oot madams prancin'. Improvements, indeed''

Mary found she was not likely to advance her uncle's fortune by the judiciousness of her remarks, therefore prudently resolved to hazard no more. Mr Douglas, who was more au fair to the prejudices of old age, and who was always amused with her bitter remarks, when they did not touch himself, encouraged her to continue the conversation by some observation on the prevailing manners.

'Manors' repeated she, with a contemptuous laugh, 'what ca' ye mainers noo? for I dinna ken. Ilk ane gangs bang intill their neclor's hoose, an' bang oot o't, as it war a clivinge hoose, an' as for the maister o't, he's no o' sae muckle vailu as the flunkey alint his chyre. I' my grandfaither's time, as I had heard him tell, ilka maister o' a family had his ain sate in his ain hoose, ay an' sat we his had his ain sate in his ain hoose, ay an' sat we his had his ain dish, an' was ay helpit first, an' keepit up his owthority as a man sude du. Paurents war paurents than—barns dardina set up their gabs afore them than as they du noo. They ne'er pre nined to say their heeds war their ain i' that days—wife an' servants, rete ners au' childer, a' truminelt i' the presence o their heed!

Here a long pinch of snuff caused a pause in the old lady's harringue. Mr Douglas availed himself of the opportunity to rise and take leave

'Oo, what's takin ye awa', Arelie, In sie a hurry? Sit doon the re,' laying her hand upon his arin, 'an' rest ye, an tak' a glass o wine an' a bit breed, or masbe,' turning to Mary, 'we wall rather had a drip broth to warm we? What guts ye look sae blac, hairn? I'm sure it's no cauld, but ye're just like the lave, we gang a skiltin' about the streets half naked, an' than ye maun sa an' bir le yoursels afore the fire at hame.'

She had no shuffed along to the further end of the room, and opening a press, took out wine and a plateful of various shaped articles of bread, which she handed to Mary

'Hee, harm—tak a cookie—tal it up—what are you fraged for? It'll an late ve Here's t'ye, Glenfern, an your who an' your wean, puir tead, it's had a very chance on yet, yeel a wat'

The wine being drunt and the cookies discussed, Mr Douglas made ano her attempt to withdraw, but in your

'Canna ye sit a ill a wee man, an let me speer after my au'd freens at Glanfern? Hoo's Grizzy, an' Jaely, an' Niel y?—ave wo kin awa at the peels au' he drogs [p lis and drogs]—lie, ha! I ne er swallowed a peel nor g ed a d'ai for drogs a' my davs, an' see an ony o' them Il run a race wi' me whan they're near five-core!

Mr Douglas here paid some compliments upon her appearance, which were pretty graciously received, and added that he was the bearer of a letter from his aunt Grizzy, which he would send along with a roebuck and brace of moor game

'Gin your roebuck's nae better than your last, atweel it's no worth the sendin' poor dry fissinless dirt, no worth the chowin', weel a wat I begrudged my teeth on't. Your muirfowl war nae that ill, but they're no worth the carryin', they're doug cheap i' the market enoo, so it's nae great compliment. Gin ye had brought me a leg o guid mutton, or a cauler sawmont, there would have been some sense in't, but ye're ane o' the fowk that'll ne'er harry yoursel' wi' your presents, it's but the pickle powther they cost ye, an' I'se warran' ye're thinkin' mair o' your ain diversion than o' my stamick whan ye're at the shootin' o' them, puir beasts'

Mr Douglas had borne the various indignities levelled against himself and his family with a philosophy that had no parallel in his life before, but to this attack upon his game he was not proof. His colour rose, his eyes flashed fire, and something resembling an oath burst from his lips as he strode indignantly towards the door.

His friend, however, was too nimble for him. She stepped before him, and, breaking into a discordant laugh as she patted him on the back 'So I see ye're just the nuld man, Archie—tye ready to tak the strums an' ye dinna get a'thing your ain wye. Mony a time I had to fleech ye oot o' the dorts when ye was a callent. Do ye mind hoo ye was affronted because I set ve doon to a cauld pigeon pie an' a tanker o' tippenny are night to your fowerhoors afore some leddies—he, he, he I Weel a wat yere wife main hae her ain adoos to manage ye, for ye're a cumstairy chiefd, Archie'

Mr Douglas still looked as if he was irresolute whether to laugh or be angry

'Come, come, sit ye doon there till I speak to this bairn,' said she, as she pulled Mary into an adjoining bedchamber, which were the same aspect of ehily neatness as the one they had quitted. Then pulling a lurge bunch of keys from her pocket, she opened a drawer, out of which she took a pair of diamond ear rings 'Hae, bairn,' said she as she stuffed them into Mury's liand, 'they belanged to your faithers grandmother She was a gude woman, an' had four an' twenty sons an' dochters, an' I wass ye nae waur fortin than just to hae as mony But mind ye,' with a shake of her bony finger, 'they maun a' be Scots Gin I thought ye wad mairry ony pock puddin', fient haet wad ye hae gotten frae me Noo had your tongue, an' dinna deive me wi' thanks,' almost pushing her into the parlour again, 'an' sin ye're gawn awa' the morn, I'll see nae mair o' ye enoo-so fare ye weel But, Archie, ye maun come nn' tak your breakfast wi' me I hae muckle to say to you, but we maunn he sae hard upon my haps as we used to be,' with a facetious grin to her mollified favourite as they shook hands and

'Well, how do you like Mrs Macshake, Mary?' asked her uncle as they walked home

'That is a cruel question, uncle,' answered she, with a crule. 'My gratitude and my taste are at such variance,' displaying her splendid gift, 'that I know not how to reconcile them'

'That is always the case with those that Mrs Mae shake has obliged,' returned Mr Douglas 'she does many liberal things, but in so ungreeous a manner that people 'are never sure whether they are obliged or insulted by her. But the way in which she receives kindness is still worse. Could anything equal her impertinence about my roebisek?—Faith, I've a good mind never to enter her door again!'

Mnry could scarcely preserve her gravity at her uncle's indignation, which seemed so disproportioned to the cause. But, to turn the current of his ideas, she remarked that he had certainly been at pains to select two admirable specimens of her countrywomen for her

'I don't think I shall soon forget either Mrs Gawsfaw or Mrs Macshake,' said she, laughing

'I hope you won't earry away the impression that these two lusus naturae are specimens of Scotchwomen?' said her uncle. 'The former, indeed, is rather a sort of weed that infests every soil, the latter, to be sure, is an indigenous plant. I question if she would have arrived at such perfection in a more cultivated field or genial clime. She was born at a time when Scotland was very different from what it is now. Female education was little attended to, even in families of the highest rink, consequently the ladies of those days possess a raciness in their manners and ideas that we should vainly seek for in this age of cultivation and refine ment.'

A Memoir is prefixed to the 1831 edition of Mi s Ferrier's novels, and a I ife with Correspondence, was edited by her grand nephew in 1899. There was an American illustrated edition of the novels in 1893-04 which was reprinted in London, and another edition is by R. Brinley Johnson (6 vols. 1894).

Allan Cunningham (1784-1842), born it Blackwood, near Thornhill in Dumfriesshire, was the son of the gardener on the estate of Blackwood, who in 1787 became factor or land steward to Miller of Dalswinton, Burns's landlord at Ellis land, and in his father's cottage Allan in his sixth year heard Burns read I am o' Shanter An elder brother was a country mason and builder, and Allan was apprenticed to him in 1795, but in 1810, at the invitation of Cromek, on whom lie had palmed off some of his own songs for old ones, he removed to London Robert Hartley Cronick (1770-1812) was a speculative English engraver and picture publisher, who visited Scotland in 1808 and 1809 to collect the materials he published in his Reliques of Burns and Select Scottish Songs, Incunt and Vodern Cunningham furnished almost the whole of what Cromek issued, without any proper account of their pro charce, as Remains of Vithsdale and Galloway Song The Interiry mason got the present of a book from Cromek and a promise of something further on, but had now to support himself and his wife munly by writing. He produced both prose and verse, he reported for the newspapers, and in 1814, through Croinek's introduction he became superintendent of works to Chantres the sculptor, in whose studio he continued till the year before lns own death Some of his lyrics in Cromck's collection are warlike and Jacobite, some amatory some tre devotional, and some are on Covenanting themes, but all of them illustrate Scottish country life and manners. As songs, they are not pitched in a key to be popular, but these pseudo antique strains have a curious natural grace and tender ness, a certain Doric simplicity and fervour Chantrey's studio 'honest Allan' spent his days, serving also as secretary, while in the evenings he produced a large mass of literary work he published Sir Marmaduke Maxw II, a dramatic poem, founded on Border story and superstition, and also two volumes of Traditional Tales Three notels on like themes followed, even more diffuse and improbable—Paul Jones (1826), Sir Miel ael Scott (1828), and Lord Roldan (1836) In 1833 appeared a 'rustic epic' in twelve parts, The Maid He edited a collection of Scottish Songs in four volumes, and an edition of Burns in eight, with a Life (1834) To Murray's Family Library he contributed Livis of Eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects (6 vols 1829-33, new ed 1879), which proved on the whole the most important of his books. His last work-completed just two days before his death-was a Life of Sir David II ilkie, in three volumes 'A wet sheet and a flowing sea,' from the Traditional Tales, an admirable sea song by an utter landsman, is not merely a remarkable tour de force, but is perhaps Allan's highest triumph in verse. His prose style was universally admired for its force and freedom Souther said he was the best stylist next to Hume born north of the Tweed There is a Life of him by David Hogg (1875)

The Young Maxwell.

'Where gang ye, thou silly auld carle?
And what do ye carry there?'
'I m gain to the hill, thou sodger man,
To shift my sheep their lair'

As stride or two took the silly suld earls.

An a gude lang stride took he,

I trow thou be a feek suld earle,

Will ye show the way to me?

And he has gane wi' the silly aukl carle,
Adown by the greenwood side,
'Light down and gang thou sodger man,
For here ye canna ride'

He drew the runs o' his bonny gray steed, An lightly down he spring Of the comehest scarlet was his weir coat, Whate the gowden tassely hang

He has thrown aff his plaid, the silly aul I carle,
An' his bonnet frac boon his lince

An who was it but the young Maxwell '
An' his gude brown sword drew he'

'Thou killed my father, thou vile Southron!
An' we killed my brethren three!
Whilk brake the heart o' my ac sister,
I loved no the hight o my ec!

"Draw out yer sy ond thou vile Southman!

Red wit will blide of my kin

That sword it crapped the bonnies! flower

L'er lifted its head to the sun!"

'There's ac sau stroke for my dear auld father!
There's to a for my brethren three!
An' there is and to thy heart for my ac sister,
Wham I loved as the light o my ee.'

Hame, Hame Hame

Hame, hame, hame, home fain wad I be,
Oh, hame hame, home, to my ain countrie 1
When the flower is 1 the bird, and the leaf is on the tree,
The lark shall sing me hame in my ain countrie Hame, hame, hame, hame fain wad I be,
Oh, hame hame, hame, to my ain countrie!

The green leaf o' lovalty's beginning for to fa',
The boing white rose it is withering an a',
But I II water't wi' the blude of usurping tyrannie,
An' green it will grow in my ain countrie.
Heme, hame, hame, hame fun wad I be,
Oh, hame liaine, hame, to my ain countrie!

Oh, there's maught fraction my country can save, But he less of kind heaven to open the grave, I hat a' the noble martyrs who died for localtie, May rise again and fight for their ain countrie Hame, hame, hame, hame fain wad I be, Oh, hame, hame, hame, to my ain countrie!

The prost are now gane, a' who ventured to save,
The new grass is springing on the top o their grave,
But the sun through the mirk blinks blithe in my ee,
'I'll shine on ye yet in ver ain countrie'
Home, liame, home, hame fain wild I be,
Home, home, liame, to my ain countrie'

Fragment

Gane vere but the winter cauld, And gane were but the snaw, I could sleep in the wild woods, Where primroses blaw

Could's the snow at my head,
And cauld at my fect,
And the finger o' death's at my een,
Clo ing them to sleep

Let nanc tell my father,
Or my mither sae dear,
I ll meet them buth in heaven
At the spring o the year

A We. Sheet and a Flowing Sea

A wet sheet and a flowing sea,
A wind that follows fast,
And fills the white and rustling saif,
And hends the gallant mast,
And ben'ls the gallant mast, my boy,
While life the eagle free,
Away the good ship the land leaves
Old I agland on the lee

'Of it a soft and gentle wind t'
I heard a fair one cry
Pet give to me the snoring breeze,
And white vaves heaving high, my boys,
The good ship tight and free—
The corld of vaters is our home,
Ar I merry men are we

There's tempest in yon horned moon,
And lightning in von cloud,
And hark the music, mariners—
The wind is piping loud,
The wind is piping loud, my boys,
The lightning flashing free—
While the hollow onk our palace is,
Our heritage the sea.

My Nanie O

Red rows the Nith 'tween bank and brae,
Mirk is the night and raime O,
Though heaven and earth should mix in storm,
I'll gang and see my Name O,
My Name O, my Name O,
My kind and winsome Name O,
She holds my heart in love's dear bands,

In preaching time sac meek she stands. Sac saintly and sac bonny O, I cannot get ac glimpse of grace, For thieving looks at Nanic O, My Nanie O, my Nanie O, The world's in love with Nanie O, That heart is hardly worth the wear That wadna love my Nanie O

And nane can do't but Name O

My breast can scarce contain my heart,
When denoing she moves finely O,
I guess what heaven is by her eyes,
They sparkle sae divinely O,
My Name O, my Name O,
The flower o' Nithsdale's Name O,
Love looks frae 'neath her lang brown hair,
And says, 'I dwell with Name O'

Tell not, thou star at gray daylight,
O'er Tinwald top so bonny O,
My footsteps 'mang the morning dew,
When coming frae iny Nanie O,
My Nanie O, my Nanie O,
Nanie ken o' uie and Nanie O,
The stars and moon may tell't aboon,
They winna wrang my Nanie O!

The first four lines of the third stanza are from Allan Ramsays

The Poet's Bridal-day Song

Oh, my love's like the steadfast sun,
Or streams that deepen as they run,
Nor hoary hairs, nor forty years,
Nor moments between sighs and tears—
Nor nights of thought nor days of pain,
Nor dreams of glory dreamed in vain—
Nor mirth, nor sweetest song which flows
To sober joys and soften woes,
Can make niv heart or fancy flee
One moment my sweet wife, from thee.
Liven while I muse, I see thee sit
In maden bloom and matron wit—
Fair, gentle as when first I sued,

Ye seem, but of sedater mood,
Yet my heart leaps as fond for thee
As when, beneath Arbigland tree,
We stayed and wooed, and thought the moon
Set on the sea an hour too soon,
Or hingered, and the falling dew
When looks were fond and words were few active

Though I see smiling at thy feet
Five sons and ae fair drughter sweet;
And time, and care, and birth time woes
Have dimmed thine eye and touched thy rose,
To thee, and thoughts of thee, belong
All that charms me of tale or song
When words come down like dews unsought,
With gleams of deep enthusiast thought,
And Fancy in her heaven flies free—
They come, my love, they come from thee.

Oh, when more thought we gave of old
To silver than some give to gold,
'Twas sweet to sit and ponder o'cr
What things should deck our humble bower!
'Twas sweet to pull in hope with thee
The golden fruit of Tortune's tree,
And sweeter still to choose and twine
A garland for these locks of thine—
A song wreath which may grace my Jean,
While rivers flow and woods are green

At times there come, as come there ought, Grave moments of sedater thought—
When Fortune frowns, nor lends our night
One gleam of her inconstant light,
And Hope, that decks the peasant's bower,
Shines like the rainbow through the shower—
Oh then I see, while scated nigh
A mother's heart shine in thine eye,
And proud resolve and purpose meek,
Speak of thee more than words can speak
I think the wedded wife of mine
The best of all that's not divine

Allan Cunningliam's sons were an exceptional instance of hereditary talent in one family (1) Joseph Davin Cun't igham (1812-1851), caplain of Engineers in the Indian army, wrote a fistory of the Sikhs (1849 and ed 1853) (2) Major General Sir Alexander Cunvinglial (1814-93), appointed Archivological Surveyor General of India in 1870, Companion of the Star of India in 1871, wrote The Bhilsa Tifes or Enddaist Monuments of Central India (1854), Arian Architecture (1846) Ladik, Physical Statistical (1854), Arian Architecture (1846) Ladik, Physical Statistical Rec., (3) Peter Cunitical (1816-69) clerk in the Audit Office 1834-60, wrote a Life of Nell Guynn (1852) Handlook of Iondia (1849), besides editing is alfole's Letters, Drummond of Hatchern den, Goldsmith, Johnson's Lives of the Poets, &c. (4) Francis Cunit (1814) (1820-75) heutenant-colonel in the Indian army, edited Marlowe, Massinger and Ben Jonson.

Thomas Mounsey Canningham (1776–1834) was the senior of his brother Allan (see the preceding article), and was a copious author in prose and verse, though with an undistinguished name, long before the author of the Laries of British Painters was known. He attended Dum fries Academy, became a wheelwright near Cambridge, and was ultimately chief clerk to Rennie, the civil engineer. His first poem was The Har'st Kirn (1797), he wrote also satires such as The Cambridgeshire Garland and The Unco Grave

David Vedder, a native of Burness, Orkney (1792-1854), obtained some reputation by a volume of Orcadian Sketches, published in 1842, and his Scottish songs and Norse ballads were popular in the north Dr Chalmers was fond of quoting to his students a piece on 'The Teinple of Nature.'

Sir Thomas Dick Lauder (1784–1848) wrote two novels of Scottish life and history, Lochandhu (1825, new ed 1891) and The Wolfe of Badenoch (1827), of which the latter, with the turbulent son of Robert II for its hero, is still popular, and often reprinted. In 1830 he wrote a unid Account of the Great Floods in Morayshire in 1829 The son of a Haddingtonshire baronet, he had in 1808 married the heiress of Relugas in Moray, and was then living in the In the story of the flood he neighbourhood showed, according to Dr John Brown, 'his descriptive power, his humour, his sympathy for suffering, his sense of the picturesque.' Thomas also published a series of Highland Rambles, with a sequel, Legundary Tales of the Highlands He wrote on natural history, and edited Gilpin's Foiest Scenery and Sir Uvedale Price's Essays on the Picturesque, and he was commissioned to write a memorial of Queen Victoria's visit to Scotland in 1842. One of his best works was a descriptive account of Scottish Rivers for Tait's Magazine, left incomplete at his death and edited by Dr John Brown in 1874.

William Thom, the 'Inverurie Poet' (1799-1848), wrote some sweet and pathetic verses. He worked as a handloom-weaver at Aberdeen and Inverurie, and traversed the country as a pedlar, accompanied by his wife and children. This unsettled life induced careless and dissipated liabits. His first poem that attracted notice, The Blind Boy's Pranks, appeared in the Aberdeen Herald. In 1844, he published a volume of Rhymes and Recollections of a Hand loom Weaver. He visited London, and was warmly received, but returning to Scotland, he died at Dundee in great penury

The Mitherless Bairn When a' other barries are hushed to their hame

By runty, or cousin, or freeky grand dame,

Wha stands last an' lanely, an' naebody carin'? Tis the puir doited loonie—the mitherless burn The mitherless baim gangs to his lane bed, Nane covers his cauld back, or haps his bare head, His wee hackit heelies are hard as the airn, iron An' litheless the lair o' the mitherless bairn hard bed Anenth his cauld brow siecan dreams hover there, such O' hands that wont kindly to kame his dark hair, But morning brings elutches, a' reckless and stern, That lo'e nae the locks o' the mitherless barn I on sister, that sang o'er his saftly rocked bed, Now rests in the mools where her mammy is laid, mould The father toils sair their wee bannock to earn, An' kens no the wrangs o' his mitherless bairn

Wha couthilie deal wi' the mitherless bairn Lindly Oh! speak in him harshly—he trembles the while,
He bends to your bidding, an' blesses your simile,
In their dark hour o' anguish, the heartless shall learn
That God deals the blow for the mitherless barn!

Her spirit, that passed in you hour o' his birth, Still watches his wearisome wanderings on earth,

Recording in heaven the blessings they earn

William Micholson, the 'Galloway Poet' (1782-1849), was the son of a carrier, and was born He became a near Borgue in Kirkcudbright pedlar in boshood but not before he was master of all the available chapbooks, bullads, and lore of the country side. He also composed and recited songs, published a volume of verse tales and poems in 1814 (2nd ed in 1828, 3rd ed 1878, with Memoir', and was ultimately a professional piper at fairs and weddings, and occasionally a cattledrover Unluckily tippling kept him unsettled and unprosperous, even after he became an advo cate of universal redemption Some of his songs ire tuneful and tender his Brownie of Blidnoch, in celebration of a kindly local sprite, is his most successful piece, and is known to readers of Dr John Brown's Hora Subsectiva

William Laidlaw (1780-1845) was son of the Ettrick Shepherd's master at Blackhouse, and is well known to all who have read Lockhart's Life of Scott He was Scott's companion in some of his early wanderings, his friend and land steward in advanced years, his amanuensis in the composition of some of his novels, and he was one of the few who watched over his last sad moments. After Scott's death Laidlaw became factor on an estate in Ross shire, where he died One song of his is exceptionally well known

Lucy's Flittin'

'Twas when the wan leaf frae the birk tree was fa'in,
And Martinmas dowie had wound up the year,
That Liney rowed up her wee kist wi' her a' in 't,
And left her auld maister and neebours sae dear
For Lucy had served i' the Glen a' the simmer,
She cam there afore the bloom cam on the pea,
An orphan was she, and they had been gude till her,
Sure that was the thing brocht the tear to her ee.
She gaed by the stable where Jamie was stannin',

Richt sair was his kind heart her flittin' to see,
'Fare ye weel, Lucy '' quo' Jamie, and ran in,
The gatherin tears trickled fast frie his ee.
As down the burn side she gaed slow wi' her flittin',
'Tare ye weel, Lucy '' was ilka bird's sang,

And Robin was chirpin't the brown leaves amang
Oh, what is't that pits my puir heart in a flutter?
And what gars the tears come sac fast to my ee?

She heard the eraw sayin 't, high on the tree sittin',

If I wasna ettled to be one better,
Then what gars me wish ony better to be?

I'm just like a lammie that loses its mither
Nae mither or friend the puir lammie can see,

I fear I hae tint my puir heart a' thegither,
Nae wonder the tear fa's sae fast frae my ee
'Wi' the rest o' my class I have round up the re-

'Wi' the rest o' my clues I had rowed up the ribbon,
The bonny blue ribbon that Jamie gad me, gave Yestreen, when he gad me't, and saw I was sabbin',
I'll never forget the wad blink o' his ed.
Though now he said naething but "Fare ve weel, Lucy!"

It made me I neither could speak, hear, nor see
He couldna say mur but just "Tare ye weel, Lucy!"
Let that I will mind till the day that I dee

'The lamb likes the gowan wi' dew when it's droukit,
The hare likes the brake and the braid on the lea,
But Lucy likes Jamie, '—she turned and she lookit,
She thocht the dear place she wad never mair see.

Slie thocht the dear place slie wad never mair see.

[Ali, weel may voung Jamie gang dowie and cheerless!

And weel may he greet on the bank o' the burn!

For bonny sweet Lucy, sac gentle and peerless,

Lies cauld in her grave, and will never return!

The last four lines were, somewhat superfluously, added by Hogg to 'complete the story

William Tennant (1785-1848) published in 1812 a singular mock heroic poem, Anster Fairwritten in an ottava rima almost the same as that used in 1817 by Hookham Frere, and afterwards made so popular by Byron in his Bippo and Don Juan The subject was the marriage of Maggie Lauder, a rude, rustic heroine of Scottish song, but the author exalted Maggie to higher dignity, and wrote rather for the admirers of that conventional poetry, half serious and sentimental, half ludicrous and satirical, which was cultivated by Pulci, Berni, and many other Italians Classic imagery was lavished on familiar subjects, supernatural machinery was (as in the Rape of the Lock) blended with the ordinary details of domestic life, and with lively and funciful description Exuberance of animal spirits lifted the author over perilous obstacles, and his wit and fancy were rarely at Such a sprightly volume, in a style then unliackneyed, was sure of success, Anster Fair sold rapidly, and has since been often republished The author, William Tennant, a native of Anstruther, or Anster, in Fife, was a cripple from birth, and, whilst clerk to a corn dealer, studied Eastern and Western tongues and ancient and modern literature. His attainments were rewarded in 1813 with an appointment as parish schoolmaster at Lasswade, at a salary of £40 per annum-a reward not unlike that conferred on Mr Abraham Adams in Joseph Andrews, who, being a scholar and man of virtue, was 'provided with a handsome income of £23 a year, which, however, he could not make a great figure with, because he lived in a dear country, and was a little encumbered with a wife and six children' Tennant was afterwards (1835) appointed teacher of classics in an academy at Dollar, and finally (1835) professor of Oriental languages in St Mary's College, St Andrews But the Orientalist produced still a couple of tragedies on the story of Cardinal Beaton (1823) and on John Baliol (1825), and two poems, The Thane of Fife and Papistry Stormed, or Dinging Down of the Cathedral It was said of Sir David Wilkie that he took most of the figures in his pictures from living persons in his native county of Fife, it is obvious that Tennant's poems are in like manner grounded on Fife men and things, racy of the soil, and indeed their eminently local colour has probably told against their wider popularity Anster Fair, the most diversified and richly humorous of them all, is the author's only real success, and is a distinctly animated, witty, and entertaining poem

Summer Morning

I wish I lind a cottage snug and neat
Upon the top of many fountained Ide,
That I might thence, in holy fervour, greet
The bright gowned Morning tripping up her side
And when the low Sun's glory buskined feet
Walk on the blue wave of the Agean tide,
Oh Lwould kneel me down, and worship there
I who garnished out a world so bright and fair

The saffron elbowed Morning up the slope
Of heaven canaries in her jewelled shoes,
And throws o'er Kelly law's sheep inblied top
Her golden apron dripping kindly dews,
And never, since she first began to hop
Up heaven's blue causeway, of her beams profuse, Shone there a dawn so glorious and so gay
As shines the merry dawn of Anster market day

Round through the vast circumference of sky
One speck of small cloud cannot eye behold,
Save in the cast some fleeces bright of dye,
That stripe the hem of heaven with woolly gold, Whereon are happy angels wont to he Lolling, in amaranthine flowers enrolled,
That they may spy the precious hight of God,
Flung from the blessed east o'er the fur Earth abroad

The fair Earth hughs through all her boundless range, Heaving her green hills high to greet the beam, City and village, steeple, cot, and grange, Gilt as with Nature's purest leaf gold seem, The heaths and upland muirs, and fallows, change Their barren brown into a ruddy gleam, And, on ten thousand dew bent leaves and sprays, Twinkle ten thousand suns, and fing their petty rays

Up from their nests and fields of tender corn
Full inerrily the little skylarks spring,
And on their dew bedabbled pinions borne,
Mount to the heaven's blue keystone flickering,
They turn their plume soft bosons to the morn,
And hail the genial light, and cheer'ly sing,
Echo the gladsome hills and valleys round,
As half the bells of Fife ring loud and swell the sound

For when the first upsloping ray was fling
On Anster steeple's swallow harbouring top,
Its bell and all the bells around were rung
Sonorous, jangling, loud, without a stop,
For, toilingly, each bitter headle swing,
Even till he smoked with sweat, his greasy rope,
And almost broke his bell wheel, ushering in The morn of Anster Fair with tinl le tankling din.

And, from our steeple's pinnacle ontspread,
The town's long colours flare and flap on high,
Whose anchor, blazoned fair in green and red,
Cirls, pliant to each breeze that whistles by,
Whilst on the boltsprit, stern, and topmast head
Of brig and sloop that in the harbour he,
Streams the red gaudery of flags in air,
All to salute and grace the morn of Anster Fair

On the Road to the Fair

Comes next from Ross shire and from Sutherland
The horny knuckled kilted Highlandman
From where upon the rocky Caithness strand
Breaks the long wave that at the Pole began,
And where Loch Fyne from her prolific sand
Her herrings gives to feed each bordering clan,
Arrive the brogue shod men of generous eye,
Pluded and breechless all, with Esqu's hairy thigh

They come not now to fire the Lowland stacks, Or forry on the banks of I ortha's firth, Claymore and broadsword, and Lochaber axe, Are left to rust above the smoky hearth, Their only arms are bagpipes now and saels,
Their teeth are set most desperately for inith,
And at their broad and sturdy backs are hung Great wallets, cramined with cheese and bannocks and cold tongue

Nor stayed away the Islanders, that he
To buffet of the Atlantic surge exposed.
From Jura, Arran, Barra, Uist, and Skye,
Piping they come, unshaved, unbreeched, unliosed,
And from that Isle whose abbey, structured high,
Within its precincts holds dead kings enclosed,
Where St Columba oft is seen to widdle,
Gowned round with flaming fire, upon the spire astraddle.

Next from the far famed ancient town of Ayr—
Sweet Ayr' with crops of riddy damsels blest,
That, shooting up, and waxing fat and fair,
Shine on thy braes, the lilies of the west!—
And from Dumfries, and from Kilimarnock—where

Are night caps made, the charpest and the best—Bhthely they ride on ass and mule, vith sacks. In hen of saddles placed upon their asses' backs.

Close at their heels, bestriding well trapped mg,
Or humbly riding ass's bael bone bare,
Come Glasgow's merchants, each with money bag,
To purchase Dutch lint seed at Anster Fair—
Sagreons fellows all, who well may brag

Of virtuous industry and talents rare, The accomplished men o' the counting room confessed, And fit to crack a jol c or argue with the best

Nor keep their homes the Borderers, that stay
Where purls the Jed, and Esk, and little Liddel, Men that can rarely on the hagpipe play,
And wake the unsober spirit of the fiddle,
Avowed freebooters, that have many a day
Stolen sheep and cow, yet never owned they did ill
Great rogues, for sure that wight is but a rogue
That blots the eighth command from Moses' decalogue.

And some of them in sloop of tarry side,
Come from North Berwick harbour sailing out,
Others, abhorrent of the sickening tide,
Have ta'en the road by Stirling brig about,
And eastward now from long Kirkenldy ride,
Slugging on their slow gaited assess tout,
While dangling at their backs are bagpipes hung,
And dangling hangs a tale on every rlivmer's tongue.

See the Memoir of Tennant by Conolly (1861).

Andrew Picken (1788-1833) was the son of a Paisley manufacturer, and was for a time in business in the West Indies He failed as a bookseller in Liverpool, and went to London to pursue litera ture as a profession. His first work, Tales and Skitches of the West of Scotland, give offence by its satirical portraits His novel of The Sectarian, or the Church and the Meeting-house (1829), by the representation it gave of the Dissenters as selfish, hypocritical, and sordid, irritated a great body of readers The Dominie's Legacy (1830) was warmly welcomed for its sketches of Scottish life, somewhat akin to Carleton's Irish tales—some humorous and some pathetic, Minister Tam and Mary Ogilvy almost rival the happiest efforts of Galt. Picken partly succeeded in conciliating the evangelical Dissenters by interesting Travels and Researches of Eminent English Missionaries (1830) In 1831 he issued The Club-Book, a collection of original tales by different authors, G. P. R. James, Galt. Moir, James Hogg, Allan Cunningham, and others contributed each a story, and the editor himself wrote two-'The Deer-stalkers' and the 'Three Kearneys'-the latter of which was dramatised Picken planned his Traditionary Stories of Old Families as the first part of a series which was to embrace the legendary history of England, Scot land, and Ireland He had just completed what he thought his best work, The Black Watch (on the gallant 42nd Regiment), when he succumbed to the apoplexy that carried him off. Picken was, according to one of his friends, 'the dominie of his own tales—simple, affectionate, retiring, dwelling apart from the world, and blending in all his views of it the gentle and tender feelings reflected from his own mind'-An earlier Paisley author of the same name, Phenezer Picken (1769-1816), wrote two volumes of poems, mostly in the vernacular, and published a pocket dictionary of the Scottish dialect (1818)

William Glen (1789-1826), born in Glasgow, was for a time in the West Indies, failed as a Glasgow merchant, and sank into poverty, dissipation, and ill health. His poems—'The Battle Song,' 'The Maid of Oronsey,' and the rest—are mostly forgotten, but the Jacobite lament, 'Wae's me for Prince Charlic,' remains one of the most popular of Scottish songs

'Wae's me for Prince Charlie'

A wee bird cam' to our ha' door,
He warbled sweet and clearly,
An' nye the owercome o' his sang
Was, 'Wae's me for Prince Charlie''
Oh, when I heard the bonny soun',
The tears cam' happin' rarely,
I took my bannet aff my head,
For weel I lo'ed Prince Charlie.

Quoth I 'My bird, my bonny, bonny bird, Is that a sang ye borrow?

Are these some words ye've learnt by heart, Or a lift o' dool and sorrow?'
'Oh, no, no, no '' the wee bird sang, 'I've flown since mornin' early, But sie a day o' wind and rain—

'On hills that are by right his ain,
He roves a lanely stranger,
On every side he's pressed by want—
On every side is danger
Yestreen I met him in a glen,
My heart maist bursted fairly,
For sadly changed indeed was he—
Oh, wae's me for Prince Charlie.

Oh, wae's me for Prince Charlie.

'Darl night cam' on, the tempest roared Loud o'er the hills and valleys, And where was't that your Prince by down, Whase hame should been a palace? He rowed him in a Hieland plaid, Which covered him but sparely, And slept beneath a bush o' broom— Oh, wae's me for Prince Charlie.'

But now the bird saw some red coats,
And he shook his wings wi' anger
'Oh, this is no a land for me,
I'll tarry here one langer'
He hovered on the wing a while,
Ere he departed fairly,
But weel I mind the fareweel strain
Was, 'Wae's me for Prince Charlie'

William Wotherwell (1797-1835) was born in Glasgow, went to school in Edinburgh, and after his eleventh year was brought up under the care of an uncle in Paisley Having studied one session at Glasgow University, he was, at the age of twenty one, appointed depute to the sheriff clerk at Paisley, but he early showed a love of poetry, and in 1819 became editor of a miscellany entitled the Harp of Renfri ishine A taste for antiquarian research, 'Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,' divided with the muse the empire of his genius, and he attained an unusually familiar acquaintance with the early history of Scottish traditionary poetry results appeared in Minstrelsy Ancient and Modern (1827), a collection of Scottish ballads, prefaced by a very able historical introduction, the basis of most later investigations. In the following year he became editor of a weekly journal in Paisley, and established a magazine to which he contributed some of his liappiest verses His editorial skill and vigour advanced him in 1830 to the more important charge of the Glasgow Courter, which he retained till his death In youth a Radical reformer, he early became a In 1832 he collected and rather pronounced Tory published his poems in one volume. He joined with Hogg in editing the works of Burns, and was collecting materials for a Life of Tunnahill, when he was suddenly cut off by a fit of apoplexy at the early age of thirty-eight. He was highly successful in versifying the Scandinavian folksongs, and in imitating those of his own land, but he is chiefly remembered by his lyrics. His best songs show imagination, warmth, and tenderness

Jeanie Morrison

I've wandered east, I've wandered west,
Through mony a weary way,
But never, never can forget
The love o' life's young day!
The fire that's blawn on Beltane e'en
May weel be black gin Yule,
But blacker fa' awaits the heart
Where first fond love grows cule.

O dear, dear Jeanie Morrison,
The thochts o' bygane years
Still fling their shadows over my path,
And blind my een wi' tears!

grat

great leavy

They blind my ech wi' saut, saut tears,
And sair and sick I pine,
As memory idly summons up
The blithe blinks o lang-yne

Oh, mind ye, love, how aft we left
The deavin' dinsome toun, deafening—noisy
To wander by the green burn side,
And hear its water croon? murmur

The simmer leaves hung ower our heads,
The flowers burst round our fect,

And in the gloamin o' the wood dusk.
The throssil whiishlt sweet whishled

The throssil whussht in the wood,
The burn sang to the trees,

And we with \ature's heart in tune, Concerted harmonies,

And on the knowe abune the burn, knotl-above For hours thegether sat

In the silentness o' joy, till buth
Wi' very gladness grat '

Aye, 1ye, dear Jeanie Morrison,
Fears trinkled down your check, trickled

Like dew beads on a rose, yet nane
Had ony power to speak
That was a time, a blessed time
When hearts were fresh and young,

When freely gushed all feelings forth, Unsvilabled—unsung t

I marvel, Jeanie Morrison,
Gin I had been to thee
As closely twined wi' earliest thochts
As we had been to me?
Oh, tell me gin their music fills Thine car as it does nine

Oh, say gin c er your heart grows grit
Wi' dreamings o' langsyne?

I've wandered east, I've wandered west,
I've borne a weary lot,
But in my wanderings, far or near,
Ye never were forgot.
The fount that first burst frac this heart,
Still travels on its way,
And channels deeper, as it rins.

And channels deeper, as it rins, The luve o' life's young day

O dear, dear Jeanie Morrison,
Since we were sindered young,
I've never seen your face, nor heard
I'he music o' your tongue,
But I could hug all wretchedness,

And happy could I dee,
Did I but ken your heart still dreamed
O' bygine days and me '

From 'The Sword Chant of Thorstein Raudi.'

Far isles of the ocean thy lightning have known,
And wide o'er the mainland thy horrors have shone.
Great sv ord of my father, stern joy of his hand!
Thou hast carved his name deep on the stranger's red strand,
And v on him the glory of undying song

Keen cleaver of gay crests,
Sharp piercer of broad breasts,
Grim slayer of lieroes, and scourge of the strong'
Fame giver' I kiss thee.

In a love more abiding than that the heart knows For maiden more lovely than summer's first rose, My heart's knit to thine, and lives but for thee, In dreamings of gladness thou'rt dancing with me, Brave measures of madness, in some battlefield,

Where armour is ringing,
And noble blood springing, and clover again below to stout haulers.

And cloven, yown lichnet, stout hauberk, and shield Death-giver 'I kiss thee

James Hyslop (1798-1827), a shepherd poet, was born in the Dumfriesshire parish of Kirkconnel Mainly self-taught, he began amidst farmwork to contribute prose and verse to the provincial newspapers, and while serving as shepherd near Airdsmoss, Avrshire, the scene of Richard Cameron's death, he wrote 'The Cameroni in's Dream' He thught a school at Greenock for a year or two, through the influence of Lord Jeffrey was appointed tutor on a man of-war, and died cruising off the Cape Verd Islands His poems, nearly a hundred in number, were collected by the Rev P Mearns in 1887, but only one is really well known. It was made the foundation of a cantata in the last year of the century by Mr Hamish MacCunn, and so became known out of Scotland Cameron, the field preacher, published an extravigant 'Declaration' in 1680 against the Government of Charles II, and a month afterwards fell, with many of his sixty armed followers, in a skirmish with the royal dragoons

The Cameronian's Dream

In a dream of the night I was wafted away To the muirland of mist where the martyrs lay, Where Cameron's sword and his Bible are seen Engraved on the stone where the heather grows green

'Twas a dream of those ages of darkness and blood, When the minister's home was the mountain and wood, When in Wellwood's dark valley the standard of Zion, All bloody and torn, 'mong the heather was lying

'Twas morning, and summer's young sun from the east Lay in loving repose on the green mountain's breast, On Wardlaw and Cairntable the clear shining dew Ghstened there 'mong the heath bells and mountain flowers blue.

And far up in lieaven, near the white sunny cloud, The song of the lark was melodious and loud, And in Glenmuir's wild solitude, lengthened and deep, Were the whistling of plovers and bleating of sheep

And Wellwoods sweet valleys breathed music and gladness,

The fresh meadow blooms hung in beauty and redness, Its daughters were happy to hail the returning, And drink the delights of July's sweet morning

But, ah ' there were hearts cherished for other feelings. Illumed by the light of prophetic revealings, Who drank from the scenery of beauty but sorrow, For they knew that their blood would bedew it to morrow.

'Twas the few faithful ones who with Cameron were lying, Concealed 'mong the mist where the heath fowl were crying, For the horsemen of Earlshall around them were hovering, And their bridle reins rang through the thin misty covering

Their faces grew pale, and their swords were unsheathed, But the vengeance that darkened their brow was un breathed.

With eyes turned to heaven in calm resignation, They sang their last song to the God of Salvation

The hills with the deep mournful music were ringing, The curlew and plover in concert were singing, But the melody died 'mid derision and laughter, As the host of ungodly rushed on to the slaughter

Though in mist and in darkness and fire they were shrouded,

Yet the souls of the righteous were calm and unclouded Their dark eyes flashed lightning as, proud and unbending, They stood like the rock which the thunder is rending

The muskets were flashing, the blue swords were gleaming, The helmets were cleft, and the red blood was streaming, The heavens grew black, and the thunder was rolling, When in Wellwood's dark muirlands the mighty were falling

When the righteous had fallen, and the combat was ended, A chariot of fire through the dark cloud descended, Its drivers were angels on horses of whiteness, And its burning wheels turned on axles of brightness

A scraph unfolded its door bright and shining, All dazzling like gold of the seventh refining, And the souls that came forth out of great tribulation, Have mounted the chariot and steeds of salvation

On the arch of the rainbow the chariot is gliding,
Through the path of the thunder the horsemen are riding,
Glide swiftly, bright spirits ' the prize is before ye,
A crown never fading, a kingdom of glory '

Henry Scott Riddell (1797-1870), born in Eskdale, was bred a shepherd, but contriving to make out a course at Edinburgh University, served for a few years a chapel in the Roburghshire parish of Cavers. He wrote on sheep farming, Lays of the Ath, and many songs, some of which are still sung in Scotland—'Scotland Yet' (beginning 'Gae bring my guid auld harp ance mair'), a version of 'The Crook and Plaid,' and one or two others. Christopher North warmly praised 'When the Glen is all still,' a pithier lyric begins, 'Ours is the land of gallant hearts'

Robert Gilfillan (1798-1850), the son of a Dunfermine weaver, was clerk to a wine merchant in Leith, and afterwards collector of poor-rates there. His Songs passed through three editions in his lifetime, and an edition of his Works, with a Life by Anderson, appeared in 1851. The songs are marked by kindly feeling and smooth versification, and several of them have been well set to music.

The Exile's Song

Oh, why left I my hame?
Why did I cross the deep?
Oh, why left I the land
Where my forefathers sleep?

I sigh for Scotia's shore,
And I gaze across the sea,
But I canna get a blink
O' my ain countrie!

The palm tree waveth high,
And fair the myrtle springs,
And, to the Indian maid,
The builbul sweetly sings,
But I danna see the broom Wi' its tassels on the lea,
Nor hear the lintie's sang
O' my ain countrie!

Oh, here no Sabbath bell
Awakes the Sabbath morn,
Nor song of reapers heard
Amang the vellow corn
For the tyrant's voice is here,
And the wail of slavene,
But the sun of freedom shines
In my ain countrie!

There's a hope for every woe,
And a balm for every pain,
But the first joys o' our heart
Come never back again
There's a track upon the deep,
And a path across the sea,
But the weary ne er return
To their ain countrie

David Macbeth Mon (1798-1851) was, above the signature of 'Delta' (rather the actual Δ), a frequent poetical contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, while he practised as a surgeon in his native town of Musselburgh, beloved by all who knew him His best pieces are grave and tender, but he also wrote some lively jeux d'espirit and a humorous Scottish tale of the kailyard, The Auto biography of Mansie Wauch, which was reprinted from Blackwood in 1828, and is still constantly reissued and read in Scotland Besides the Outlines of the Ancient History of Medicine (1831), a pamphlet on cholera, and memoirs of his friend Galt and some other notables, his other works are The Legend of Genevieve, with other Tales and Poems (1824), Domestic Verses (1843), and Sketches of the Poetical Literature of the Past Half-centur; (1851) He edited Mrs Hemans, and contributed some four hundred articles to Blackwood His Poetical Works, edited with a Memoir by Thomas Aird, were published in two volumes in 1852 Even his friend Aird admitted that in much of Delta's work funcy, feeling, and musical rhythm are more conspicuous than power or new thought

When thou at Eve art Roaming
When thou at eve art roaming
Along the clm o ershadowed walk,
Where fast the eddying stream is foaming
And falling down—a cataract,
'Twas there with thee I wont to talk,
Think thou upon the days gone by,
And heave a sigh

When sails the moon allove the mountains,
And cloudless skies are purely blue,
And sparkle in her light the fountains,
And darker frowns the lonely yew,
Then be thou melancholy too,
While pausing on the hours I proved
With thee, beloved

When wakes the dawn upon thy dwelling,
And lingering shadows disappear,
As soft the woodland songs are swelling
A choral anthem on thine ear,
Muse, for that hour to thought is dear,
And then its flight remembrance wings
Fo bypast things

To me, through every season, dearest,
In every seene, by day, by night,
Thou, present to my mind appearest
A quenchless star, for ever bright,
My solitary, sole delight,
Where er I am, by shore—at sea—
I think of thee'

Thomas Aird (1802-76) produced some poems showing a weird and powerful imagination, and some descriptive sketches of Scottish rural scenery and character Born at Bowden in Rosburgh, he was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1826 produced a tragedy, Martzoufle, with some He formed the acquaintance of other poems Professor Wilson, 'Delta' Moir, and other contributors to Blackwood's Magazine, and in that periodical lie published many of the poetical pieces collected into one volume in 1848 The Captive of Fiz (1830) was a long marritive poem volumes of prose sketches were called Religious Characteristics (1827) and The Old Bachelor in the Old Scottish Village (1848) The editing of a Conservative weekly newspaper, The Dumfries Herald, for over a quarter of a century (1835-63), carried on with zeal and vigour, left time for the writing of not a few poems, usually published in the Herald He edited D M Moir's works, and prefixed a biography And till ill health came on him after 1852, his life glided on in a simple and happy tranquillity rare among poets Gilfillan's first Gallery of Literary Portraits took shape at his suggestion, and appeared for the most part in his paper, Christopher North, writing on Spenser, was largely guided by his judgment as a critic, often adopting Aird's very phrases After a reading of the MS of the Life of Sterling, submitted to him by his friend Carlyle, Aird said 'It is very able and interesting, but it might have been as well to let the poor forlorn sheet lightning die away in its cloud' He retained Carlyle's friendship till his death, and Carlyle said that in Aird's poetry he 'found everywhere a healthy breath as of mountain breezes a native minli ness, geniality, and veracity' The longer poems are admittedly defective in construction. Aird's memory was revived in 1902 by centenary celebrations and memorials at Bowden and at Dumfries

From 'The Devils Dream on Mount Akebeek.'

Beyond the north where Ural hills from polar tempests run, A glow went forth at midnight hour as of unwonted sun, Upon the north at midnight hour a mighty noise was heard,

As if with all his trampling waves the Ocean were unbarred,

And high a grizzly Terror hung, upstarting from belov, Like fiery arrow shot aloft from some immeasured bow

'Twas not the obedient scraph's form that burns before the Throne,

Whose feathers are the pointed flames that tremble to be

With twists of faded glory mixed, grim shadows v ove his wing,

An aspect like the hurrying storm proclaimed the Infernal King

And up he went, from native might, or holy sufferance given,

As if to strike the starry boss of the high and vaulted heaven

Aloft he turned in middle air, like falcon for his prey, And bowed to all the winds of heaven as if to flee away, Till broke a cloud—a plantom host, like glimpses of a

Sowing the Syrian wilderness with many a restless gleam.

He knew the flowing chivalry, the sy art and turbaned train.

That far had pushed the Moslem futh, and peopled well his reign

With stooping pinion that outflew the Prophet's winged steed,

In pride throughout the desert bounds he led the phantom speed,

But prouder yet he turned alone, and stood on Tabor hill, With seorn as if the Arab swords had little helped his

With seorn he looked to west away, and left their train to die.

Like a thing that had awaked to life from the gleaming of his eye.

What hill is like to Tabor hill in beauty and in fame? There, in the sad days of his flesh, o er Christ a glory came,

And light outflowed him like a sea, and raised his shining brow.

And the voice went forth that bade all worlds to God's Beloved box

One thought of this came o'er the fiend, and rused his startled form,

And up he drew his swelling skirts, as if to meet the storm

With wing that stripped the dews and birds from off the boughs of Night,

Down over Tabor's trees he whirled his fierce distempered

And westward o'er the shadowy earth he tracked his earnest way,

Till o'er him shone the utmost stars that hem the skirts of day,

Then higher 'neath the sun he flew above all mortal ken, Yet looked what he might see on earth to raise his pride again He saw a form of Africa low sitting in the dust,

The feet were chained, and sorrow thrilled throughout the sable bust

The idol and the idol's priest lie huled upon the earth, And every slavery that brings wild passions to the birth All forms of human wickedness were pillars of his fame, All sounds of human misery his kingdom's loud acelaim

Exulting o'er the rounded earth again he rode with night, Till, sailing o'er the untrodden top of Aksbeek high and white,

He closed at once his weary wings, and touched the shining hill,

For less his flight was easy strength than proud unconquered will

For sin had dulled his native strength, and spoilt the holy law

Of impulse whence the archangel forms their earnest being draw

There is a Life of Aird by Jardine Wallace prefixed to the fifth edition of his works (1878) Many of Aird's letters to George Gilfillan have been printed in Watson's Memoir of Gilfillan (1892) The centenary of his birth was observed at Bowden and at Dumfnes, where a portrait bust was erected

Charles Neaves (1800–76), as Lord Neaves, maintained on the Scottish Bench the old alliance between law and literature. The son of a Forfar lawyer, he studied at Edinburgh, and rose through various professional appointments to be Lord Cockburn's successor as one of the judges of the Court of Session He was a constant contributor to Blackwood in prose and verse, and some of his wittiest and most satirical poems, republished in Songs and Verses, Social and Scientific (1868), make good-humoured fun of Darwinism, Teetotalism, 'Stuart Mill on Mind and Matter,' and innumerable other questions of larger or smaller He also contributed articles on philological science, and published a volume on the Greek anthology, illustrated with verse translations

Henry Cockburn (1779-1854), as a Scottish judge called Lord Cockburn, was born perhaps at Cockpen, but more probably in the Parliament Close of old Edinburgh He entered the High School in 1787, and the University of Edinburgh 'We were kept,' he says, 'about nine years at two dead languages, which we did not learn' But Dugald Stewart's lectures 'were like the opening of the heavens,' and a debating club brought him in contact with Jeffrey, Horner, and Brougham, from whom he imbibed Whig opinions He was called to the Scottish Bar in 1800, and in 1807 his uncle, the all powerful Lord Melville, appointed him an advocate depute—a nonpolitical post, from which, on political grounds, he 'had the honour of being dismissed' in 1810 He rose, however, to share with Jeffrey the leadership of the Bar, and with Jeffrey was counsel for three prisoners charged with sedition (1817-19) zerlous supporter, by pen as well as by tongue, of parliamentary reform, he became Solicitor-General for Scotland under the Grey Ministry in 1830, had the chief hand in drafting the Scottish

Reform Bill, in 1834 was made, as Lord Cockburn, a judge of the Court of Session, and in 1837 a lord of justiciary He died at Bonally Tower, his beautiful home at the base of the Pentlands since his marriage in 1811, and was buried near Jeffrey in the Dean Cemetery, Edin-He contributed articles—on legal subjects mainly-to the Edinburgh Review, and was author of the admirable Life of Jeffres (1852), and of four posthumous works-Memorials of his Time (1856), Journal, 1831-44 (2 vols 1874), Circuit Journeys (1888), and Trials for Sedition in Scotland (2 vols 1888) The Memorials has from the first been accepted as the most authentic, vivid, genial, and entertaining account of Edinburgh life, manners, and personages in the early nineteenth century

Edinburgh Society

There was far more coarseness in the formal age than in the free one I wo vices especially, which have been long banished from respectable society, were very prevalent, if not universal, among the whole upper ranks-swearing and drunkenness. Nothing was more eommon than for gentlemen who had dired with lidies, and meant to rejoin them, to get drunk Fo get drunk in a tavern scenicd to be considered as a natural, if not an intended, consequence of going to one. Swearing was thought the right, and the mark, of a gentleman And, tried by this test, nobody who had not seen them could now be made to believe how many gentlemen there were Not that people were worse tempered then than now They were only coarser in their manners, and had got into a bad style of admonition and dissent The naval chaplain justified his cursing the sailors because it made them listen to him, and Braxfield [the Scottish judge] apologised to a lidy whom he damned at whist for bad play by declaring that he had mistaken her for his wife. This odious practice was applied with particular offensiveness by those in authority towards their inferiors. In the army it was universal by officers towards soldiers, and far more frequent than is now eredible by masters towards servants

The prevailing dinner was about three o'clock o'clock was quite common, if there was no company Hence it was no great deviation from their usual custom for a family to dine on Sundays 'between sermons'that is, between one and two. The hour in time, but not without grouns and predictions, became four, at which it stuck for several years. Then it got to five, which, however, was thought positively revolutionary, and four was long and gallantly adhered to by the haters of change as 'the good old hour' At last even they were obliged to give in, but they only yielded inch by meh, and made a desperate stand at half past four Even five, however, triumphed, and continued the aver age polite honr from (I think) about 1806 or 1807 till Six has at last prevailed, and half an hour later is not unusual. As yet this is the furthest stretch of London imitation, except in country houses devoted to grouse or deer

The procession from the drawing room to the dimngroom was formerly arranged on a different principle from what it is now. There was no such alarming proceeding as that of each gentleman approaching a lady, and the two hooking together. This would have excited as much horror as the waltz at first did, which never showed itself without denunciations of Continental man ners by correct gentlemen and worthy mothers and aunts. All the ladies first went off by themselves in a regular row according to the ordinary rules of precedence. Then the gentlemen moved off in single file, so that when they reached the drining room the ladies were all there, lingering about the backs of the chairs till they could see what their fate was to be. Then began the selection of partners, the leaders of the male line having the advantage of priority, and of course the magnates had an affinity for each other.

The dinners themselves were much the same as at present. Any difference is in a more liberal adoption of the cookery of I rance. Healths and toasts were special torments-oppressions which cannot now be conceived. Every glass during dinner required to be dedicated to the health of some one. This prandial nuisance was horrible, but it was nothing to what followed For after dinner, and before the ladies re tired, there generally began what were called 'rounds' of torsts, and, worst of all, there were 'sentiments' These were short epigrammatic sentences expressive of moral feelings and virtues, and were thought refined and elegant productions. The glasses being filled, a person was asked for his or for her sentiment, when this or something similar was committed 'May the pleasures of the evening bear the reflections of the morning,' or 'May the friends of our youth be the eompanions of our old age,' or 'Delicate pleasures to susceptible minds,' &c.

HENRY COCKBURN
After the Portrait by Raeburn.

Early dinners begat suppers. But suppers are so delightful that they have survived long after dinners have become late. Indeed, this has immemorially been a favourite Edinburgh repast. How many are the reasons, how strong the associations, that inspire the last of the day's friendly meetings! Supper is cheaper than dinner, shorter, less ceremonious, and more poetical The business of the day is over, and its still fresh events interest. It is chiefly intimate associates that are drawn together at that familiar hour, of which night deepens the sociality. If there be any fun or heart or spirit in a man at all, it is then, if ever, that it will appear. So far as I have seen social life, its brightest sunshine has been on the last repast of the day.

As to the comparative religiousness of the present and the preceding generation, any such comparison is very difficult to be made. Religion is certainly more the fashion than it used to be. There is more said about it, there has been a great rise, and consequently a great competition, of sects, and the general mass of the religious public has been enlarged. On the other hand, if we are to believe one half of what some religious persons themselves assure us, religion is now almost extinct. My opinion is that the balance is in favour of the present time. And I am certain that it would be much more so if the modern dictators would only accept of that as religion which was considered to be so by their devout fathers.

(From the Memorials)

Dean Ramsay, unofficially Edward Bannerman Burnett Ramsay (1793-1872), was born in Aberdeen, the fourth son of Alexander Burnett, Sheriff of Kincardineshire, who in 1806, succeeding to an uncle's estates, took the surname Ramsay, and was created a baronet. Educated at Durham and St John's College, Cambridge, he held two Somerset curacies 1816-24, and then removed to In 1830 he became incumbent of St Edinburgh John's, in 1846 dean also of his diocese The book with which his name will be always identified is the delightful Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character (1857, 22nd ed, with Memoir by Cosmo Innes, 1874) It forms a curious record of old times and manners fast disappearing, it furnishes a direct reply to jests such as those of Sydney Smith and Charles Lamb to the effect that the Scottish people have no humour, and, next perhaps to the Waverley Novels, has done more than any one book to make Scottish customs, phrases, and traits of character familiar to Englishmen at home and abroad Spite of his association with what is practically the national jest-book, Dean Ramsay was an energetic, revered, and beloved clergy man, as much esteemed by Presbyterians as in his own communion, and he wrote a Life of the great Presbyteman preacher Dr Chalmers, as well as books on Faults in Christian Believers, Pulpit Table-talk, and The Christian Life

Scottish Nationality

There is no mistaking the national attachment so strong in the Scottish character. Men return after long absence in this respect unchanged, whilst absent, Scotch men never forget their native home. In all varieties of lands and climates their hearts ever turn towards the 'land o' cakes and brither Scots' Scottish festivals are kept with Scottish feeling on 'Greenland's iev moun tains' or 'India's coral strand' I received an amusing account of an ebullition of this patriotic feeling from my late noble friend the Marquis of Lothian, who met with it when travelling in India. He happened to arrive at a station upon the eve of St Andrew's Day, and received an invitation to join a Scottish dinner party in commemoration of old Scotland. There was a great deal of Scottish enthusiasm. There were scient sheep heads (singed) down the table, and I ord Lothian told me that after dinner he sang with great applause 'The Laird o' Cockpen'

Love of country must draw forth good feeling in men's minds, as it will tend to make them cherish n desire for its welfare and improvement To clalm kindred with the honourable and high minded, as in some degree allied with them, must imply at least an appreciation of great and good qualities then, supplies men with a motive for following upright and noble conduct-whatever advances in them a kindly benevolence towards fellow countrymen in dis tress, will always exercise a beneficial effect upon the hearts and intellects of a Christian people, and these objects are, I think, all more or less fostered and encouraged under the influence of that patriotic spirit which identifies national honour and national happiness with its own

I desire to preserve pecuharities which I think should be recorded, because they are national, and because they are reminiscences of genuine Scottish life doubt these peculiarities have been deeply tinged with the gunint and quict humour which is more strictly characteristic of our countrymen than their wit as exponents of that humour, our stories may often have excited some liarniless merriment in those who have appreciated the real fun of the dry Scottish character That, I trust, is no offence I should never be sorry to think that, within the 'limits of becoming mirth,' I had contributed, in however small n degree, to the entertainment and recreation of my countrymen I am convinced that every one, whether elergyman or layman, who adds something to the innocent enjoyment of human life has joined in a good work, inasmuch as he has diminished the inducement to vicious indulgence God knows there is enough of sin and of sorrow in the world to make sad the heart of every Christian man

(From the Preface to the Remuniscences)

Robert Carruthers (1799-1878), one of the authors of the first edition of this work, was a Dumfriesshire farmer's son, and was apprenticed to a bookseller in Dumfries, the town where he was born, but after his apprenticeship he became a teacher at Huntingdon, and for the corporation wrote a History of Huntingdon (1824) He had also published a selection from Vilton's prose when in 1828 he was appointed editor of the Inverness Courser, and showed how liberal prin ciples, northern news, and local interests might be satisfactorily dealt with and yet leave room for a long and frequent series of articles of literary, antiqualian, and social importance, he 'brought out' Hugh Miller in his columns In 1853 Carruthers issued his principal book-an edition of Pope's works, with a fuller Life than had vet appeared. A new edition of the lafe, assued in 1857, incorporated Dilke's discoveries and corrections, and remained the standard one till the publication of that by Mr Courthope in the great edition begun by Mr Elwin (1871-89) Dr Robert

Chambers and Mr Carruthers were between them responsible for the first edition of this Cyclobadia of Luglish Literature, planned and edited by Dr Robert Chambers, and published in 1842-44 Carruthers, who was specially entrusted with the articles on the pocts in the first edition, took entire charge of the revised editions in 1858 and 1876, and many of the articles in the present new edition are based on his. For the same pub lishers Carruthers edited a 'Household' Slinke speare (1861-63) He contributed to Chambers's Journal, the North British Review, and the eighth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and he wrote Lives of Filconer, Gray, and Jimes Montgomery for editions of their poetry His scholarly work earned him an Edinburgh LLD in 1871

William and Robert Chambers, the publishers of this work, were the sons of a Peebles cotton manufacturer, whose commercial unsuccess carly threw the boys on their own resources. William, the elder brother, had keen business institucts, and was incidentally also a writer of books. Robert, who became also a publisher, had strong literary impulses, varied intellectual sympathies and accomplishments, and by his strenuous life-work proved a pioneer in more than one department of research

William Chambers (1800-83) was in 1814 ap prenticed to a bookseller in Edinburgh, and in 1819 started business for himself, to bookselling afterwards adding printing From childhood he was an industrious reader Between 1825 and 1830 he wrote the Book of Scotland, and, in con junction with his brother Robert, a Gazetteer of Scotland In 1832 he started Chambers's Edin burgh Journal, six weeks in advance of the Penns Magazine published by Charles Knight for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge and soon thereafter he united with Robert in founding the business of W & R Chambers, the best known of whose many publications are besides the Journal and a numerous series of educational works, a Miscellan, (20 vols), Papers for the People (12 vols), the Information for the People (2 vols 1833, new editions in 1857, &c), the Cyclopædia of English Literature (2 vols 1842-44, new ed 1901-3), and Chambers's Encyclopadia, 'a dictionary of universal knowledge? (10 vols 1859-68, newed 1888-92) Lord Provost of Edinburgh in 1865-69, he was associated with important civic improvements and he carried out at his own cost a restoration of St Giles' Cathedral He was made LLD of Edinburgh and just before his death had been offered a baronetes Besides many con tributions to the Journal, he wrote about a dozen separate works, of which a History of Peeblesshire (1864) and an autobiographical Memoir of his brother and lumself (1872) were the most im In receiving from his hands the freedom portant of the city of Edinburgh in 1867, I ord Beaconsfield (then Mr Disraeli) said, after speaking of the promotion of sound literature, 'I do not think that the name of Chambers will ever be mentioned in the future without a sentiment of gratitude'

Robert Chambers (1802-71), after an education at the local Peebles schools, began business as a bookseller in Edinburgh in 1818, but found time for extensive study and a great deal of miscellaneous writing In 1824 he produced the Traditions of Edinburgh, a work in which Sir Walter Scott took a lively interest, assisting its young author with valuable memoranda, and between 1822 and 1834 he had written some twenty-five volumes The success of the Journal was materially pro moted by his essays, his wide and varied interests, and his literary insight. In 1844 he published anonymously the Vestiges of Creation, a then revolutionary and startling work, which holds an import intiplace in the history of evolution between Lamarck and Darwin, it prepared the way for the Origin of Species, and for fifteen years stimulated speculation in Britain and bore the brunt of ortho dox criticism The authorship, ascribed to him in the Athenaum of 2nd December 1854, was first announced in Mr Ireland's introduction to the twelfth edition (1884) In the 'Historical Introduction' prefixed to the later editions of the Origin of Species, Darwin says of the Vestiges work, from its powerful and brilliant style, though displaying in the earlier editions little accurate knowledge and a great want of scientific caution, immediately had a very wide circulation opinion it has done excellent service in this country in calling attention to the subject, in removing prejudice, and in thus preparing the ground for the reception of analogous views' By his Popular Rhymes of Scotland (1847) lie gave an impulse to the study of Scottish folklore. His History of the Rebellions in Scotland, praised by Scott in his Journal as a clever book and a really lively work, and the Domestic Annals of Scotland (3 vols 1859-61) were serious contributions to history, as his Ancient Sea Margins (1848) was to the geology of Scotland His Life of Smollett (1867) had the good fortune to please Carlyle greatly, and to be pronounced by him 'vastly superior to anything that had ever been written about him before' In 1829 he published a collection of Scottish Ballads and Songs, and he wrote a startling dissertation on Scottish ballads which suggested that very many of them were of as recent origin as Lady Elizabeth Wardlaw's Hardyknute (see Vol II p 312) He made further a collection of the Songs of Scotland prior to Burns (1862), The Life and Works of Robert Burns (4 vols 1851, new ed by W Wallace, 1896) became practically the standard work on the subject, the poems and letters being arranged throughout the Life in approximately chronological order, and among his works were also a Life of James I, a Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen, and The Book of Days (2 vols 1863)—his last under-He spent his last years in St Andrews, whose university had made him LL.D

Out of a brief History of the English Language and Literature for senior pupils in schools, written by Dr Chambers in 1835, sprang the idea of this Cyclopædia of English Literature, which, as has been said in the preface in the first volume of this edition, was planned by Dr Chambers in 1841, carried through mainly with the assistance of Dr Carruthers-who was specially charged with the poets-and published in parts between the end of 1842 and the later months of 1843 (complete in two volumes in 1844) It was the first work of the kind on such a comprehensive plan His essays contributed to the Journal (some of which were re published in volumes) probably endeared Dr Robert Chambers to a larger circle of readers than his separately published works, many of which are Dr Chambers was not not here enumerated merely a conscientious, sympathetic, and versatile writer, but had an exceptional gift of popularity in the best sense of the word, to which a large measure of kindly and spontaneous native humour greatly contributed

From 'The English Girl.'

Her favourite seat is under a laburnum, which seems to be showering a new birth of beauty upon her head There she sits in the quiet of nature, thinking thoughts as beautiful as flowers, with feelings as gentle as the gales which fan them She knows no evil, and there fore she does none Untouched by earthly experiences, she is perfectly happy—and the happy are good tion remains in her as a treasure, hereafter to be brought into full use. As yet she only spends a small share of the interest of her heart's wealth upon the objects around her, the principal will, on some future and timely day, be given to one worthy, I hope, to possess a thing so valuable. Meanwhile, she loves as a daughter and a sister may do. Every morning and evening she comes to her parents with her pure and unharming kiss, nor, when some cheerful brother returns from college or from counting house to onliven home for a brief space, is the same salutation wanting to assure him of the continuance of her most sweet regards. Often, too, she is found intertwining her loveliness with that of her sistersurm clasping waist, and neck crossing neck, and bosom pressed to bosom-till all seems one mextricable knot No jealousy, no guile, no envy-no more than what possesses a bunch of lilies growing from the same stem. She has some spare fondness, moreover, for a variety of pcts in the lower orders of creation There are chickens which will leave the richest morsels at the sound of her voice, and little dogs which will give up jelping, even at the most provoking antagonists, Her chief favounte, how if she only desires them ever, is a lamb, which follows her wherever she goes, a heaven sent emblem of herself To see her fondling this spotless creature on the green-innocence reposing upon innocence—you might suppose the golden age had returned, and that there was to be no more wickedness seen on earth.

From 'The Man who Sang when Asked'

Our friend was what is called a good but not a brilliant or perfect singer. He had a stout gentlemanly voice, calculated to be of great service as a bass in a trio or duet, but not by any means a fine voice. Neverthe less he sang with so much spirit and appropriate expression that in general his performances were much admired, not to speak of the additional approbation which he always secured by his being so willing to contribute to the amusement of the company. Smith had just one fault, as far as singing was concerned. When once he was set agoing there was no getting him to stop. When one of his songs was done, it would perhaps become the subject of conversation. 'Capital song that—first rate old fellow Dibdin' 'Yes, sir. but did you ever hear his "Tom Bowling"?—that is better still' And then, without further preface, he would commence—

'Here a sheer hulk'-

and so forth, after which another could be tacked as slightly on to that, and another to that again, till you could almost echo his words, and wish that 'death had brought him to' Smith estimated the pleasantness of a party, the hospitality of the landlord and landlady, and the worldly worth and amiability of the whole company by the number of songs he was asked or permitted to sing 'A deuced niec affair we had last night at Atherton's. I sang two and twenty of my very best Though I would have got in the twenty third, but an old jade in a pink cap broke us up at only twenty five minutes past twelve, just as I was about to begin? It was told of Smith that he once stuck a song for want of the words (a most astonishing occur rence), and was so overwhelmed with shame on the occasion as to leave the room abruptly and walk away home. He had gone more than a mile on his way when he suddenly recollected the missing stanza Back he turned, crying with the transport of Archimedes himself, 'I have it, I have it.' Rc entering the room, he found the company just on their feet to depart. 'Stop, stop,' lie cried, in the tonc of a man arresting an execution with a reprieve, 'stop, here it is 1' And though almost breathless, he immediately resumed the song at the exact point where he had left off, with all the proper gesticula tion and expression, as if no hiatus had taken place

See the above mentioned Memoir of William and Robert Chambers (1872, 13th ed., with supplementary chapter 1884).

Sir Charles Lyell (1797-1875) was the eldest son of the mycologist and Dante student, Charles Lyell (1767-1849) of Kinnordy in Forfarshire, and, brought up in the New Forest and educated at Ringwood, Salisbury, and Midhurst, he was in 1816 sent to Eveter College, Oxford At Oxford in 1819 he attended the lectures of Buckland, and acquired a taste for the science he afterwards did so much to promote Having taken his degree in 1819, he studied law and was called to the Bar, but devoting himself to geology, made European tours in 1824 and 1828-30, and published the results in the Transactions of the Geological Society and elsewhere. His Principles of Geology (1830-33) may be ranked next after Darwin's Origin of Species among the books which exercised the most powerful influence on scientific thought in the nineteenth century, strenuously denying the necessity of stupendous convulsions, and insisting that the greatest geological changes might have been produced by forces still at work. The Elements of Geology (1838) continued the same argument. It was subsequently divided into two works, The Principles (12th ed 1876) and The Elements of Geology, and a great part of Lyell's life-work consisted in supplementing and supporting by evidence his main thesis, and so maintaining and developing the contentions of his predecessors The Geological Evidences of Hutton and Playfair the Antiquity of Man (1863) startled the public by its unbiassed attitude towards Darwin, at this time still regarded as a revolutionary and a heretic Lyell also published Travels in North America (1845) and A Second I set to the United States In 1832-33 he was Professor of Geology at King's College, London Repeatedly President of the Geological Society, and in 1864 President of the British Association, he was knighted in 1848, and created a baronet in 1864. He was buried in Westminster Abbey A heroic example of Lyell's open-mindedness was given, as Sir Joseph Hooker said, by his frank acceptance of Darwin's doctrine of natural selection, after nine editions of his own Principles had carried his name and fame over the civilised world done much to prepare the way for Darwin, but had till the production of the Origin of Species maintained a doctrine of special creations. He now abandoned, 'late in life, a theory which he had for forty verrs regarded as one of the foundation-stones of a work that had given him the highest position attainable among contemporary scientific writers' The emment men whose memorial secured for Lvell a place in Westminster Abbey were agreed that for twenty-five years he was the most prominent geologist in the world, equally eminent for the extent of his labours and the breadth of his philosophical views, and he possessed the gift, often denied to great scientific thinkers, of a luminous, effective, and simple style.

Lyell and Darwin

MI DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for your kind ness in sending me a copy of your important work on the History of Creation, and especially for the chapter entitled 'On Lvell and Darwin' Most of the zoologists forget that anything was written between the time of Lamarck and the publication of our friend's Origin of Species

I am therefore obliged to you for pointing out how clearly I advocated a law of continuity even in the organic world, so far as possible without adopting Lamarck's theory of transmutation I believe that mine was the first work (published in January 1832) in which any attempt had been made to prove that while the causes now in action continue to produce unceasing variations in the climate and physical geography of the globe, and endless migration of species, there must be a perpetual dying out of animals and plants, not suddenly and by whole group at once, but one after another contended that this succession of species was now going on, and always had been, that there was a constant struggle for existence, as De Candolle had pointed out, and that in the battle for life some were always in creasing their numbers at the expense of others, some advancing, others becoming exterminated.

But while I taught that as often as certain forms of animals and plants disappeared, for reasons quite in telligible to us, others took their place by virtue of a causation which was beyond our comprehension, it remained for Darwin to accumulate proof that there is no break between the incoming and the outgoing species, that they are the work of evolution, and not of special creation

It was natural, as you remark, that Cuvier's doctrine of sudden revolutions in the animate and the manimate world should lead not only to the doctrine of critis trophes, such as Elie de Beaumont's sudden formation of mountain chains, but to a similar creed in regard to the organic world A D'Orbigny gave us twenty seven stages or groups of living beings, all the species in each of which were so distinct that none of them passed from one to the other stage Agassiz still inclined to the same notion, the sudden annihilation of one set of inhabitants of the globe, and the coming upon the stage in the next geological period of a perfectly distinct set I had certainly prepared the way in this country, in six editions of my work before the I estiges of Creation appeared in 1842, for the reception of Darwin's gradual and insensible evolution of species, and I am very glad that you noticed this, and also the influence of Cuvier's work, which in an English dress, translated by Professor Jamieson, went through almost as many editions in this country as in France, and exercised great authority long after my Principles began to be popular

Mansel on the Limits of Religious Thought

Have you looked at Mansels 'Bampton Lectures' on the 'Limits of Religious Thought'? There were many fruitless discussions among the dons of Oxford how to force the young men by various puns and penalties to attend the University church, which was nearly empty, but there were no precedents for such proceedings last some original thinker suggested that possibly if they named some good preacher it might remedy the evil So they made inquiries for some young men of ability, and found this Mansel, who forthwith filled St Mary's to overflowing, and when the lectures were printed they soon reached a second edition \ \ friend of mine. Huxley, who will soon take rank as one of the first naturalists we have ever produced, begged me to read these sermons as first rate, 'although, regarding the anthor as a Churchman, you will probably compare him, as I did, to the drunken fellow in Hogarth's "Contested Election," who is sawing through the signpost of the other party's public house, forgetting that he is sitting at the outer end of it. But read them as a piece of clear and unanswerable reasoning' Soon after I had seen them, I was recommended by Sir Edward Ryan to read a powerful article in the last National, in answer to Mansel, by Martineau, and certainly it is worth reading, and shows among other things, in an episode devoted to Butler's Analogy, how much more comfortable and consolatory is the system of creation, or the divine dis pensation, when viewed from a Unitarian than from an orthodox point of view At length, after expending much admiration and adulation on their new defender of the faith, the Oxonians have become alarmed, and Milman told me that one of them had written to Hampden, 'You are avenged,' while Dr Jeune had exclaimed, 'To think that I should have lived to hear Athersm preached from the University pulpit, and the member for Oxford recommend the worship of Jupiter!

You will understand, I dare say, the last hit better than me, for I have not read Gladstone's Homeric lucubra tions.

Sir Richard Owen (1804-92) came from Lancaster to study medicine at Edinburgh, and continued his professional preparation at St Bar tholomew's, become curator in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, where he produced a marvellous series of descriptive catalogues, and lectured as Professor of Comparative Anatomy at Bartholomew's (for two years) and at the College of Surgeons Meanwhile he helped to give new life to the Zoological Society of London 1856 he became superintendent of the natural history department of the British Museum, but continued to teach at the Royal Institution and elsewhere FRS, President of the British Association (1857), Associate of the French elsewhere Institute, CB, KCB (1883), and holder of scientific niedals, degrees, and lionorary titles, from many nations, he gained the immortality of a true worker, his anatomical and paleontological researches number nearly four hundred, and deal with almost every class of animals from sponge to He greatly advanced morphological inquire by his clear distinction between analogy and homo logy, and by his concrete studies on the nature of limbs, on the composition of the skull, and on other problems of vertebrate morphology, while his essay on Parthenogenesis was a pioneer work A pre Darwinian, he maintained a cautious atti tude to detailed evolutionist theories Life of him by his grandson (1894)

Earl Russell (1792-1878), better known to the English people as Lord John Russell, was a younger son of the sixth Duke of Bedford and gained dis tinction after his entrance into the House of Com mons as the champion of parliamentary reform in 1819 As a member of Earl Grev's Government he moved the introduction of the first Reform Bill in 1831, and was thenceforth one of the leaders of the Liberal party, holding the office of Prime Minister m two administrations, and being raised to the House of Lords in 1865. He dabbled for a while in the belies-lettres, producing a tale entitled The Nun of Arronca, a tragedy on Don Carlos, and a translation of part of the Odyssey, but most of his The list works were more in the statesman's way of them includes a Life of William Russell (1819), an Essay on the English Constitution (1821), Memoirs of the Affairs of Europe (1824), The Life and Times of Fox (1859-67), editions of the memoirs and letters of Tom Moore the poet, and of the correspondence of the fourth Duke of Bedford, and a volume of Recollections and Suggestions, published in 1875 after his retirement from public life the last of these we give the extract which follows

A Scene in Parliament in 1831.

Upon this event [the defeat of the first Reform Bill] it became the duty of Lord Grey and his colleagues to consider scriously their position. They had, brought forward a great measure affecting the constitution of the country and the course of legislation for generations to come. They could neither tamely abandon their situation nor allow their measure to be frittered away, and rest contented with the fragment of a plan, the whole of which had been enthusiastically accepted by the country It was manifest that the existing House of Commons would endeavour to destroy in detail that which they had sanctioned in the bulk. It was evident that the country was ready to follow Lord Grey, and to adopt his measure as a satisfactory settlement of a question which, since 1780, had always been in the minds of Liberal politicians, and which was now rooted in the heart of the people

Lord Grey therefore prepared the King for the deci sion to which the Cabinet arrived, to advise His Majesty to have recourse to an immediate dissolution of Parlia The King, though averse to the adoption of such a proceeding little more than six months after the general election, was disposed at this time to trust im plicitly to Lord Grey, and I am inclined to believe the popular story that when it suddenly appeared necessary, in order to prevent remonstrance from the House of Lords, that the King should appear in person to dissolve Parliament, and some trilling difficulty of plaiting the horses' manes in time was interposed as an objection, the King said at once, 'Then I'll go down to Parlin ment in a hackney couch' Had such been the spirit of Louis XVI he might have been the leader instead of the victim of the French Revolution.

The scenes which occurred in the two Houses of Parliament, so far as I was a witness of them, were singular and unprecedented Before the King arrived the House of Commons was assembled, and Sir Robert Peel and Sir Francis Burdett rose at the same time to address the Honse Lord Althorp, amid the confusion and clamonr of contending parties, following the precedent of Mr Fox, moved that Sir Francis Burdett be now heard Sir Robert Peel, on the other hand, unitating a precedent of Lord North, said, 'And I rise to speak to that motion' But instead of saying a few words, as Lord North had done, to put an end to all further debate, Sir Robert Peel quite lost his temper. and in tones of the most violent indignation attacked the impending dissolution As he went on the Tower guns began to fire, to announce the King's arrival, and as each discharge was heard a loud cheer from the Government side interrupted Sir Robert Peel's decla mation Sir Henry Hardinge was heard to exclaim, 'The next time those guns are fired they will be shotted!' Presently we were all summoned to the House of Lords, where the King's presence had put a stop to a violent and unseemly discussion. The King in his speech announced the dissolution and retired to unrobe The scene that followed was one of great excitement and confusion. As I was standing at the bar Lord Lyndhurst came up to me and said, 'Have you considered the state of Ireland? Do not you ex pect an insurrection?' or words to that effect. It so happened that in going into the House of Commons I had met O'Connell in the lobby I asked him, 'Will Ireland be quiet during the general election?' and he answered me, 'Perfectly quiet' He did not answer for more than he was able to perform. But of course I said nothing of this to Lord Lyndhurst, and left him to indulge his anger and his gloomy foreboding

Charles Cavendish Fulke Greville (1794-1865), who comes near being the St Simon of the early Victorian age, was a descendant of the fifth Lord Warwick, and of kin, therefore, to Sir Fulke Greville, I ord Brooke, the Elizabethan poet Educated at Eton and Oxford, he and dramatist became successively page to George III, private secretary to Earl Buthurst, and secretary of Jamaica—the last appointment a comfortable sinecure, which he enjoyed at home. In 1821 he was made Clerk of the Privy Council, and held the post for thirty eight years, sacrificing the chances of political distinction which his connections and abilities had promised him, but using his opportunities for the composition of a work which ranks among the most important of English historical memoirs His Journal of the Reigns of King George IV, King William IV., and Queen Victoria, edited by Henry Reeve of the Edinburgh Review, and published posthumously in 1874-87, covers the forty years between 1820 and 1860, which closed with his retirement from office Greville's official position had brought him in touch with politicians of both parties, and as a man of the world he was familiar alike on the racecourse and in the drawing-room. These advantages, combined with a native keenness of observation, a cultured versatility, and the accomplishment of an easy and gentleman-like style, enabled him to enrich our literature with a singularly valuable picture of the politics and society of his time.

Queen Victoria in 1837

August 30th -All that I hear of the young Queen leads to the conclusion that she will some day play a conspicuous part, and that she has a great deal of char It is clear enough that she had long been silently preparing herself, and had been prepared by those about her (and very properly), for the situation to which she was destined. The impressions she has made continue to be favourable, and particularly upon Melbourne, who has a thousand times greater opportunities of knowing what her disposition and her capacity are than any other person, and who is not a man to be easily captivated or dazzled by any superficial accomplishments or mere graces of manner, or even by personal favour bourne thinks highly of her sense, discretion, and good feeling, but what seem to distinguish her above every thing are cantion and prudence, the former to a degree which is almost unnatural in one so young and un pleasing, because it suppresses the youthful impulses which are so graceful and attractive

On the morning of the king's death, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Conyngham arrived at Kensing ton at five o'clock, and immediately desired to see 'the Queen' They were ushered into an apartment, and in a few minutes the door opened and she came in wrapped in a dressing gown and with slippers on her naked feet Conyngham in a few words told her their errand, and as soon as he uttered the words 'Your Majesty,' she in stantly put ont her hand to him, intimuting that he was to kiss hands before he proceeded He dropped on one Ince, kissed her hand, and then went on to tell her of the late King's death. She presented her hand to the Archbishop, who likewise kissed it, and when he had done so, addressed to her a sort of pastoral charge, which she received graciously and then retired She lost no time in giving notice to Conroy of her intentions with regard to him, she saw him, and desired him to name the reward lie expected for his services to her parents He asked for the Red Riband, an Irish peerage, and a pension of £3000 a year. She replied that the two first rested with her Ministers, and she could not engage for them, but that the pension he should have It is not easy to ascertain the exact cause of her antipathy to him, but it has probably grown with her growth, and results from divers causes. The person in the world she loves hest is the Baroness Lehzen, and Lehzen and Conroj were enemies. There was formerly a Baroness Spacth at Kensington, lady in waiting to the Duchess, and I elizen and Spaeth were intimate friends. Conroy quarrelled with the latter and got her dismissed, and this Lehzen never forgive. She may have instilled into the Princess a dislike and bad opinion of Conroy, and the evidence of these sentiments, which probably escaped neither the Ducliess nor him, may have influenced their conduct towards her, for, strunge as it is, there is good reason to believe that she thinks she has been all used by both of them for some years past. Her manner to the Duchess is, however, irreprovehable, and they appear to be on cordial and affectionate terms. Madame de Lehzen is the only person who is constantly with her any of the Ministers come to see her, the Baroness retires at one door as they enter the other, and the audience over, she returns to the Queen It has been remarked that when applications are made to Her Majesty, she seldom or never gives an inniediate answer, but says she will consider of it, and it is supposed that she does this · because she consults Melbourne about everything, and waits to have her answer suggested by him. He says, however, that such is her habit even with him, and that when he talks to her upon any subject upon which an opinion is expected from her, she tells him she will think it over, and let him know her sentiments the next day

The dry she went down to visit the Queen Dowager at Windsor, to Melbourne's great surprise she said to him that as the flag on the Round Tower was half mast high, and they might perhaps think it necessary to elevate it upon her arrival, it would be better to send orders beforehand not to do so He had never thought of the flag, or knew anything about it, but it showed her knowledge of forms and her attention to trifles manner to Queen Adelaide was extremely kind and affectionate, and they were both greatly affected at meeting The Queen Downger said to her that the only favour she had to ask of her was to provide for the retire ment, with their pensions, of the personal attendants of the late King, Whiting and Bachelor, who had lil ewise been the attendants of George IV, to which she replied that it should be attended to, but she could not give any promise on the subject.

She is upon terms of the greatest cordulity with Lord Melbourne, and very naturally. Everything is/new and delightful to her. She is surrounded with the most exciting and interesting enjoyments. her occupations, her pleasures, her business, her Court, all present an unceasing round of gratifications. With all her prudence and discretion she has great animal spirits, and enters into the magnificent novelties of her position with the zest and curiosity of a child.

Macaulay's Conversation.

January 21st -I dined with Lady Holland yesterday Everything there is exactly the same as it used to be, excepting only the person of Lord Holland, who seems to he pretty well forgotten The same talk went merrily round, the laugh rang loudly and frequently, and, but for the black and the mob cap of the lady, one might have fancied he had never lived or had died half a century Such are, however, affections and friendships, and such is the world. Macaulay dined there, and I never was more struck than upon this occasion by the ia exhaustible variety and extent of his information. He is not so agreeable as such powers and resources ought to make any man, because the vessel out of which it is all poured forth is so ungraceful and uncouth, his voice unmusical and monotonous, his face not merely incx pressive but positively heavy and dull, no fire in his eye, no intelligence playing round his mouth, nothing which bespeaks the genius and learning stored within, and which burst out with such extraordinary force It is impossible to mention any book in any language with which he is not familiar, to touch upon any subject, whether relating to persons or things, on which he does not know every thing that is to be known. And if he could tread less heavily on the ground, if he could touch the subjects he handles with a lighter hand, if he knew when to stop as well as he knows what to say, his talk would be as attractive as it is wonderful. What Henry Taylor said of him is epigrammatic and true, 'that his memory has swamped his mind,' and though I do not think, as some people say, that his own opinions are completely suppressed by the load of his learning so that you know nothing of his mind, it appears to me true that there is less of originality in him, less exhibition of his own character, than there probably would be if he was less abundantly stored with the riches of the minds We had yesterday a party well composed for of others talk, for there were listeners of intelligence, and a good specimen of the sort of society of this house—Macaulay, Melbourne, Morpeth, Duncannon, Baron Rolfe, Allen and Lady Holland, and John Russell came in the evening I wish that a shorthand writer could have been there to take down all the conversation, or that I could have carried it away in my head, because it was curious in itself, and curiously illustrative of the characters of the Before dinner some mention was made of performers the portruits of the Speakers in the Speaker's House, and I asked how far they went back Macaulay said he was not sure, but certainly as far as Sir Thomas More. 'Sir Thomas More?' said Lady Holland 'I did not know he had been Speaker' 'Oh, yes,' said Macaulay, 'don't you remember when Cardinal Wolsey came down to the House of Commons and More was in the chair?' and , then he told the whole of that well known transaction, and all More lind said. At dinner, amongst a variety of persons and subjects, principally ecclesiastical, which were discussed-for Melbourne loves all sorts of theo logical talk-we got upon India and Indian men of eminence, proceeding from Gleig's Life of Warren Hastings, which Macaulay said was the worst book that ever was written, and then the name of Sir Thomas Munro came uppermost. Lady Holland did not know why Sir Thomas Munro was so distinguished, when Macaulay explained all that he had ever said, done. written, or thought, and vindicated his claim to the title of a great man, till Lady Holland got bored with Sir Thomas, told Macaulay she had had enough of him, and would have no more. This would have dashed and silenced an ordinary talker, but to Macaulay it was no more than replacing a book on its shelf, and he was as ready as ever to open on any other topic. It would be impossible to follow and describe the various mazes of conversation, all of which he threaded with an ease that was always astonishing and instructive, and generally interesting and amusing. When we went upstairs we got upon the Fathers of the Church Allen asked Macaulay if he had read much of the Fathers He said, not a great deal He had read Chrysostom when he was in India, that is, he had turned over the leaves and for a Tew months had read him for two or three hours every morning before breakfast, and he had read some of Athanasius. 'I remember a sermon,' he said, 'of Chry sostom's in praise of the Bishop of Antioch,' and then he proceeded to give us the substance of this sermon till Lady Holland got tired of the Fathers, again put her extinguisher on Chrysostom as she had done on Munro, and with a sort of dension, and as if to have the pleasure of puzzling Macaulay, she turned to him and said, 'Pray, Macaulay, what was the origin of a doll? When were dolls first mentioned in history?' Macaulty was, how ever, just as much up to the dolls as he was to the l'athers, and instantly replied that the Roman children lind their dolls, which they offered up to Venus when they grew older, and quoted Persius for 'Veneri donatæ a virgine puppre,' and I have not the least doubt, if he had been allowed to proceed, he would have told us who was the Chenevix of ancient Rome, and the name of the first baby that ever handled a doll

The conversation then ran upon Milman's History of Christianity, which Melbourne praised, the religious opinions of Locke, of Milman himself, the opinion of the world thereupon, and so on to Strauss's book and his mythical system, and what he meant by mythical Macaulay began illustrating and explaining the meaning of a myth by examples from remote antiquity, when I observed that in order to explain the meaning of 'mythical' it was not necessary to go so far back, that, for instance, we might take the case of Wm. Huntington, that the account of his life was historical, but the story of his praying to God for a new pair of leather breeches and finding them under a hedge was mythical Now, I had just a general superficial recollection of this story in Huntington's Life, but my farthing rushlight was instantly extinguished by the blaze of Macaulay's all grasping and all retaining memory, for he at once came in with the whole minute account of this trans action how Huntington bad prayed, what he had found, and where, and all he had said to the tailor by whom this miraculous nether garment was made.

Sir Thomas Munro soldier and K.C.B was Governor of Madras from 1819 to his death in 1827 William Huntington S.S. (i.e. 'Sinner Saved') from tramp and coalheaver became an eccentric preacher and prophet of rather duhous ways, who published some twenty volumes of sermons, epistles, and controversial tracts, often largely cuttobiographical and recording many divine interpositions on his own behalf

Sir John Gardner Wilkinson (1797-1875) took a prominent part in the study of Egyptian antiquities Son of the rector of Hardendale in Westmorland, he studied at Exeter College, Oxford. In 1821 he went to Egypt, practically made (1821-33) a survey of the country, and brought back large collections of inscriptions and objects of great archeological value. In 1828 he published Materia Hieroglyphica, and in 1830-35 two works on the topography of Thebes But his great work is his Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians (6 vols 1837-41, new ed by Buch, 1879, abridged ed 1854) About nine hundred woodcuts illustrate this history, taken chiefly from the paintings in the Egyptian tombs, the earliest elaborate illustrations of the manners and customs of any nation Wilkinson gathered together and systematised a vast mass of information drawn from ancient writers and the researches of the new school of Egyptologists, he corrected and expanded the work of his predecessors, and brought to light many new facts And the literary gift with which he expounded the whole subject and made it accessible and attractive to a wide circle of readers gives him an eminent and permanent place in an international series which includes Erman, Brugsch, Maspero, and Flinders Petrie. He insisted, as was natural, that 'the influence which Egypt had in early times on Greece gives to every inquiry respecting it an additional interest. and the frequent mention of the Egyptians in the Bible connects them with the Hebrew records, of which many satisfactory illustrations occur in the sculptures of Pharaonic times' Knighted in 1839, he made four subsequent visits to Egypt, travelled in Dalmatia, Sicily, Turkey, and Syria, wrote books on Dalmatia and Egyptian architecture and . a guide-book to Egypt, and helped Rawlinson with the Egyptian part of his Herodotus

An Ancient Egyptian Repast.

While the guests were entertained with music and the dance, dinner was prepared, but as it consisted of a considerable number of dishes, and the meat was killed for the occasion, as at the present day in Eastern and tropical climates, some time elapsed before it was put upon the table An ox, kid, wild goat, gazelle, or an oryx, and a quantity of geese, ducks, teal, quails, and other birds, were generally selected, but mutton was excluded from a Theban table. Sheep were not killed for the altar or the table, but they abounded in Egypt, and even at Thebes, and large flocks were kept for their wool, particularly in the neighbourhood of Memphis. Sometimes a flock consisted of more than two thousand, and in a tomb below the Pyrimids, dating upwards of four thousand years ago, nine hundred and seventy four rams are brought to be registered by his seribes, as part of the stock of the deceased, implying an equal number of ewes, independent of lambs

Beef and goose constituted the principal part of the animal food throughout Egypt, and by a prudent fore sight in a country possessing neither extensive pasture lands nor great abundance of cattle, the cow was held sacred, and consequently forbidden to be eaten. Thus the risk of exhausting the stock was prevented, and neconstant supply of oven was kept for the table, and for agricultural purposes. A similar fear of diminishing the number of sheep, so valuable for their wool, led to a preference for such ments as beef and goose, though they were much less light and wholesome than mutton.

A considerable quantity of ment was served up at those repasts, to which strangers were invited, as among people of the Last at the present day. An endless succession of vegetables was also required on all occasions, and when during in private, dishes composed ehicfly of them were in greater request than joints even at the tables of the rich, and consequently the Israelites, who, by their long residence there, had acquired similar habits, regretted them equally with the meat and fish of Egypt (Num xi 4, 5)

Their mode of dining was very similar to that now adopted in Cairo and throughout the Last, each person sitting round a table, and dipping his bread into a dish placed in the centre, removed on a sign and by the host, and succeeded by others, whose rotation depends on established rule, and whose number is predetermined according to the size of the party or the quality of the guests.

As is the custom in Tgypt and other hot climates at the present day, they cooked the meat at soon as killed, with the same view of having it tender which inakes. Northern people I cep it until decomposition is Ingin ming, and this explains the order of Joseph to 'sky and make ready' for his brethren to dine with him the same day at noon. As soon, therefore, as this had been done and the joints were all ready, the latchen presented an animated scene, and the cooks were busy in their different departments. Other servants tool charge of the pastry which the bakers or confectioners had made for the dinner table, and this department appears even more varied than that of the cook.

That dinner was served up at midday may be inferred from the invitation given by Joseph to his brethren, but it is probable that, like the Romans, they also ate supper in the evening, as is still the custom in the last The table was much the same as that of the present day in Lgypt-a small stool supporting a round tray, on which the dishes are placed, but it differed from this in having its circular summit fixed on a pillar, or leg-which was often in the form of a man, generally a captive, who supported the slab upon his head, the whole being of stone or some lined wood On this the dishes vere placed, together with loaves of bread. It was not gene rally covered with any linen, but, like the Greel table. was washed with a sponge or naphin after the dishewere removed One or two guests generally sat at a table, though, from the mention of persons scated in rous according to runk, it has been supposed the fables were occasionally of a long shape, as may have been the case when the brethren of Joseph 'sat before him, the first born according to his youth'-Jos ph citing alone at another table where 'they set on for him by himself' But even if round, they might still sit according to rank, one place being always the post of honour, even at the present day, at the round table of Tgypt

The guests sat on the ground, or on stools and chairs, and, having neither knives and forks nor any substitute for them answering to the chopsticks of the Chinese, they are with their fingers, like the modern Asiatics, and invariably with the right hand, nor did the Jews

After the term we are I singing vere resurred, hard men and women displayed feats of apility. The most sind genes within door were old and even, more and drought. The game of more was common in when a well as modern times, and was played by two persons, who each simultaneously three out the fracts of one land, while one party guessed the sum of both. There were said in Latin mulice display, and this game will so common among the lover order of Italians, existed about four thousand yours ago in the reigns of the Ost tase.

Richard Ford (1795-1858), who has the credit of making a practical guide book as lively and literary as a book of trivels, was the son of a Sussex M.P., he passed from Winchester to Irinity College, Oxford, and was called to the Bar, but never practised. He spent 1830-34 in riding tours in Spain, and in 1845 appared his delightful Hardbook for Travillers in Spui His Gatherings from $7 m (1846), is mainly made up of matter crowded out of the second edition of the Handbook the first having been found rather But the two divisions nere too encyclopredic. again combined in 1855, not without abridgment Ford wrote largely for the Quarterly, the Ediburgh, and the other reviews. His famous article on Velazquez in the Penry Encyclopædia did more than any other thing to make the great Spanish artist known to Englishmen, and he followed up this by many articles on other Spanish artists and on Spanish art and architecture. He was himself an accomplished artist and picture-lover

Buden Powell (1796-1860), born in London, studied at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1621 became vicar of Plumstead, in 1824 FRS, and in 1627 Savilan Professor of Geometry at Oxford He published a history of natural philosophy, treatises on the calculus, optics, and the undulatory theory of light, but was best known by his 'Evidences of Christianity' in Lisuys and Recovery, and by other theological works then thought dan gerously 'liberal'—On the Plurality of Horlds (1856), Christianity viathout Judaism (1857), Natural and Divine Truth (1857), and The Order of Nature (1859). The famous soldier, the defender of Mifching, was one of his sons.

George Robert Gleig (1796-1888) was the son of the Bishop of Brechin, but was born at Stirling. Having entered the army, he served in Spain and in America. He took orders in 1820, and became chaplain general of the army (1844) and inspector general of military schools (1846). The Subaltern (1825), founded on incidents of the Peninsular war, is the best known of his many novels, besides, he wrote several volumes of military history and biography, including narratives of the campaigns of New Orieans and Waterloo, a Life of Wellington, and a Life of Warren Hastings, which Macaulix pronounced (in superlatives, see above on page 320) the worst book that ever was written?

Alarie Alexander Watts (1797-1864), a Londoner born, was an usher at Fulliam and elsewhere, and a conspicuous editor at Leeds and Manchester, he contributed to many periodicals, and founded the United Service Gazette (1833), and mide a hit by his annual, the Literary Souvenir (1824-37), the prototype of innumerable annuals and pocket books, which collapsed finally owing to with but libellous critiques by Maginn Later he (unsuccessfully) tried to float various Conservative newspapers, and was ruined financially, where upon he accepted a small post in the inland revenue office, and alimitely enjoyed a civil list pension. One piece alone in his several volumes of poetry (collected as Lyrus of the Heart in 1850) is universally remembered—the illiterative jen alestral, An Austrian army infully arrayed, &c. He wrote some miscellineous prose also In 1856 he educed the first issue of Men of the Time There is a life by his son (1544)

John Moulti le (1707-1874), a minor poet in youth associated with Pried, Maciulas, and others in the I tarian and Kingit's Quarterh Magiciae was born in London of Sco o American ances in, from Lion passed to Trinits College Cambridge and was rected of Rughs from 1828. An edition of his poems appeared in 1876, with a Memoir hy Derwent Colendae. His son Gerald (1829-85), for some time master of Shrey shiry School, we calso several collections of hymns and devotional poems.

My Brother's Grave

Beneath the chancel's hallowed stone,

Lxp seed to every rustic tread.

To few save rustic mourners I nown.

My brother, is thy lowly bed.

I ew word upon the rough stone graven,

Thy name, thy birth thy youth declare.

Thy innocence, thy hopes of beaven,

In simplest phrase recorded there.

No 'scutcheous shine, no hanners wave,

In mockery o er my brother's grave.

The place is silem—rarely sound Is heard tho e ancient walls around, Nor murthful voice of friends that meet, Discoursing in the public street. Alexander Dyce (1798-1869), critic, born at Edinburgh, was educated at the High School there, graduated from Exeter College, Oxford, and took orders, but in 1825 settled in London as a man of letters. With rare learning and sagacity he edited Peele (1828-39), Webster (1830, new ed 1857), Greene (1831), Shirley (1833), Middleton (1840), Beaumont and Fletcher (1843-46), Marlowe (1850, new ed 1861), Shakespeare (1857, new ed 1864-67), &c., besides writing Recollections of the Table talk of Samuel Rogers (1856)

Waly Martha Sherwood (1775-1851), daughter of Dr Butt, chaplain to George III, was born at Stanford, Worcestershire, was carefully trained at the Abbey School in Reading, and before she was twenty-three had got fifty pounds for two stories (published 1798) In 1803 she married her cousin, Captain Henry Sherwood, and sailed for India, where they spent some twenty years, keenly interested in mission work and charities And there she wrote Little Henry and his Bearer, like all her work strongly didactic and earnestly evangelical, which nevertheless had a success comparable to Uncle Toni's Cabin, passed through a hundred editions, and was translated into all manner of tongues, European and Asiatic. Their last years husband and wife spent in England, studying Hebrew with a view to writing concordances

The Nun and The Lady and Bible dictionaries of the Manor were amongst Mrs Sherwood's longer tales-professedly religious and moral novels, but at times closely resembling sermons Better re membered is The Little Woodman, The Fairchild Family (Part I 1818), described on its title page as 'The Child's Manual, being a collection of stories calculated to show the importance and effects of a religious education,' had a second part added in 1842, a third in 1847, and, spite of its somewhat formidable sub title, was frequently re printed down to the end of the century, and again The Indian Pilgrim, reprinted in the ın 1902 twentieth century, like several of Mrs Sherwood's works (in all, including tracts, nearly a hundred in number), was a sort of Indian adaptation of the Pilgrim's Progress There is a Life of her by her daughter, Mrs Kelly (1854)

Louisa Stuart Costello (1799-1877), daugh ter of an Irish army captain born in the barony of Costello, County Mayo, went with her widowed mother to Paris in 1814, and there and subsequently in London defrijed the family expenses by her skilful work as a mininture-painter From time to time she published collections of poems, the first, in 1815, being The Maid of the Cyprus Isle, and other Poems In 1835, with the help of her brother Dudley (1803-65), a journalist, she published Speci mens of the Early Poetry of France But it was her bright descriptions of travel in Auvergne, Béarn and the Pyrenees, North Wales, Venice, and the Tyrol that made her really popular Her half dozen semi-historical novels on Catherine de' Medici, Mary of Burgundy, and Anne of Brittany were much read in their day In 1852 she had a civil list pension bestowed on her

Sir Henry Taylor (1800-86) was the son of a gentleman farmer of unusual culture at Bishop Middleham in Durham At fourteen he went to sea as midshipman, rejoiced to obtain his discharge after nine miserable months, and two years later obtained a clerkship in the Storckeeper General's After four years' service, including Department a few months in Barbadoes, he lost his post in consequence of some official rearrangements, and returned to his father's house, Witton Hall, to spend two years of uninterrupted quiet and study He began to write for the Quarterly, and in 1823 settled in London, having been appointed through Sir Henry Holland's influence to a clerkship in the Golonial Office. Here he laboured for fortyeight years under as many as twenty six Secreta ries of State, retiring only in 1872. He declined in 1847 the post of permanent under-secretary in succession to Sir James Stephen, and in 1869 was made KCMG His services to the republic of letters Oxford had in 1862 recognised by giving him a D C L His last days were spent at Bourne mouth, and there he ended a long and happy life.

Taylor wrote four tragedies in 'the Shakespearian manner' Isaac Comnenus (1827), Philip van

Artevelde (1834-an immediate success), Edwin the Fair (1842), and St Clement's Eve (1862), and one romantic comedy, The Virgin Widow, afterwards renamed A Sicilian Summer In 1845 he published a small volume of lyrical poetry, and in 1847 The Eve of the Conquest, and other Poems His work in prose embraced The Statesman (1836), a collection of Baconian discourses on official life and the methods of managing men, for which, as he himself said, 'Pragmatic Precepts' would have been a better title, Notes from Life (1847)-one of its essays, 'The Life Poetic,' mainly a eulogy of Southey, and Notes from Books (1849), half made up of tvo articles on Wordsworth Last came, in 1885, his interesting Autobiography, admirably written, full of genial observation, and not marred by the pardonable egotism of age, experience, and universal popularity

Southey said Taylor was the only one of a generation younger than his own that he had taken into his heart of hearts. He was a magnificentlooking man, a most perfect and kindly gentleman, and every way a man of distinction, said Lord Coleridge, who, however, lamented that if Taylor 'gave you a thought or a memory worth having, it was in a prodigious number of words, not poured out but dropped down deliberately one by one' This has some relevance also to a good deal of his literary work Professor Palgrave, commenting on the plays, said 'There is so much in them that one wonders all the time what one thing is wanting' A comparison with Joanna Baillie's plays was more than once suggested. Of the Statesman, dealing, as Taylor put it, with such topics as experience rather than inventive meditation had suggested to him, Maginn profanely (and unfairly) said it was 'the art of official humbug systematically digested and familiarly explained? Taylor's name is most closely associated with his Philip van Artevelde, a play in two parts, which he himself spoke of as a historical romance cast in a dramatic and rhythmical form. The subject -the story of the two Van Arteveldes, father and son, 'citizens of revolted Ghent, each of whom swayed for a season almost the whole power of Flanders against their legitimate prince, and each of whom paid the penalty of ambition by an untimely and violent death'-was suggested by Southey The first extract deals with the death of one of the captains of Ghent.

The Death of Launoy

Second Dean Beside Nivelle the Earl and Launoy met, Six thousand voices shouted with the last [Blanes!' 'Ghent, the good town! Ghent and the Chaperons But from that force thrice told there came the cry Of 'Flanders, with the Lion of the Bastard' 'So then the battle joined, and they of Ghent Gave back and opened after three hours' fight, And liardly flying laid they gained Nivelle, When the earl's vanguard came upon their rear Ere they could close the gate, and entered with them Then all were sluin save Launoy and lus guard,

Who, barricaded in the minister tower,

Made desperate resistance, whereupon

The earl waxed wrothful, and bide fire the church

First Burgher Say'st thou? Oh, sacrilege accursed!

Was't done?

Second Dean 'Twas done—and presently was heard And after that the rushing of the flames! [a yell, Then Launoy from the steeple cried aloud 'A runsom!' and held up his cont to sight With florins filled, but they without but laughed And mocked him, saying, 'Come amongst us, John, And we will give thee welcome, make a leap—Come out at window, John' With that the flames Rose up and reached him, and he drew his sword, Cast his rich coat behind him in the fire,

And shouting, 'Ghent, ye slaves!' leapt freely forth, When they below received him on their spears. And so died John of Launoy

First Burgher A brave end
'Tis certain we must now make peace by times,
The city will be starved else.—Will be, said I?
Starvation is upon us

Starvation is upon us

Van Artevelde I never looked that he should hive so He was a man of that unsleeping spirit, [long He seemed to live by mirrele his food Was glory, which was poison to his mind And peril to his body. He was one Of many thousand such that die betimes, Whose story is a frigment, known to few. Then comes the man who has the luck to live, And he's a prodigy. Compute the chances, And deem there is ne'er a one in dangerous times, Who wins the race of glory, but than him A thousand men more gloriously endowed.

Have fallen upon the course, a thousand others Have had their fortunes foundered by a chance, Whilst lighter barks pushed past them, to whom add A smaller tally, of the singular few, Who, gifted with predominating powers, Bear yet a temperate will, and keep the peace. The world knows nothing of its greatest men

Father John Had Launov lived, he might have passed But not by conquests in the Franc of Bruges [for great, The sphere—the scale of circumstance—is all Which makes the wonder of the many Still An ardent soul was Launoy's, and his deeds Were such as dazzled many a Flemish dame. There 'll some bright eyes in Ghent be dimmed for him

Van Artevelde They will be dim, and then be bright All is in busy, stirring, storiny motion, [again And many a cloud drifts by, and none sojourns Lightly is life laid down amongst us now, And lightly is death mourned a dusk star blinks As fleets the rack, but look again, and lo! In a wide solitude of wintry sky Twinkles the reilluminated star, And all is out of sight that sinirched the ray We have no time to inourn

He that hels time to mourn lacks time to mend
Literally mourns that 'Tis an ill cure
For life's worst ills, to have no time to feel them
Where sorrow's held intrusive and tirned out,
There wisdom will not enter, nor true power,
Nor aught that dignifies liumanity
Yet such the barrenness of busy life!
I rom shelf to shelf Ambition elambers up,
To reach the maked'st pinnack of all,
Whilst Magnanimity, absolved from toil,
Reposes self included at the base
But this thou know'st (From Philip van Artevelde, Part I)

The Lay of Elena

A bark is hunched on Como's lake,
A maiden sits about,
A little sail is loosed to take
The night wind's breath, and waft
The maiden and her bark away,
Across the lafe and up the bay
And what doth there that lady fair
Upon the wavelet tossed?
Before her shines the evening star,

Behind her in the woods afar The eastle lights are lost

It was not for the forms—though fair,
Though grand they were beyond compare—
It was not only for the forms
Of hills in sunshine or in storms,
Or only unrestrained to look
On wood and lake, that she forsook
By day or night

Her home, and far
Wandered by light
Of sun or star
It was to feel her fancy free,
Free in a world without an end,
With ears to hear, and eyes to see,
And heart to apprehend
It was to leave the earth behind,
And rove with liberated mind,

As fancy led, or choice or chance, Through wildered regions of romance

Be it arowed, when all is said, She trod the path the many tread She loved too soon in life, her dawn Was bright with sunbeams, whence is drawn A sure prognostic that the day Will not unclouded pass away Too young she loved, and he on whom Her first love lighted, in the bloom Of boyhood was, and so was graced With all that earliest runs to waste Intelligent, loquicious, mild, Let gay and sportive as a child, With feelings light and quick, that came And went like flickerings of flaine, A soft demeanour, and a mind Bright and abundant in its kind, I hat, playing on the surface, made A rapid change of light and shade, Or, if a darker hour perforce At times o'ertook him in his course, Still, sparkling thick like glow worms, showed Life was to him a summer's road-Such was the youth to whom a love For grace and beauty far above Their due descrits betrayed a heart Which might have else performed a prouder part

First love the world is wont to call The passion which was now her all So be it called, but be it known The feeling which possessed her now Was novel in degree alone, Love early marked her for his own, Soon as the winds of here en had blown Upon her, had the seed been sown In soil which needed not the plough, And passion with her growth had grown, And strengthened with her strength, and how Could love be new, unless in name, Degree, and singleness of aim? A tenderness had filled her mind Pervisive, viewless, undefined, As keeps the subtle fluid oft In secret, gathering in the soft And sultry air, till felt at length, In all its desoluting strength-So silent, so devoid of dread, Her objectless affections spread, Not wholly unemployed, but squandered At large where'er her fancy wandered-Till one attraction, one desire Concentred all the scattered fire, It broke, it burst, it bluzed amain, It flashed its light o'er hill and plain, O'er earth below and heaven above-And then it took the name of love. (From Philip van Artevelde, Put 1)

A collected edition of Taylor's works appeared in five volumes in 1878. The Autoliography (2 vols. 1885) contains a fine series of pen portraits of such contemporaries as Wordsworth Southey Scott, Sydney Smith, Mill Sir James Stephen, Spedding, Carlyle Tennyson, and Aubrey de Vere. It was supplemented by his only less delight ful Correspondence (1888) a selection of two hundred and two letters edited by Professor Dowden, including also letters to Taylor from Wordsworth, Southey Stephen, Mrs Norton, Macaulay, Spedding Tenryson, Aubrey de Vere, Gladstone, Dr John Brown, and Swinburne.

Leitch Ritchie (1800-65) came from Greenock to a Glasgow merchant's office, and at eighteen began writing for the magazines By 1820 he had furly begun in London his literary life as a diligent compiler, editor, and author, writing books of travel, editing a library of romance, preparing the text for books of pictures (such as Turner's Liber Fluviorum), and contributing to innumer-In his later years he edited able magazines Chambers's fournal and did other work for its Of his original novels the most im publishers portant were Schinderhannes, The Robber of the Rhine, The Magician, and Weary foot Common

Edward William Lane (1801-76), Arabic scholar, the son of a clergyman in Hereford, began life as an engraver, but delicate health took him to Egypt, and he became one of the most accomplished Orientalists of his time, who did probably more than any contemporary to interest Britain and Europe in the Arabic and Moslem The result of his first (1825-28) and second (1833-35) visits to Egypt was his Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians (1836, 5th ed 1871, reprints in 1890, 1894, &c), still a standard This was followed by the annotated authority translation of the Thousand and One Nights (1838-40), really the first accurate rendering, and by Selections from the Koran (1843) Land's third visit to Egypt (1842-49) was devoted to laborious preparation for the great work of his life, the Arabic Lericon (5 vols 1863-74), completed (1876-90) by his grand-nephew, Professor Stanley Lane Poole, who also wrote his Life (1877)

Abraham Hayward (1802-84), of an old Wiltshire house, was articled to a country lawyer, but entered lumself at the Inner Temple in 1824, and was called to the Bar in 1832 He founded and edited the Law Magazine, and was made a QC in 1845 In 1833 he published his prose translation of the first part of Faust, and soon became a busy contributor to the newspapers and magazines, especially the Quarterly His tongue was sharp, his temper was not improved by his missing the professional success he aimed at, and his later years were devoted to literature and social relay itions He was rather a marvellously well informed man and an admirable teller of anecdotes than a brilliant talker, but his stories and good sayings, his whist-playing, and his genial and artistic interest in 'the art of dining' delighted society almost down to his death. Many of his best articles were reprinted in his Biographical and Urifical Essays (1858-73) and Emment Statesmen and Writers (1880) Other books, besides many legal ones, were on whist, on Junius, and on Goethe, Lives of George Schwin and Lord Chesterfield, an edition of Mrs Piozzi's autobiography letters, and literary remains, an edition of The Diaries of a Lady of Quality, and his famous Art of Dir ing His Selected Lissay's appeared in 1878, his Select Correspondence in 1886

George Payne Rainsford James (1801-60), the son of a well known London physician, was educated at Putney and in France, and by seventeen had written some Eastern tales which found favour with Washington Irving He soon there after began to write romances, and became one of the most prolific and popular novelists of the period, in all he produced something like a hundred novels and other works, and many of the romances, mostly of historical type and after the style of Scott, have been frequently reprinted He was British consul at Richmond, Virginia, from 1852 till 1856, and then at Venice until his death 'G P R James's' best stories were among the earliest—Richelien (1829) and Henry Masterton (1832) Among the others may be mentioned, Philip Augustus (1831), Mary of Burgunay (1833), Darnles (1833), The Man at-Arms (1840), Const de Léon (1841), Agincourt (1844), The Smugglers (1845) A few poems from his pen are of no importance. He also undertook a good deal of historical work, and published a Life of the Black Prince (1836), Lives of Eminent Foreign Statesmen (1838-40), Life and Times of Loms XIV (1838), and Dark Scenes of History William IV appointed him historiographer royal, and he produced a History of the United States Boundary Question (1839), a disquisition on the Corn Laws (1841), and several other works bearing on political questions. Though his specifically hterary talent was not great and his style was melodramatic and grandiloquent, he had an indisputable ficulty for ready and picturesque writing, and of so employing historical incidents as to make his romances eminently attractive, especially to young people. He may be classed as a hibrida productive hybrid-between Dumas and Mrs Ann Radeliffe Leigh Hunt writes kindly of him, and Sir Archibald Alison could 'revert with pleasure to his varied compositions,' which even yet may be safely recommended to the 'young person' But the 'two horsemen' who so frequently opened his novels will be remembered best, if not indeed solely, by Thickerry's parody, Barbazure

An Opening

On the morning of the 24th day of March 1520 a triveller was seen riding in the small rugged cross road which, traversing the eastern part of Kent, formed the immediate communication between Wye and Canter The rider was a man of about five or six and twenty, perhaps not so old, but the hardy, exposed life which had dyed his florid cheel with a tinge of deep brown lind given also to his figure that look of set, mature strength which is not usually concomitant with vouth. But strength with him had nothing of ungrace. fulness, for the very vigour of his limbs give them ease of motion. Yet there was something more in his aspect and in his carriage than can rightly be attributed to the grace induced by habits of martial exercise, or to the dignity derived from consciousness of skill or valour there vas that sort of innate nobility of look which we are often weakly inclined to combine in our minds with nobility of station, and that peculiar sort of grace which is a gift not an acquirement In those days, when, as old

Holinshed assures us, it was not safe to ride unarmed, even upon the most frequented road, a small bridle path, such as that which the traveller pursued, was not likely to afford much greater security However, he did not appear to have furnished himself with more than the complement of offensive arms usually worn by every one above the rank of a simple yeoman-namely, the long straight double edged sword, which, thrust through a broad buff belt, hung perpendicularly down his thigh, with the hilt shiped in form of a cross, without any further guard for the hand, while in the girdle appeared a small dagger, which served also as a knife added to these was a dag or pistol, which, though small, consider ing the dimensions of the arms then used, would have caused any horse pistol of the present day to blush at its own insignificance. In point of defensive armour he carried none, except a steel cap, which lining at his saddle bow, while its place on his head was supplied by a Genoa bonnet of black velvet, round which his rich eliestnut hair eurled in thick profusion different, however, were his mental sensations, if one might believe the knitted look of thought that sat upon his full broad brow, and the lines that early care seemed to have busily traced upon the check of youth meditation, at all events, was the companion of his way, for, confident in the surefootedness of his steed, he took no care to hold his bridle in hand, but suffered himself to he borne forward almost unconsciously, fixing his gaze upon the line of light that liung above the edge of the hill before him, as if there he spied some object of deep interest, yet, at the same time, with that fixed intensity which told that, whilst the eye thus occupied itself, the mind was far otherwise employed (From Darnley )

A Mêlée

In an instant Sir Osborne's visor was down, his spear was in the rest, and his horse in full gallop 'Darnley!' Darnley!' shouted he, with a voice that made the welkin ring 'Darnley to the rescue! Traitor of Shoenvelt, turn to your death!'

'Darnley! Darnley!' shouted Longpole, following

'St George for Darnley ! Down with the trutors !'

The shout was not lost upon either Shoenvelt or the traveller. The one instantly turned, with several of his men, to attack the knight, the other, seeing unexpected aid at hand, fell back towards Darnley, and with admir able skill and courage, defended himself with nothing but his sword against the lances of the marauders, who—their object being more to take him living than to kill him—lost the advantage which they would have otherwise had by his want of armour

Like a wild beast, raging with hatred and fury, Shoen velt charged towards the knight, his lance quivering in his hand with the angry force of his grasp. On, on, bore Sir Osborne at full speed towards him, his bridle in his left hand, his shield upon his breast, his lance firmly fixed in the rest, and levelled in such manner as to avoid its breaking. In a moment they met. Shoenvelt's spear struck Sir Osborne's shield, and, umed firmly and well, partially traversed the iron, but the knight, throwing back his left arm with vast force, snapped the head of the lance in twain. In the meanwhile his own spear, charged at the marauder's throat with unerring exactness, passed clean through the gorget piece and the upper rim of the corslet, and came bloody out at the back. You might have heard the iron plates and hones eranch as the lance rent its way through. Down went Shoenvelt, horse and man horne over by the force of the knight's course, 'Darnley, Darnley!' shouted Sir Oshorne, casting from him the spear which he could not disengage from the marauder's neck, and drawing his sword. 'Darnley, Darnley! to the rescue! Now, Wilsten, now!' And turning, he galloped up to where the traveller, with Longpole and Frederick by his side, firinly maintained his ground against the adventurers. (From Darnley)

Douglas Jerrold (in full, Douglas William Jerrold, 1803-57) was a Londoner born, youngest son of an actor who was from 1807 lessee of the theatre at Sheerness Even as a child he began to manifest a voracious appetite for books, in 1809 he was at school in Sheerness, in 1813 he went on board the Namus guardship as a mid shipman, not a little proud of his uniform. At the close of the war his ship was paid off, and in 1816, settled with the rest of the family in London, the eager book loving boy started life anew as a printer's apprentice. He was diligent in business, but seized every moment of his leisure time for self instruction In 1819, a compositor on the Sunday Monitor, he had been to see Der Freischutz, and, having written a criticism on it, dropped it into his employer's letter-box. Next morning he had his own copy handed to him to set up, with an editorial note to the anonymous correspondent requesting further contributions. Jerrold was not yet fairly launched on literature. His capacity for study was enormous, and his perseverance indefatigable, night and morning he worked at Latin, French, and Italian, besides getting through a vast amount of English reading, and erelong he was dramatic critic, as well as compositor, on the Monitor Before his marriage in 1824 he had made a start as a dramatist, four of his pieces had been produced, the first of which, More Frightened than Hurt (written when its author was about fifteen), came out in 1821. In 1825 he was engaged at a weekly salary to write dramas, farces, and other 'entertainments' for the Coburg Theatre. Four years later he was engaged at five pounds a week in a like capacity at the Surrey Theatre, where in 1829 Black eyed Susan was acted for the first From this date up to 1854, when The Heart of Gold came out at the Princess's Theatre, a long series of plays (including Bubbles of the Day, 1841, and Retired from Business, 1851) was produced, every one of them characterised by Jerrold's sprightly style and sparkling dialogue His contributions to periodical literature begun soon after he commenced life in London, with occasional verses and sketches in the various magazines of the day, as his position became more assured he contributed to the Monthly, the New Monthly, the Athenaum, Blackwood, and To Punch he was a constant other periodicals and important contributor from its second number in 1841 up to the time of his death and 1848 he edited one after another two magazines and a weekly paper of his own, and in these and in Punch much of his best work appeared politics a Liberal, in 1852 he accepted the editorship of Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper, 'he found it in the street, and annexed it to literature.' For his peculiar kind of wit, for his 'flashing insight,' Jerrold stands alone The conversations in his novels are perhaps too witty, too much like dramatic dialogue. The incidents and characters in his plays are well managed and arranged for dramatic effect, but lack breadth and simplicity In social conversation Jerrold was brilliant and unique, and from keen sarcasm could pass lightly to touching pathos As a journalist he was a zealous advocate of 1eform, a passionate hater of cant, given to speaking at times unadvisedly with his pen as with his lips, and nowise infallible, but an honest m in and a generous friend. His humour was spontaneous and overflowing, if some of his fun was farther fetched, he was a genial wit rather than an intentional satirist, though it must be admitted that some of his brightest sayings seem acrid and rude, if not cruel But, as has been justly said, 'there are men who can and do say the sharpest things without wounding. The look, the manner, the twinkle in the eye, the known character of the man-these turn bitterness to merry banter in the very utterance? A collected edition of Jerrold's works, in eight volumes, was published during his lifetime, it contains his principal writings, St Giles and St James, A Man made of Money, The Story of a Feather, Cakes and Ale, Punch's Letters to his Son, Punch's Complete Letter-curiter, Chronicles of Clovernook, and the inimitably funny and enormously popular Mis Caudle's Curtain Lectures, and fewer than half of Jerrold's dramatic works. It is said that - he tired of making professional fun confessedly he would greatly have preferred to see one of his more considerable stories, or of his most successful plays, accounted his masterpiece rather than Mrs Caudle

Fancy Fair for Painting St Pauls

Sir Phenix Clearcake I come with a petition to you—a petition not purliamentary but charitable. We propose, my lord, a fancy fair in Guildhall, its object so benevolent, and more than that, so respectable

Lord Skindeep. Benevolence and respectability! Of course, I'm with you Well, the precise object?

Sir P It is to remove a stain—a very great stain—from the city, to give an air of maiden beauty to a most venerable institution, to exercise a renovating taste at a most inconsiderable outlay, to call up, as it were, the snowy beauty of Greece in the coal smoke atmosphere of London, in a word, my lord—but as yet 'tis a profound secret—it is to paint St Paul's' To give it a virgin outside—to make it so truly respectable.

Lord Skin A gigantic effort 1

Sir P The funcy fur will be on a most comprehensive and philanthropic scale. Every alderman takes a stall, and to give you an idea of the enthusiasm of the city—but this also is a secret—the Lady Mayoress has been up three nights making pincushions

Lord Skin But you don't want me to take a stall—to sell pincushions?

Sir P Certainly not, my lord And yet your phil anthropic speeches in the House, my lord, convince me that, to obtain a certain good, you would sell anything

Lord Skin Well, well, command me in any way, benevolence is my foible

(From Bubbles of the Day-a drama.)

Brilliant Speculative Companies

Captain Smoke We are about to start a company to take on lease Mount Vesuvius for the manufacture of lucifer matches

DOUGLAS WILLIAM JERROLD

From the Portrait by Sir Daniel Macnee PRSA, in the National Portrait Gallery

Sir P A stupendous speculation! I should say that, when its countless advantages are duly numbered, it will be found a certain wheel of fortune to the enlightened capitalist.

Smole Now, sir, if you would but take the chair at the first meeting—(Aside to Chatham We shall make it fill right about the shares)—if you would but speak for two or three hours on the social improvement conferred by the lucifer match, with the monopoly of sulphur secured to the company—a monopoly which will suffer no man, woman, or child to strike a light without our permission

Chatham Trnly, sir, in such a cause, to such an auditory—I fear my eloquence.

Smoke Sir, if you would speak well anywhere, there's nothing like first grinding your eloquence on a mixed meeting. Depend on't, if you can only manage a little humbug with a mob, it gives you great confidence for another place.

Lord Skin Smoke, never say humbug, it's coarse. Sir P And not respectable.

Snote Pardon me, my lord it was coar c. But the fact is, humbing has received such high patrolinge that now it's quite classic.

Chat But why not embarl his lordship in the lucifer question?

Smoke I can't. I have his lordship in three companies already. Three Pirst, there's a company—half a million capital—for extracting civet from asafo tida. The second is a company for a trip all round the world. We propose to hire a three deeler of the Lords of the Admiralty, and fit her up with every accommodation for families. We've already advertised for wet nur as and mads of all work.

Sir P. A inagmificent project. And then the fitting up vill be so respectable. A delightful billiard table in the ward room, with, for the humbler classe, skittleson the oilop deel. Swings and archery for the ladies, trap ball and crieket for the children, while the marine sportsman will find the stock of gulls unlimited. Weip pert's quadrille band is engaged, and—

Snoke For the convenience of lovers, the ship will carry a parson

Chat And the object?

Smoke Pleasure and education. At every rew country we shall drop anchor for at least a weal, that the children may go to school and learn the language. The trip must answer to ill occupy only three years, and we've forgotten nothing to male it delightful—nothing from hot rolls to coil jackets.

brown And now, sir, the third venture?

Smole That, sir is a company to Livethe Serpentine River for a Grand Junetion Temperance Centeters

Brown What ' so many waters graves?

Smoke Yes, sir, with floating tombstones. Here s the properties. I ool here surmounted by a hysemth—the very emblem of temperance—a hysemth flowering in the limped flood. Now, if you don't feel equal to the lucifers—I I now his lordship's goodne—he'll give you up the cemetery. (Aside to Chatham. A family vault as a bonus to the chairman.)

Sir P What a beautiful subject for a speech! Water likes and aquatic plants genining the tran likent crystal, shells of rainbow brightnes, a constant supply of gold and silver fish, with the right of angling sourced to shareholders. The extent of the liver being necessarily limited, will render lying there so select, so very respectable

Time's Changes,

Florentine. O sir, the magic of five long years! We punt Time with glass and scythe—should lie not carry harlequin's own v and? for, oh, indeed Time's changes!

Clarence Are they, in truth, so very great?

Flor Greater than harlequin's, but then Time works them with so grave a face that even the hearts he alters doubt the change, though often turned from very flesh to stone.

Clar Time has his bounteous changes too, and sometimes to the sweetest bud will give an unimagined beauty in the flower

Winter in London.

The streets were empty. Probe a cold may driven all who had the thiter of a roof to their home. And the north east blast seemed to look in troop places of the untrolled serow. Winter we article art of all this, whip directioned domb with exact of its right free gration, the training of a cason. However, in that desputing hour, bond its training of want, and do him that desputing hour, bond its terminal from the case of many a virted in event deliverer. It was a trace hen the very pour, betted from the commone of he is of each, the screece of mall in him to relate, and in the deep hundly of desiriting, believe they are the burden and the offslich he will.

It was a time when the easy, compared homen, touched with firest sense of our and affering pives form he about an early holds he is my faces almost the next that with the hold depress misers circled round hunds have the with the hold depress misers circled round hunds have the all things holds he have the face and the middle of viretchedness, demands to have the thousand the and starving creature in his very tendence a form it we tests his provide and eventually in free in weather that we have manhood in true, howing him down and to the brate. And so questioned, this is an increase in more threakfulness of soul. His alms are no coll, formal climates, but reverent sacrifices to his suffering profiler.

It is a time when selfishness ling it elf in its evin narmth, with no other thoughts then of its pleasant possession all mode pleasanter sweeper, by the dood tion around when the mere worlding rejoices the mole in his warm chamber, because it is so be er cold without, when he eas and drinks with whetted appetite, because he hears of destitution providing like a wolf around his well barred louse when in fine the brais his every comfort about him with the pride of a conqueror. A time when such a man sees in the major his fellow beings no ling save his own victory of forture—his own successes in a suffering world. To such a man the poor are but the tattered slaves that grice his triumph

It was a time, too, when human nature often shous its true divinity, and, with misery like a garment cling ing to it, forgets its wretchedness in sympathy with suffering. A time when, in the cellars and garre's of the poor, are neted scenes which make the nolicest heroism of life, which prove the immortal texture of the human heart not wholly seared by the branding iron of the torturing hours. A time when in want, in anguish, in threes of mortal agons, some seed is sown that bears a flower in heaven.

(From St Giles and St James, Chap. 1)

for the first thirty-five years of his life to be known as Edward Bulwer, and for twenty as Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, was born at 31 Baker Street, London, on 25th May 1803 He was the third and youngest son of General Larle Bulwer of Heydon and Dalling in Norfolk, by Elizabeth Birbara Lytton, the heiress of Knebworth in Hertfordshire. As a child a devourer of books, his favourites Amadis de Gant and the Faere Queene, he took early to rhy ming, and went to school at nine, though not, it may be unluckil, to a public one, but to six private tutors in succession (1812-21) In 1820 he Published Ismael and other Poems and about the same time 'was changed for life' by a hopeless, tragic first love At Trinity Hill, Cambridge tragic hrst love At Trimity From, Cambridge (1822-25), he read English listory, Political economy, metaphysics, and early English literature, spoke much at the Union, criried off the Chancellor's gold medal for a poem upon Sculp ture, but took only a pass degree in a long vacation walking tour (1824), he had visited the grave of his lost love in the Lake Country, and there, in Scotland, and in the north of England had strange adventures with cutthroats and most impossible Gypsies His college life ended, lie now alternated awhile between Paris and London, and in London in 1825 he raris and Lungon, and in Lungon in 1025 ne wheeler (1802-82), 7 beautiful Irish gri, whom he married in 1827, despite his mother's strenuous opposition It was a most unhappy /

m irringe, his wife bore him a drughter and a son, the future Earl of Lytton, in 1836 they son, the future Latt of Lytton, in 1030 they separated But his marriage may fairly be said to have called forth in him a marvellous hterry activity, for the temporary estrangement from lns mother threw him almost wholly on his o resources He had only £200 a year, and he had at the rate of £3000, the deficiency was supplie out of his well-stored portfolio, his teeming brain and lns indefatigable industry? During the next ten Jeurs he produced twelve novels, two poems, one political primplilet, one play, the whole of England and the Inglish, three volumes of Athens, its Rise and I all, of which only two ever were published, and all the essays and tales collected in the Student, to which must be added his untold contributions to the Famburgh, the Westminster, the New Monthly (of which he became editor in 1831), the Lammer, and other serals His Wer therran Falkland, published anonymously in 1827, gric little promise of the brilling success, both at home and abroad, of Pelham (1828), the clever persifige of whose dandy hero is still delightful No two readers were on the relative ment of his books, and it may be argued that this very divergence of opinion as to which is really his in sterpiece only illustrates his amazing resituity Certainly Pelliam is better than Paul Clifford (1830), an idealisation of the highway man, as Engene Aram (1832) is of the murderer, many, no doubt, rank it is inferior to the finesful Pil Frims of the Rhine (1834) or to one or another of his four famous historical novels—The Last Days of Pompen (1834), Riensi (1835), The Last of the Barons (1843), and Harold (1843) His unique domestic trilogy, The Cartons (1850), My Aorel (1853), and What will he do with it? (1859), Sterne like yet strangely unlike Sterne, surpasses Hirchery for personts and Dickens for gentle men, and both in knowledge of the world of Politics Lanont (1842), A Strange Story (1862), must not be forgotten, or, shorter but stronger than either, The Haunted and the Haunters (Blackwood's Magazine, 1859) No English story of the supernitural quite resembles this, for a very sufficient reason—the author was writing as a believer, as a serious student of astrology, chiromancy, occult lore generally In 1831, at the age of twenty-eight, Bulwer had entered Parliament as member for St Ives, and attached himself to the Reform party, but Lincoln next year returned him as a Protectionist Liberal, and that sent he held till 1841. At this time he was not merely still on most Points a Radical, but, according to Cooper the Chartist poet, openly Professed that he would prefer to see England under a Republican Government In 1838 the Melbourne administration conferred on him a by brilliant services as a pam phleteer, in 1843 he succeeded, by his mother's death, to the Knebworth estrice, and assumed the additional surname of Lytton Sir Edward Bulwer

Lytton now sought to re enter Parliament, in 1847 contesting Lincoln unsuccessfully, and in 1852 he was returned as Conservative member for Hertfordshire. Deafness hindered him from slinning as a debater, but he made himself a successful orator. In the Derby Government (1858–59) he was Colonial Secretary, and signalised his brief tenure of office by calling into existence the two vast colonies of British Columbia and Queensland. In 1866 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Lytton. He died at Torquay on 18th January 1873, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His son, the first Earl Lytton, was also distinguished in literature and statesmanship.

Lord Lytton's works in all exceed sixty, and fill more than a hundred and ten volumes. To those already mentioned may be added The Disowned (1829), Devereux (1829), Godolphin (1833), Ernest Maltravers (1837), Alice (1837), Leila and Calderon (1838), Night and Morning (1841), Poems and Ballads, chiefly from Schiller (1844), Lucretia (1846), Caxtoniana (1863), The Coming Race (anonymously, 1870), Kenelm Chillingly (1873), The Parisians (1874), and Pausanias the Spartan (unfinished, 1876)

Lytton's novels give examples of the art of fiction in its most widely differing divisions, and, taken together, display a surprising range of His knowledge was wide, though not accurate or profound, he had wit but not much humour, a luxuriant fancy rather than a high imagination, a lively interest in all of life, a skill of florid description and fluent narratne. His evident faults are a lack of sincerity, artificiality, over ambition in straining after effect The abiding impression is one rather of brilliant talent and eleverness than of Lytton's popularity was always rather with the public than with the critics, and it must be admitted that he does not now hold the place m literary history he at one time seemed likely to secure

Of his plays it must suffice to say that The Lady of Lions (1838), Ruhelieu (1838), and Money (1840), all three of which owed something to limits from Macready, still hold the stage as firmly as the masterpieces of Goldsmith and Sheridan, of his poems, that King Arthur (1848), and even St Stephen's (1860) and The Lost Tales of Miletus (1866), will all be forgotten when The New Timon (1846) is still kept in remembrance by the sivage answer it provoled in Punch from Tennyson Lytton's comment on Tennyson was sufficiently pointed and uncomplimentary to provoke reprisals 'The jingling melody of purloined conceits Outbabying Wordsworth and out-glittering Keats,' sneered Lytton, and one cannot wonder that rennyson replied

> We know him, out of Shakespeare's art And those fine curses which he spot c— The Old Timon with his noble heart, That strongly loathing, greatly broke

So died the Old, here comes the New Regard him—a familiar face, I thought we knew him—What' it's you, The pudded man that wears the stays,

Who killed the girls and thrilled the boys
With dandy pathos when you viote

O Llon, you that made a noise, And shook a mane en fafilletes

What profits now to understand

The ments of a spotless shirt—
A dapper boot—a little hand—

If half the little soul is dirt?

A Timon you! Nay, nay, for shame,
It looks too arrogant a jest—
That fierce old man—to take his name,
You bandbox! Off, and let him rest

It was not Tennyson, however, that sent the lines to Punch, but John Forster, nor did their author ever republish them—they were too bitter, he said

Death of Gawtrey the Coiner

At both doors now were heard the sound of voices 'Open, in the king's name, or expect no mercy!' 'Hist!' said Grutrey 'One way yet—the window—the rope

Morton opened the casement—Gawtrey uncoiled the rope. The dawn was breaking, it was light in the streets, but all seemed quiet without. The doors recled and shook beneath the pressure of the pursuers. Gawtrey flung the rope across the street to the opposite parapet, after two or three efforts, the grappling hook caught firm hold—the penlous path was made.

'Go first,' said Morton, 'I will not leave you now, you will be longer getting across than I shall. I will keep guard till you are over'

'Hark' hark'—are you mad? You keep guard! What is your strength to mine? Twenty men shall not move that door while my weight is against it. Quick, or you destroy us both! Besides, you will hold the rope for me, it may not be strong enough for my bulk of itself. Stay!—stay one moment. If you escape and I fall—I anny—my father, he will take care of her—you remember—thanks! Forgive me all! Go, that's right!

With a firm pulse, Morton threw himself on that dreadful bridge, it swung and craekled at his weight Shifting his grosp rapidly—holding his breath—with set teeth-with closed eyes-he moved on-he gained the parapet-he stood safe on the opposite side struning his eyes across, he saw through the open case ment into the chamber he had just quitted was still standing against the door to the principal stair case, for that of the two was the weaker and the more Presently the explosion of a firearm was assailed heard, they had shot through the panel seemed wounded, for he staggered forward and uttered a fierce cry, a moment more, and he gained the window -he seized the rope-he hung over the tremendous depth! Morton knelt by the prespet, holding the grappling hook in its place with convulsive grasp and fixing his eyes bloodsho' with fear and suspense, on the huge bulk that clung for life to that slender cord !

"Le-nll' le-vild!" cried a voice from the opps site side. Morton ruled his gaze from Gawtrey, the case ment was darkened by the forms of the pursuers—they had burst into the room-an officer sprang upon the parapet, and Gautrey, now aware of his danger, opened his eyes, and, as he moved on, glared upon the foe The policeman deliberately raised his pistol-Gautrey arrested himself-from a wound in his side the blood trickled slowly and darkly down, drop by drop, upon the stones below even the officers of the law shuddered as they eyed him, his hair bristling, his cheel white, his hps drawn convulsively from his teeth, and his eyes glaring from beneath the frown of agony and menace in which yet spoke the indomitable power and fiereeness of the man IIIs look, so fixed, so intense, so stern, awed the policeman, his hand trembled as he fired, and the ball struck the parapet an inch below the spot where An indistinct, wild, gurgling sound-Morton knelt half laugh, half yell-of scorn and glee, broke from Gawtrey's hips He swung himself on-near-nearnearer-a yard from the parapet

'You are saved!' eried Morton, when it that moment a volley burst from the fatal easement—the smoke rolled over both the fugitives—a groam, or rather howl of rage and despair and agony appalled even the hardiest on whose ear it came. Morton spring to his feet and looked below. He saw on the rugged stones, far down, a dark, formless, motionless mass, the strong man of passion and levity—the giant who had played with life and soul, as an infant with the brubles that it prizes and breaks—was what the Casar and the leper alike are when all elay is without God's breath—what glory, genius, power, and beauty would be for ever and for ever if there were no God!

From 'The Last Days of Pompeli'

At that instant the slaves appeared, bearing a tray covered with the first preparative initia of the feast Amidst delicious figs, fresh herbs strewed with snow, anchovies, and eggs, were ranged small cups of diluted wine sparingly mixed with honey. As these were placed on the table, young slaves bore round to each of the five guests (for there were no more) the silver basin of perfumed water and napkins edged with a purple fringe. But the redule ostentatiously drew forth his own napkin, which was not, indeed, of so fine a linen, but in which the fringe was twice as broad, and wiped his hands with the parade of a man who felt he was calling for admiration

'A splendid mappa that of yours,' said Clodius, 'why, the fringe is as broad as a girdle ''

'A trifle, my Clodius, a trifle! They tell me this stripe is the latest fashion at Rome, but Glaucus attends to these things more than I'

'Be propitious, O Bacchus' said Glaucus, inclining reverentially to a beautiful image of the god placed in the centre of the table, at the corners of which stood the Lares and the salt holders. The guests followed the prayer, and then, sprinkling the wine on the table, they performed the wonted libation

This over, the convivialists reclined themselves on the coaches, and the business of the hoar commenced

'May this cup be my last 1' said the young Sallust, as the table, cleared of its first stimulants, was now loaded with the substantial part of the entertainment, and the ministering slave poured forth to him a brimming cyathus—'May this cup be my last, but it is the best wine I have drunk at Pompen!'

'Bring lither the amphora,' said Glauens, 'and read its date and its character'

The slave histoned to inform the party that the scroll fastened to the earl betokened its birth from Chios, and its age a ripe fifty years

'How deliciously the snow has cooled it ' said Pansa. It is just enough'

'It is like the experience of a man who his cooled his pleasures sufficiently to give them a double zest,' exclaimed Sallust

'It is lile a woman's "No," added Glaucus 'it cools but to inflainc the more '

'When is our next wild beast fight?' said Clothus to

'It stands fixed for the minth ide of August,' answered Pansa 'on the day after the Vulcanaha,—we have a most lovely young hon for the occasion'

'Whom shall we get for him to eat?' asked Clothus. 'Alis' there is a great scarcity of eriminals. You must positively find some innocent or other to condemn to the hon, Pansa l'

'Indeed I have thought very seriously about it of late,' replied the ridile gravely. 'It was a most infamous law that which forbade us to send our own slaves to the wild beasts. Not to let us do what we like with our own, that's what I call an infringement on property itself.'

'Not so in the good old days of the Republic,' sighed Sallust

'And then this pretended mercy to the slaves is such a disappointment to the poor people. How they do love to see a good tough battle between a man and a lion, and all this innocent pleasure ther may lose (if the gods don't send us a good criminal soon) from this cursed law.'

'What can be worse policy,' said Clodius senten tiously, 'than to interfere with the manly amusements of the people?'

'Well, than! Jupiter and the Pates! we have no Nero at present,' said Sallust

He was indeed a tyrant, he shut up our amphitheatre for ten years?

'I wonder it did not create a rebellion,' said Sallast.

'It very nearly did,' returned Pansa, with his mouth full of wild boar

Here the conversation was interrupted for a moment by a flourish of flutes, and two slaves entered with a single dish

'Ah! what delicacy hast thou in store for us now, my Glaueus?' cried the young Sallust, with sparkling eyes.

Sallust was only twenty four, but he had no pleasure in life like eating—perhaps he had exhausted all the others, yet had he some talent, and an excellent heart—as far as it went

'I know its face, by Pollux!' cried Pansa 'It is an Ambracian Kid Ho!' (snapping his fingers, an usual signal to the slaves,) 'we must prepare a new libation in honour to the new comer'

'I had hoped,' said Glaucus in a melancholy tone, 'to have procured you some oysters from Britain, but the winds that were so cruel to Cæsar have forbid us the oysters'

'Are they in truth so delicious?' asked Lepidus, loosening to a yet more laxumous ease his ungirdled tunic.

'Why, in truth, I suspect it is the distance that gives the flavour, they want the richness of the Brundusium oyster. But at Rome no supper is complete without them.'

'The poor Britons' There is some good in them after all,' said Sallust. 'They produce an oyster'

'I wish they would produce us a gladiator,' said the ædile, whose provident mind was musing over the wants of the amphitheatre.

From 'The Caxtons'

'Sir-sir, it is a boy "

'A boy,' said my father, looking up from his book, and evidently much puzzled, 'what is a boy?'

Now my father did not mean by that interrogatory to challenge philosophical inquiry, nor to demand of the honest but unenlightened woman who had just rushed mto his study a solution of that mistery, physiological and psychological, which has puzzled so many curious sages, and lies still involved in the question, 'What is a man?' For, as we need not look further than Dr Johnson's Dictionary to know that a boy is 'a male child'-1 e. the male young of man-so he who would go to the depth of things, and know scientifically what is a boy, must be able to ascertain 'what is a min' But, for aught I I now, my father may have been satisfied with Busson on that score, or he may have sided with Monboddo He may have agreed with Bishop Berkeley he may have contented himself with Professor Combehe may have regarded the genus spiritually, like Zeno, or materially, like Epicurus Grant that boy is the male voung of man, and he would have had plenty of defini tions to choose from. He might have said, 'Man is a stomach-ergo, boy a male young stomach a brain-boy a male young brain. Man is a bundle of habits—boy a male young bundle of habits. Man is a machine—boy a male young machine. Man is a tailless monkey—boy a male young tailless monkey Man is a combination of gases—boy a male young combination of gases. Man is an appearance—boy a male young appear ance,' &c., &c., and et cetera, ad infinitum! And if none of these definitions had entirely satisfied my father, I am perfectly persuaded that he would never have come to Mrs Primmins for a new one

But it so happened that my father was at that moment engaged in the important consideration whether the Iliad was written by one Homer, or was rather a collection of sundry ballads, done into Greel by divers hands, and finally selected, compiled, and reduced into a whole by a Committee of Taste, under that elegant old tyrant Pisistratus, and the sudden affirmation, 'It is a boy,' did not seem to him pertinent to the thread of the discussion Therefore he asked, 'What is a boy?' vaguely, and, as it were, taken by surprise

'Lord, sir!' said Mr. Primmins, 'what is a boy? Why, the baby!'

'The haby i' repeated my father, rising 'What' you don't mean to say that Mrs Carton is-eh?'

'Yes, I do,' said Mrs Primmins, dropping a curtsey, 'and as fine a little rogue as ever I set eyes npon'

'Poor dear woman!' said my father with great compassion 'So soon, too—so rapidly,' he resumed in a tone of musing surprise. 'Why, it is but the other day we were married?'

'Bless my heart, sir' said Mrs Primmins, much scan dalised, 'it is ten months and more'

'Ten months!' said my fither, with a sigh 'Ten months! and I have not finished fifty pages of my refu tation of Wolf's monstrous theory! In ten months a child! and, I'll be bound, complete—hands, feet, eyes, ears, and nose!—and not like this poor Infant of Mind (and my father pathetically placed his hand on the treatise), of which nothing is formed and shaped—not even the first joint of the little finger! Why, my wife is a precious woman! Well, keep her quiet. Heaven preserve her, and send me strength—to support this blessing!'

'But your honour will look at the baby? Come, sir' and Mrs Primmins laid hold of my father's sleeve coaxingly

'Look at it—to be sure,' said my father kindly, 'look at it—certainly, it is but fair to poor Mrs Caxton, after taking so much trouble, dear soul!'

Therewith my father, drawing his dressing robe round him in more stately folds, followed Mrs Primmins upstairs into a room very carefully darkened

'How are vou, my dear?' said my father with com passionate tenderness, as he groped his way to the bed

A faint voice muttered, 'Better now, and so happy!' And, at the same moment, Mrs Primmins pulled my father away, lifted a coverlid from a small cradle, and, holding a candle within an inch of an undeveloped nose, cried emphatically, 'There—bless it!'

'Of course, ma'am, I bless it,' said my father rather peevishly 'It is my duty to bless it—Bless it! And this, then, is the way we come into the world!—red, very red—blushing for all the follies we are destined to commit'

My father sat down on the nurse's chair, the women grouped round him He continued to gaze on the contents of the cradle, and at length said musingly, 'And Homer was once like this!'

At this moment—and no wonder, considering the propinquity of the candle to his visual organs—Homer's infant likeness commenced the first untutored melodies of nature

'Homer improved greatly in singing as he grew older,' observed Mr Squills, the accoucheur, who was engaged in some mysteries in a corner of the room

My father stopped his ears 'Little things can make a great noise,' said he philosophically, 'and the smaller the thing the greater noise it can make?

So saying, he erept on tiptoe to the bed, and clasping the pale hand held out to him, whispered some words that no doubt charmed and soothed the ear that heard them, for that pale hand was tenderly drawn from his own, and thrown tenderly round his neek. The sound of a gentle kiss was heard through the stillness

'Mr Caxton, sir,' eried Mr Squills in rebuke, 'you agitate my patient-you must retire'

My father raised his mild face, looked round apologetically, brushed his eyes with the back of his hand, stole to the door, and vanished

'I think,' said a kind gossip seated at the other side of my mother's bed—'I think, my dear, that Mr Caxton might have shown more joy—more natural feeling, I may say—at the sight of the baby, and such a baby! But all men are just the same, my dear—brutes—all brutes, depend upon it'

'Poor Austin!' sighed my mother feebly, 'how little you understand him!'

'And now I shall clear the room,' said Mr Squills, 'Go to sleep, Mrs Caxton'

'Mr Squills,' exclaimed my mother, and the bed curtains trembled, 'pray see that Mr Caxton does not set himself on fire,—and, Mr Squills, tell him not to be vexed and miss me—I shall be down very soon—shan't I?'

'If you keep yourself easy, you will, ma'am.'

Prny, say so ,—and, Primmins'— 'Yes, ma am'

'Every one, I fear, is neglecting your master Be sure'— (and my mother s lips approached close to Mrs Primmins' ear)—'be sure that you—air his nighteap yourself'

'Tender creatures those women,' soliloquised Mr Squills, as, after clearing the room of all present save Mrs Primmins and the nurse, he took his way towards my father's study Encountering the footman in the passage, 'John,' said he, 'take supper into your master's room, and make us some punch, will you—stiffish?'

But not to Enn's course cinci dem. Large if his faults, Time's large apology Child of a land that ne'er had known repose, Our rights and blessings, Ireland's wrongs and woes. Hate, at St Omer's into caution drill d. In Dublin law courts subtilised and skill d. Hate in the man, whatever else appear Fichle or false, was steadfast and sincere But with that hate a nobler passion dwelt-To linte the Saxon was to love the Celt Had that fierce railer sprung from English sires, His creed a Protestant's, his birth a squire s, No blander Pollio whom our Bar affords Had graced the woolsack and cajoled 'my Lords,' Pass by his faults, his art be here allow'd. Once to my sight the giant thus was given,
Wall'd by wide air, and roof'd by boundless heaven,
Beneath his feet the human ocean lay,
And wave on wave flow'd into space away
Methought no clarion could have sent its sound
Eyen to the centre of the hosts around,
And as Lihought rose the sonorous swell,
As from some church tower swings the silvery bell.
Aloft and clear, from mry tide to tide,
It glided, easy as a bird may glide,
To, the last verge of that vast audience sent,
It play'd with each wild passion as it went,
Now stirr'd the uproar, now the murmur still'd,
And sols or laughter answer'd as it will'd

Then did I know what spells of infinite choice, To rouse or lnll, has the sweet human voice, Then did I seem to seize the sudden clue To the grand troublous Life Antique—to view Under the rock stand of Demosthenes, Militable Athens heave her noisy seas.

The Life Letters, and Literary Remains of Lord Lytlen (vols.
Life 1831, by his 200, comes down only to 1831, and must be supplemented by the political Memory, also by the Earl of Lytton, prefixed to the Speeches of Lord Lytlen (2 vols 1874)

Lytton Bulwer (1801-72), Lord Lytton's elder brother, was educated at Harrow and Cambridge for diplomatic service, and was attache at Berlin, Brussels, and the Hague, Dir ing 1830-37 he sat in Parliament as an Adyanced Liberal, and in 1837 became secretary of empassy at Constantinople. In 1843-48 he had a difficult task as minister plenipotentiary at Madrid, and at the time of the 'Spanish marriages' made projests and was ordered to quit Madrid, but at home was great As Sir Henry Bulwer made K.CB and GCB -long a famous name—he was sent in 1849 to 3 Washington, where he concluded the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, in 1852 to Florence, and m 1850 to 2 Bucharest I rom 1858 to 1865 he was ambassador; to the Porte, ably carried out Palmerston's policy on the Eastern Question, and was created Lord; Dalling and Bulwer in 1871 He published a series of admirable works, including An Androial in Greece (1826) , France, Social, Literary, and Political (1834-36), a Life of Byron (1835); Historical Characters (1868-70), sketches of Talleyrand, Canning, Cobbett, and Mackintosh, sketches also of Peel and Melbourne, and an unfinished Life of Palmerston (1870-74).

Edward Bouveric Pusey (1800-82), son of a Bouverie (son of Viscount Folkestone) who had assumed the name of Puscy when the Puscy estates were bequeathed to him, was born, at Pusey in Berkshire. He was educated at-Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, in 1823 was elected at Fellow of Oriel, and in 1825-27 studied theology in Germany—then a rare enterprise for an Oxford graduate. In 1828 he was appointed region professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and this post, he His first work was an retained until his death essay on the causes of Rationalism in recent German theology, and the aim of his life was to prevent the spread of Rationalism in England When in 1833 Newman began the issue of the Tracts for the Times, Pusey soon joined him, and they, with Keble, became leaders of the movement's Pusey's chief contributions to the Iracis were those on Baptism and the Holy Eucharist Jun 4 1836 he began the Oxford Library of the Fathers Newman's celebrated Tract 90 was condemned in 1841, and in 1843 Pusey was suspended for three years from preaching in Oxford for a university sermon on the Holy Eucharist, at the first opportunity he reiterated his teaching, but before his suspension was over Newman, with several of his leading disciples, had joined the Pusey and Keble now strove i Roman communion to reassure Churchmen staggered by the secession it was Puscy's moral weight mainly that prevented a much greater catastrophe to the Church of England when the encroachments of the civil courts in the Gorham case, and the attacks of bishops and others upon the Oxford movements brought about the secession to the Roman Church of Manning with another band of distinguished in 1848 planted at Edgbiston the community of which he was elected the Superior, and there in the same year he devoted himself with the utmost zeal to the sufferers from cholera. The lectures on Anglican Difficulties (1850) drew public attention to Newman's great power of irony and the singular delicacy of his literary style, and were followed by the lectures on Catholicism in England (1851), the book which gave occasion to the famous action for libel by Dr Achilli, an apostate Dominican whose character Newman liad exposed Newman's justification, put into court, was a scathing and terrible document, magnificent in its invective, but it failed to ward off a verdict in Achilli's favour

JOHN HENRY NEWMAN
From the Drawing by George Richmond R.A. in the National Portrait Gallery (Drawn about 1840.)

Newman's long series of Oxford sermons contain some of the noblest ever preached from an Anglican pulpit, and the Roman Catholic series-Sermons addressed to Mixed Congregations (1849) and Sermons on Various Occasions (1857)-though less restrained, less severe in taste, and less remark able for their tender pathos, are even fuller of powerful rhetoric, often vehement, almost always singularly dignified In 1864 a casual remark by Canon Kingsley in Macmillan's Magazine on the indifference of the Roman Church to the virtue of truthfulness, an indifference which he asserted that Dr Newman approved, led to a correspondence which contained on Newman's side the most triumphant and finished irony, and resulted in the publication of the ever-memorable Apologia pro Vita Sua, afterwards more than once slightly recast and described as 'A History of My Religious Opinions,' perhaps the most significant and impressive religious autobiography of the nineteenth

To many Englishmen less directly century hostile than Kingsley, Newman's subtlety seemed often to become sophistry, to make him lose breadth and proportion, from their point of view he split hairs and magnified trifles, unsympathetic critics, like Carlyle, were accordingly led grossly to undervalue Newman's intellectual gifts was at Oxford during the critical stage of the 'movement,' but, as Sir Leslie Steplien lias said, while his ablest contemporaries were undergoing the 'Newman fever,' Rusl in seemed never to have known that such a person as Newman existed. Towards those of very opposite schools of thought Newman was himself somewhat unsympathetic, he too judged those harshly whose beliefs he disliked In him, as always, high idealism involved too great disdain for the humbler and more prosaic tempera ment, and lofty theological theories sometimes made him blind to the truly religious element in views and systems lie disapproved. In 1865 New J man wrote a poem of singular beauty, The Dream of Gerontius, a vision of the unseen, with angel choruses more after the manner of a spiritualised Faust than of Dante, it was republished with the Lerses on Various Occasions in 1874, and set to music by Dr Elgar in 1900. The famous humn 'Pruse to the Holiest in the lieight' is from Gerontius In 1870 he published his Grammar of Assent, on the philosophy of faith controversies which led to the Vatican Council Neuman sided with the Inopportunists Himself an Ultramontane in belief (he always accepted papal infallibility), he was at this time in vehement opposition to the policy of the Ultramontanes under Manning and William George Ward, and the bitter ness between the two parties ran very high 1879 Pope Leo XIII, anxious to recognise the great convert's services, summoned Newman to Rome to receive the cardinal's hat. His last years were spent at Edgbaston, and there he died, he was buried at Rednall in Worcestershire. The extracts are selected to show various aspects of his manner

Music as a Symbol.

Let us take another instance, of an outward and earthly form, or economy, under which great wonders unknown seem to be typified, I mean musical sounds, as they are exhibited most perfectly in instrumental There are seven notes in the scale, make them fourteen, yet what a slender outfit for so vast an enterprise! What science brings so much out of so little? Out of what poor elements does some great master in it create his new world! Shall we say that all this exuberant inventiveness is a mere ingenuity or trick of art, like some game or fashion of the day, without reality, without meaning? We may do so, and then, perhaps, we shall also account the science of theology to be a matter of words, yet, as there is a divinity in the theology of the Church, which those who feel cannot communicate, so is there also in the wonderful creation of sublimity and beauty of which I am speaking To many men the very names which the science employs are utterly incomprehensible. To speak of an idea or u subject seems to be fanciful or trifling, to speak of the views which it opens upon us to be childish extrava gance, yet is it possible that that inexhaustible evolution and disposition of notes, so rich yet so simple, so intri cate yet so regulated, so various yet so majestic, should be a mere sound, which is gone and perishes? Can it be that those mysterious stirrings of heart, and keen emotions, and strange yearnings after we know not what, and awful impressions from we know not whence, should be wrought in us by what is unsubstantial, and comes and goes, and begins and ends in itself? It is not so, it cannot be No, they have escaped from some higher sphere, they are the outpourings of eternal harmony in the medium of created sound, they are echoes from our home, they are the voice of angels, or the Magnificat of saints, or the living laws of divine governance, or the divine attributes, something are they besides themselves, which we cannot compass, which we cannot utter-though mortal man, and he perhaps not otherwise distinguished above his fellows, has the gift of eliciting them (From Sermons before the University)

Original Sin.

Starting, then, with the being of a God (which, as I have said, is as certain to me as the certainty of my own existence, though when I try to put the grounds of that certainty into logical shape I find a difficulty in doing so in mood and figure to my satisfaction), I look out of myself into the world of men, and there I see a sight which fills me with unspeakable distress. The world seems simply to give the lie to that great truth, of which my whole being is so full, and the effect upon me is, in consequence, as a matter of necessity, as confusing as if it denied that I am in existence myself. If I looked into a mirror and did not see my face, I should have the sort of feeling which actually comes upon me when I look into this living busy world and see no reflection of its Creator This is, to me, one of those great difficulties of this absolute primary truth to which I referred just now Were it not for this voice, speaking so clearly in my conscience and my heart, I should be an atheist, or a pantheist, or a polytheist when I looked into the world I am speaking for myself only, and I am far from denying the real force of the arguments in proof of a God, drawn from the general facts of human society and the course of history, but these do not warm me or enlighten me, they do not take away the winter of my desolation, or make the buds unfold and the leaves grow within me, and my moral being rejoice. The sight of the world is nothing else than the prophet's scroll, full of 'lamentations, and mourning, and woe'

To consider the world in its length and breadth, its various history, the many races of man, their starts, their fortunes, their mutual alienation, their conflicts, and then their ways, habits, governments, forms of worship, their enterprises, their aimless courses, their random achievements and acquirements, the impotent conclusion of long standing facts, the tokens so faint and broken of a superintending design, the blind evolution of what turn out to be great powers or truths, the progress of things, as if from unreasoning elements, not towards final causes, the greatness and littleness of man, his far reaching aims, his short duration, the cirtuin hung over his futurity, the disappointments of life, the defeat of good, the success of evil, physical pain, mental anguish, the prevalence and intensity of sin, the pervading

idolatries, the corruptions, the dreary hopeless irreligion, that condition of the whole race, so fearfully yet exactly described in the Apostle's words, 'having no hope and without God in the world'—all this is a vision to dizzy and appal, and inflicts upon the mind the sense of a profound mystery, which is absolutely beyond human solution

What shall be said to this heart piercing, reason bewildering fact? I can only answer, that either there is no Creator, or this living society of men is in a true sense discarded from His presence Did I see a boy of good make and mind, with the tokens on him of a refined nature, cast upon the world without provision, unable to say whence he came, his birthplace or his family connexions, I should conclude that there was some mystery connected with his history, and that he was one of whom, from one cause or other, his parents were ashamed Thus only should I be able to account for the contrast between the promise and the condition of his being And so I argue about the world, -if there be a God, since there is a God, the human rice is implicated in some terrible aboriginal calamity. It is out of joint with the purposes of its Creator This is a fact—a fact as true as the fact of its existence, and thus the doctrine of what is theologically called original sin becomes to me almost as certain as that the world exists, and as the existence of God. (From the Apologia)

Protestant Misconceptions

In this case its fonntain springs up, as it were, under our very feet, and we shall have no difficulty at all in judging of its quality. Its history is as follows. Conches, omnibuses, carnages, and cars day after day drive up and down the Hagley Road, passengers lounge to and fro on the footpath, and close alongside of it are discovered one day the nascent foundations and rudiments of a considerable building. On inquiring, it is found to be intended for a Catholic, nay, even for a monastic establishment This leads to a good deal of talk, espe cially when the bricks begin to show above the surface. Meantime the unsuspecting architect is taking his measurements, and ascertains that the ground is far from lying level, and then, since there is a prejudice among Cntholics in favour of horizontal floors, he comes to the conclusion that the bricks of the basement must rise above the surface higher at one end of the building than at the other, in fact, that whether he will or no, there must be some construction of the nature of a vault or cellar at the extremity in question, a circumstance not at all inconvenient, considering it also happens to be the kitchen end of the building Accord ingly, he turns his necessity lnto a gain, and by the excavation of a few feet of earth, he forms a number of chambers convenient for various purposes, partly beneath, partly above the line of the ground While he is thus intent on his work, loungers, gossipers, alarmists are busy at theirs too. They go round the building, they peep into the underground brickwork, and are curious about the drains, they moralise about Popery and its spread, at length they trespass upon the enclosare, they dive into the half finished shell, and they take their fill of seeing what is to be seen, and imagining what is not. Every house is built on an idea, you do not build a mansion like a public office, or a palace like a prison, or a factory like a shooting box, or a church like a barn Religious houses, In like manner, have their own idea.

they have certain indispensable peculiarities of form and internal arrangement. Doubtless, there was much in the very idea of an oratory purplexing to the Protes tant intellect, and inconsistent with Protestant notions of comfort and utility Why should so large a room be here? why so small a room there? why a passage so long and wide? and why so long a wall without a window -- the very size of the house needs explanation Judgments which had employed themselves on the high subject of a Catholic hierarchy and its need found no difficulty in dogmatising on bedrooms and closets. There was much to suggest matter of suspicion, and to predispose the trespasser to doubt whether he had yet got to the bottom of the subject At length one question flashed upon his mind what can such a house have to do with cellars? cellars and monks, what can be their mutual relation? monks-to what possible use can they put pits, and holes, and corners, and outhouses, and sheds? A sensation was created, it brought other visitors, it spread, it became an impression, a belief, the truth lay hare, a tradition was born, a fact was elicited which henceforth had many witnesses cellars were cells. How obvious when once stated I and every one who entered the building, every one who passed by, became, I say, in some sort, ocular vouchers for what had often been read of in books, but for many generations had happily been unknown to England, for the incarecrations, the torturings, the startings, the immurings, the murderings proper to a monastic establishment

Now I am tempted to stop for a while in order to improve (as the evangelical pulpits call it) this most memorable discovery. I will therefore briefly consider it under the heads of (1) THE ACCUSATION, (2) ITS GROWNDS, (3) THE ACCUSERS, and (4) THE ACCUSED

First, THE ACCUSATION - It is this - that the Catholics, building the house in question, were in the practice of committing murder. This was so strictly the charge, that, had the platform selected for making it been other than we know it to have been, I suppose the speaker might have been indicted for libel words were these 'It is not usual for a coroner to hold an inquest unless where a rumour had got abroad that there was a necessity for one, and how was a rumour to come from the underground cells of the convents? I cs. he repeated underground cells and he would tell them something about such places. At this moment, in the parish of Edgbaston within the borough of Birmingham, there was a large convent, of some kind or other, being erected, and the whole of the underground was fitted up with cells, and what were those cells for?'

Secondly, THE GROUNDS OF THE ACCUSATION—They are simple, behold them (1) That the house is built level, (2) and that the plot of earth on which it is built is higher at one end than at the other

Thirdly, THE ACCUSERS—This, too, throws light upon the character of Protestant traditions. Not weak and ignorant people only, not people at a distance—but educated men, gentlemen well connected, high ln post tion, men of business, men of character, members of the legislature, men familiar with the locality, men who know the accused by name—such are the men who deliberately, reiteratedly, in spite of being set right, charge certain persons with pitiless, savage practices, with beating and imprisoning, with starving, with murdering their dependents

Fourthly, THE ACCUSED -I feel ashamed, my brothers, of bringing my own matters before you, when far better persons have suffered worse imputations, but bear with me. I, then, am the recused A gentleman of blameless charneter, a county member, with whose near relatives I have been on terms of almost fraternal intimacy for a quarter of a century, who knows me by repute far more familiarly (I suppose) than any one in this room knows me, putting aside my personal friends, he it is who charges me, and others like me, with delighting in blood, with enjoying the shricks and groans of agony and despair, vith presiding at a brinquet of dislocated limbs, quivering muscles, and wild countenances Oh, what a world is this! Could he look into our eyes and say it? Would he have the heart to say it if he recollected of whom he said it? For who are we? Have we lived in a corner? have we come to light suddenly out of the earth? We have been nourished, for the greater part of our lives, in the bosom of the great schools and universities of Pro estant Fng land we have been the foster-sons of the Ldwards and Henries, the Wikehims and Wolsevs, of whom English men are wont to make much, we have grown up amid hundreds of contemporaries, scattered at present all over the country, in those special ranks of society's high are the very wall of a member of the legislature. Our names are better known to the coluented classes of the country than those of any others who are not public men. More over, if there be men in the whole world who may be said to live in fillico, it is the members of a college at one of our universities, living, not in private houses, not in families, but in one or two apartments which are open to all the world, at all hours, with nothing, I may say, their own, with college servants, a common table-nay, their chairs and their bedding, and their cups and saucers, down to their coal scuttle and their curpet brooms-a sort of common property, and the right of their neighbours. Such is that manner of life-in which nothing, I may say, can be hid, where no trait of character or peculi anty of conduct but comes to broad day—such is the life I myself led for above a quarter of a century, under the eyes of numbers who are familiarly known to my accusers, such is almost the life which we all have led ever since we have been in Birmingham, with our house open to all comers, and ourselves accesable, I may almost say, at any hour, and this being so, considering the charge, and the evidence, and the accuser, and the accused, could we Catholics desire a more apposite illus tration of the formation and the value of a Protestant tradition? (From The Present Position of Catholis)

The Sinner before the Judgment-seat.

O what a moment for the poor soul, when it comes to itself, and finds itself suddenly before the judgment seat of Christ! O what a moment, when, breathless with the journey, and dizzy with the brightness, and overcome with the strangeness of what is happening to him, and unable to realise where he is, the sinner hears the voice of the accusing spirit bringing up all the sins of his past life, which he has forgotten, or which he has explained away, which he would not allow to be sins, though he suspected they were, when he hears him detailing all the mercies of God which he has despised, all His warnings which he has set at nought, all His judgments which he has outlived, when that evil one follows out the growth and progress of a lost soul, how it expended and wis confirmed in sin—how it budded forth into leaves and flowers, grew into branches, and ripeued into fruit-till nothing was wanted for its full condemnation! Aud, oh 1 still more terrible, still more districting, when the Judge speaks, and consigns it to the jailers, till it shall pay the endless debt which lies against it 1 'Impossible, I a lost soul! I separated from hope and from peace for ever! It is not I of whom the Judge so spake! There is a mistake somewhere, Christ, Saviour, hold Thy hand -one minute to explain it! My name is Demas I am but Demas, not Judas, or Nicolas, or Alexander, or Philetus, or Diotrephes What? eternal pain i for me! Impossible, it shall not be.' And the poor soul struggles and wrestles in the grasp of the mighty demon which has hold of it, and whose every touch is torment 'O atrocious!' it shrieks in agouy, and in anger too, as if the very keenness of the infliction were a proof of its in justice. 'A second ' and a third 1 I can bear no more ! Stop, horrible fiend, give over, I am a man, and not such as thou ' I am not food for thee, or sport for thee ' I never was in hell as thou, I have not on me the smell of fire, nor the taint of the charnel house! I know what human feelings are, I have been taught religion, I have had a conscience, I have a cultivated mind, I am well versed in science and art, I have been refined by litera ture, I have had an eye for the beauties of nature, I am a philosopher, or a poet, or a shrewd observer of men, or a hero, or a statesman, or an orator, or a man of wit and humour Nav-I am a Catholie. I am not an unregenerate Protestant, I have received the grace of the Redeemer, I have attended the Sacra ments for years, I have been a Catholic from a child. I am a son of the Martyrs, I died in communion with the Church nothing, nothing which I have ever been which I have ever seen, bears any resemblance to thee, and to the flame and steneh which exhale from thee, so I defy thee, and abjure thee, O enemy

Alas! poor soul, -and whilst it thus fights with that destiny which it has brought upon itself, and those com pamons whom it has chosen, the mau's name perhaps is solemnly chanted forth, and his memory decently cherished among his friends on earth. His readiness in speech, his fertility in thought, his sagacity, or his wisdom, are not forgotten. Men talk of him from time to time, they appeal to his authority, they quote his words, perhaps they even raise a monument to his name, or write his history 'So comprehensive a mind l Such a power of throwing light on a perplexed subject, and bringing conflicting ideas or facts into harmony !' 'Such a speech it was that he made on such and such an occasion, I happened to be present, and never shall forget it!' or, 'It was the saying of a very sensible man, ' or, 'A great personage, whom some of us knew,' or, 'It was a rule with a very worthy and excellent friend of mine, now no more, ' or, ' Never was his equal in society, so just in his remarks, so lively, so versatile, so unobtrusive,' or, 'I was fortunate to see him once when I was a boy, or, 'So great a benefactor to his country and to his kind,' 'His discoveries so great, ' or, 'His philosophy so profound' O vanity l vanity of vanities, all is vanity! What profiteth it? What profiteth it? His soul is in hell, O ye children of men, while thus ye speak, his soul is in the beginning of those torments in which his body will soon have part, and which will never die

(From Discourses to Mixed Congregations)

From 'The Dream of Gerontius' I went to sleep, and now I am refresh'd, A strange refreshment for I feel in me An inexpressive lightness, and a sense Of freedom, as I were at length myself, And ne'er had been before. How still it is ! I hear no more the busy beat of time, No, nor my fluttering breath, nor struggling pulse, Nor does one moment differ from the next. I had a dream, yes -some one softly said, 'He's gone,' and then a sigh went round the room. And then I surely heard a priestly voice Cry 'Subvenite,' and they knelt in prayer I seem to hear him still, but thin and low, And fainter and more faint the accents come, As at an ever widening interval Ah! whence is this? What is this severance? This silence pours a solitariness Into the very essence of my soul, And the deep rest, so soothing and so sweet, Hath something too of sternness and of pain For it drives back my thoughts upon their spring By a strange introversion, and perforce I now begin to feed upon myself, Because I have nought else to feed upon

Am I alive or dead? I am not dead, But in the body still, for I possess A sort of confidence, which clings to me, That each particular organ holds its place As heretofore, combining with the rest Into one symmetry, that wraps me round, And makes me man, and surely I could move, Did I but will it, every part of me And yet I cannot to my sense bring home, By very trial, that I have the power 'Tis strange, I cannot stir a hand or foot, I cannot make my fingers or my lips By mutual pressure witness each to each, Nor by the eyelid's instantaneous stroke Assure myself I have a body still Nor do I know my very attitude, Nor if I stand, or lie, or sit, or kneel

So much I know, not knowing how I know,
That the vist universe, where I have dwelt,
Is quitting me, or I am quitting it
Or I or it is rushing on the wings
Of light or lightning on an onward course,
And we e'en now are million miles apart
Yet is this peremptory severance
Wrought out in lengthening measurements of space,
Which grow and multiply by speed and time?
Or am I traversing infinity
By endless subdivision, lurrying back
From finite towards infinitesimal,
Thus dying out of the expanded world?

Another marvel some one has me fast Within his ample palm, 'tis not a grasp Such as they use on earth, but all around Over the surface of my subtle being, As though I were a sphere, and capable To be accosted thus, a uniform And gentle pressure tells me I am uot Self moving, but borne forward on my way

And hark! I hear a singing, yet in sooth I cannot of that music rightly say Whether I hear, or touch, or taste the tones. Oh, what a heart subduing includy!

Angel

My work is done,
My task is o er,
And so I come,
I'm my it home,
For the crown is won,
Alleling,
I or evermore

My Father gave
In charge to me
Flus child of earth
I 'en from its birth,
To serve and save,
Allelia,
And saved is be

This child of clay

Fo me was given,

To rear and train

By sorrow and pain

In the parrow vary,

There is a uniform edition of Cardinal Newman's works in thirty six volumes (1868-81)—the Letters at Letterspeed and e of his earlier public life were edited by Miss Morley in 1851—There are several lives of him or books on him including those by Richard Hell Hutton (1852)—E. A Abbott (critical or even hostife 185)—and Waller and Durrow (1952)—beside a tudy of Newman as a proce writer by L. E. Gates of Itarvard (1853)—a study of Newman as a musician (1853)—for In W. S. Lilly's Characteristic (1874) of Newman with be found a large and classified series of extracts from Newman a works. An I see reminiscences of Newman in the various works by Dean Church, A. W. Ward, and the Morley's

Trancis William Newman (1805-97), brother of the cardinal, was a Londoner born, and was educated at Ealing and at Worcester College, Oxford In 1826 he obtained a double first and a Billiol fellowship, which he resigned, and he withdrew from the university in 1830, declining subscription to the Thirty nine Articles After a three years' stay in the East, he became classical tutor in Bristol College in 1834, in 1840 professor in Manchester New College (Unitarian), and in 1846-63 Professor of Latin in University College, London He took a very keen interest in religious controversy, but with a tendency so diametrically opposed to that of his more famous brother that the elder one conceived it his duty to withdraw from intimacy with the younger, whose ideal faith was one which should include whatever is best in all the historical religions He wrote in 1847 A History of the Hebrew Monarchy His first notable book, The Soul (1849), sought to justify the aspirations of the human heart towards the divine, and has been called 'pictistic' His most famous work, Phases of Faith (1850), is a curious counterpart to his brother's Apologia, being also an autobiographical account of religious development. But in his progress Francis was steadily drawn away from Instorical Christianity towards a theism which did not insist on immortably. The Phases led to much controversy, and produced Henry Rogers's Lelipse of Latth, with a reply and counter reply Theism appeared in 1858, and was follo ed by four volumes of Miscellanies (1869-90). Other works were a dictionary and handbool of modern Arabic, two mathematical volumes (1886-89), and a small bool on his brother (1891), and he was responsible for over fifty books, treatives, or pumphilets in all. He was a keen vegetarian, total abstitute, and anti-tobacconist, and was is well ment against vaccination as against vivisection.

Thomas Guthric (1803-73) came from Brechin to study in I dinburgh for the ministry, and after filling a cure in his native county he rose finally to a clinrge in Ldinburgh, v here his cloquence and his I thours to reclaim the degraded population won for him a high repute. In 1843 he helped to found the Free Church, and till 1864 attracted to his church of Free St John's crowded audiences, which comprised all the strangers who came to Edin for many years he was by fir the most cloquent preacher in Scotland. Be ides commen taries, sermons, and devotional works, he published a memorable book on social problems. Tex City its hims and Sorro es, and he was the first ed for of The Sunday Magazine, from 1864 In 1845-46 he rused in eleven months £116,000 for providing Free Church manses in 1847 he published his first (of three) Plex for Raggal Schools. A man of imposing presence, magnificent voice and most genial and winning character, Dr Guthrie also used his singular gifts of orators, of humour and pathos, in the cause of temperance and of compulsory education. His Autoriografity was edited by his sons (1874-75)

The Beginnings of Ragged Schools

My first interest in the cause of Ragged Schools was awal ened by a picture which I saw in Anstruther on the shores of the Firth of Forth - It represented a cobbler's room, he was there himself, spectacles on nose, an old shoe between his I nees, that massive forchead and firm mouth indicating great determination of character and from beneath his shagey exchrows benevolence glermed out on a group of poor children, some sitting, some s and ing, but all but at their lessons around him by this scene, we turned from his picture to the inscription below and with growing wonder read how this man, by name John Pounds, by trade a cobbler in Ports mouth, had taken pits on the ragged children, whom minister and magistrates, ladies and gentlemen, were lewing to run wild, and go to ruin on their streets, how, like a good shepherd, he had gone forth to gather in these outcasts, how he had trained them up in virtue and know ledge, and how, looking for no fame, no recompense from man, lie, single handed, while earning his duly bread by the swent of his face, had, ere he ched, rescued from ruin and saved to society no fewer than five hundred children

I confess that I felt humbled I felt ashamed of myself I well remember saying to my companion, in the enthusiasm of the moment—and in my calmer and cooler hours I have seen no reason for unsaying it- 'That man is an honour to liumanity He has deserved the tallest monument ever rused on British shores t was John Pounds only a benevolent man He was a genius in his way, at any rate he was ingenious, and if he could not catch a poor boy in any other way, like Laul he would win him by guile. He was sometimes seen hunting down a ragged archin on the quays of Ports month, and compelling hun to come to school, not he the power of a policeman, but a potato' lle knew the love of an Irishman for a potato, and might be seen running alongside an unwilling loop with one held under his nose, with a temper as hot and a cost as ragged as his own Strolling one day with a friend among the romantic section of the erroy and green valleys around Arthur's Seat, we came at length to St Inthony's Well, and sat down on the great black stone beside it to have a talk with the ragged boy who pur ue their calling there Their tinn is [tin dishes] were read; with a dringht of the clear cold water in hope of a halfpenny begin to question their about schools. As to the boys themselves, one i as fatherless, the son of a poor widow the father of the other was alive, but a man of lov, habits and Indich racter. Both were poorly clothed had never been at school, the other had sometimes attended a Sabbath school. Encouraged by the success of Sheriff Watson, who had the honour to lead the enter prise, the idea of a Ragged School was then floating in my brain and so with reference to the scheme, and by way of experiment, I said "Would you go to school if-b-ides your learning-you were to get breakfast, dinner, and supper there?' It would have done any man's heart good to have seen the flash of joy that broke from the eyes of one of them, the flush of pleasure on his chirk, as-hearing of three sure meak a daythe boy leaped to his feet and exclaimed 'As will I, sir, and bring the hall lar I [the whole tenement or flat] too,' and then, as if afraid I might with lraw what seemed to lum so large and munificent an offer, he exclaimed 'I'll come for but my dinner, sir!'

William Crowe (1745-1829) son of a Berk shire carpenter who worked at Winchester, became a chorister in the college chapel was elected a poor scholar of Winchester College, and passing to New College at Oxford, became Fellow and From 1784 lie was rector of Alton Barnes in Wiltshire, and from 1787 public orator of the university His smooth blank verse Levesdon Hill, which helped to inspire Coleridge, was printed anonymously in 1788, and, much amplified, was reprinted with other poems in 1804 and Crowe, who was almost a Republican in polities, published several sermons. Latin orations, a treatise on versification, and an edition of Collins's poems His verses were praised by Wordsworth, Rogers, and Moore, as well as by Coleradge

Anssau William Senior (1790-1864), political economist and 'prince of interviewers,' was born at Compton Beauchamp, Berks, the son of a Wiltshire vicar, and great grandson of Aaron Señor, a naturalised Spanish Jew, Nassau Thomas being the name of Aaron's son From Eton he passed to Magdalen College, Oxford, where in 1812 he took a distinguished first class in classics. In 1819 he was called to the Bar, in 1825-30, and again in 1847-62, was Professor of Political Economy at Oxford, in 1832 was appointed a Poor law Commissioner, and in 1836-53 was a Master in Chancery From the first he was eminently hospitable, sociable, and popular, and amongst his friends and intimates were Whately, Sydney Smith, Cornewall Lewis, De Tocqueville, and Cavour He had an eager desire to reform the English poor law and as he was the author of the report on which the new law of 1834 was founded, he had a principal share in that epoch making revolution in social economy He travelled nineli, and wrote much for the Quarterly and Lamburga Returns and other leading periodicals, his reviews of the Wiverley Novels attracting much notice, and his article in the I dinbuoy! on Lamby Four doing much to bring Thickeris's work into notice. Senior takes the most conspicuous place amongst English economists between Ricardo and J. S. Mill, following Ricardo in the main, he is much more readable and less abstract and absolute. He wrote on population, on wages, on money, and a complete treatise on Political I conom, his score of published works includes Biographical Sketches (1863, Essays on Fiction (1864), Historical and Philosophical Lesays (1865) fournals, Conversations, and Essays relating to Ireland (1868), Journals Lept in France (1871) Conscisations with Thiers, Guizat, and other Distinguished Persons during the Secord Linguist (1678-80), and Courtersations in Ley pt and Malta (1882) It was in Paris during the movement of 1848 that he began to keep that full journal in which he recorded, in a manner as yet unprecedented, the substance of his conversations with famous and influential men. He had keen insight, a happy dialectic or maicutic faculty, an admirable (but discriminating) memory, and a precise but facile pen. True it is that he had not a perfect dramatic gift the speeches of his friends bear the hall mark of his own mind and style, it is not so much for dramatic point and brilliance as for political knowledge that the conversations are valuable. He could distinguish between private confidences and matters discrectly to be put on record, and so lost no friends and retained reads access to unlimited stores of information frequently had the conversations revised by the interlocutors, and though he was a Wing and of decided opinions, his mind was judicial and his representations have been accepted as eminently Bagehot, a good judge, regarded the Corre spondence and Conversations with De Tocqueville (1871) as one of the most charming books of Senior's journals were mostly that generation published after his death by his daughter, Mrs Simpson, who in 1898 issued Many Memories of See Grant Duff in Nincteenth Many People Century, August 1878

Samuel Warren (1807-77), born in Denbigh shire, studied medicine at Edinburgh and law at the Inner Temple, was called to the Bar and made 1 QC (1851), he was Recorder of Hull 1854-74, Conservative member for Midhurst 1856-59, and ultimately a Master in Lunacy In Edinburgh he had got to know Kit North, De Quincey, and the Blackwood set, and his first literary worl, Passages from the Drary of a Late Physician, appeared in Black wood's Magazine in 1832-37, published separately as a book, the Diary was often reprinted, translated, and pirated, spite of the fact that the pathos is mankish and the stories many of them not a little melodramatic Ten Thonsand a Year also appeared in Black-vood (from 1839) 'Inttle but Titmouse' and some of the other characters were manifestly caricatures of recognis thle persons, the whole was found highly entertaining, a good many defects were overlooked, and the public were almost as enthusiastic about the story as the author himself, who was glid to believe he had cut out Dickens and most of his contemporaries The story certainly has had the success of being translated into various tongues and often reprinted Now and Then, a third story, had only a trunsient success, though it ran through several editions After the Great Exhibition of 1851 Warren pub lished a slight work, The Lily and the Ree, which, calling itself 'an apologue of the Crystal Palace,' was generally voted almost inconcensably puerile. He also edited Blackstone's Commentaires, wrote some respectable law books and some pamphlets on political, social, and religious questions, and reprinted in two volumes a number of reviews from Blackwood as Viscellanies (1854)

Thomas Wade (1805-75), born at Woodbridge in Suffolk, published his first volume of poems, Tasso and the Sisters, in 1825, in which already the influence of Shelley was visible, but is best known by his Mundi et Cordis Carmina (1835), frequently also cited as Songs of the Universe and of the Heart One tragedy, Duke Andrea, was acted with success in 1828, another, The few of Arragon, was howled down in 1830 as being too friendly to the Jews, The Phrenologists (1830), his one farce, was well received Of two other dramas one is lost, the other remains in manuscript Subsequently Wide published a number of verse pamphlets, Death and Love, Helena, &c., 1 poem based on a story from a French translation of Mickiewicz, and a translation of Dante's Inferno in Dante's own stanza, and a series of sonnets

We Buxton Forman tried to revive interest in Wade, and printed selections of his poetry in Miles's Poets of the Century (1891-96) see also Literary Ancedotes of the Mineteenth Century, by Dr W R Nicoll and Mr T J Wise (1895-96)

William Drennan (1754-1820), the Tyrtæus of the United Irish movement at the end of the eighteenth century, and the reputed author of the familiar expression 'the Emerald Isle,' was the son of a Presbyterian minister of Belfast, where he was

Drennan was educated at Glasgov University, and graduated there in 1771. Subsequently he studied medicine at Ldinburgh, where he be came the pupil and friend of Dugald Stewart. Settling in the north of Ireland as a physician, Drennan was early drawn into the Irish Volunteer In 1789 he moved to Dublin, where movement he became connected with I A Emmet, Wolfe Tone, and others, and in 1791 wrote the first state ment of the objects of the United Irish Society, of which he was one of the founders In the next few years Drennan produced a succession of lyrics which, from their appropriateness to the state of feeling largely prevailing in Ireland at the time, became widely popular. Of these the poems, 'To the Memory of William Orr' and 'When Lam first rose from the dark swelling flood'-in which the phrase 'the Linerald Isle' first occurs-achieved the widest incasure of popularity In 1807 Drennan, who by this time had retired from politics, returned to Belfast, where he founded the Belfast Magazine In 1815 his lyrics were collected in a volume of Fugitive Pieces, a title which sufficiently expresses the occasional character of Drennan's verse, though it hardly does justice to the powerful influence which some at least of his poetry undoubtedly excreed on his countrynien

Erin

When I'rin first rose from the dail swelling flood God bless of the green island, and saw it was pool. The em'rald of I urope it sport led and shone— In the ring of the world the most precious sione. In her sun, in her soil, in her station thrice blest, With her back towards Britain, her free to the West, Lrin stands proudly in ular on her steep shore, And strikes her high harp 'mid the ocean's deep for

But when its soft tones seem to mourn and to weep. The dark chain of silence is thrown our the deep. At the thought of the past the tears gush from her eves. And the pulse of her heart makes her white bosom rise Oh's sons of green Lrin, lament o'er the time. When religion was war, and our country a crime, When man in God's image inverted. His plan and moulded his God in the image of man.

Alas! for poor Lrin, that some are still seen. Who would doe the grass red from their hatred to green. Yet oh! when you're up and they 're down, let them live. Then yield them that mercy which they would not give. Arm of Erin, be strong! but he gentle as brave! And, uplifted to strike, he as ready to save! I et no feeling of vengeance presume to defile. The cause or the men of the I merald Isle.

The cause it is good, and the men they are true,
And the Green shall outlive both the Orange and Blue!
And the triumphs of Frin her daughters shall share
With the full swelling chest and the fair flowing hair
Their bosom heaves high for the worthy and brave,
But no coward shall rest in that soft, swelling wave
Men of Lrin! awake and make haste to be blest!
Rise! Arch of the Ocean and Queen of the West.

Cresar Otway (1780-1842), not the least gifted of the school of writers who in the second quarter of the nineteenth century adorned the Irish capital, was born in County Tipperary After graduating at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1801, he took orders as a clergyman of the Church of Ireland, and passed the best years of his life as an unknown country curate. Appointed to the chaplaincy of the Magdalen Asylum, Otway came to Dublin, where in 1825 he started a religious magazine, The Christian Examiner To the pages of this periodical—in which many of Carleton's Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry first appeared—Otway contributed a series of sketches of rural Ireland, in which he embodied the results of an intimate acquaintance with the less-known districts of Ireland, and of a thorough insight into the peculiarities of Irish life and character Combining a distinct talent for descriptive writing with a warm appreciation of Irish scenery and remarkable antiquarian knowledge, these papers at once became popular They were republished under the title of Sketches in Ireland (1827), and were followed, after a long interval, by A Tour in Connaught (1839) and Stetches in Erris and Tyrawly (1841) Though all three volumes were published anonymously their authorship was no secret, and Otway acquired a reputation which still endures in Ireland He took part with Petrie in founding the well-known antiquarian magazine, the Dublin Penny Journal, and was a frequent contributor to the Dublin University Maga-Though a strong Conservative in politics and a pronounced evangelical Churchman, Otway thoroughly understood Ireland and the Irish sketches of the peasantry are marked by a kindly humour and a generous sympathy, while his feeling for nature was as deep as it was happily expressed His Sketches will always have a value as authentic pictures of the Ireland which vanished with the famine of 1847

The Poolnashanthana

We now ascended the hill a little higher, and came to a chasm that yawned unexpectedly at our feet. It was about fifty yards long and about ten wide, and down about eighty feet below you saw the sea as green and elear as an emerald, rising and heaving softly and har moniously, and disclosing many fathoms deep all the magnificent and beauteously tinted vegetations that adorn the caverns of the ocean Sunk in the middle of the fair plain, you cannot at first imagine how came the sea here, but by and by you see that it is open at both ends, that in fact the roof of a great sea cave, that has penetrited through this promontory, has fallen in, and you learn that you can enter at the north-east of the promontory, and passing along in a boat for nearly half a mile, can come out at its south western side, and that this is a great skylight, by which the sun and air are admitted into the recesses and sonorous labyrinths of this great excavation It is called Poolnashanthana There are many of the kind on this coast, and I had already observed a fine one in the Mullet of Erris But this one at Downpatrick Head is far and away the deepest, the largest, the grandest I have seen, and is certainly a great natural curiosity At the bottom of this chasm there is a ledge of rock, perhaps the remains of the fallen in roof, which is bare when the tide is out, and which, covered as it is with sea vegetations that never have been disturbed, presents a perch for the cormorant and a bed for the seal, and around which the lobster crawls and hunts its prey amid the translucent recesses.

On a soft, sunny day, when all above and below is still, it is pleasant to wear away the lazy hour in looking down from above, and ponder on the beautiful contrasts of light and shade that this cavern presents, to see the men rock painted by nature's own hand with ochres, red, brown, and yellow, lichens scarlet, white, orange -crystallisations of lime, iron, or silex, sparkling where a sunbeam brightened them Down below, the starfish and medusa, florting in purple beauty and spreading out their efflorescent rays, while every now and then the quiet modulations of the incoming tide, as they sigh below, are broken in upon by the cooing of the sea pigeon in its safe fastness, or the hourse shriek of the caitiff cormorant, as it reposes after the success of its fishing in the calm deep. I would like to spend some of the few idle days my lot allows me in this busy world lianging over this Poolnashanthana, and in quiet loneliness admiring how beautiful and grand and good God is in His multitudinous creations.

Thomas Moore,

one of the most accomplished poets, and certainly the most successful Irish man of letters of the nineteenth century, was born on the 28th May 1779 in Dublin, where his father was a grocer and wine merchant of humble position He was educated by Mr Whyte, then a well known Dublin schoolmaster, and in 1794 entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he was one of the first to take advantage of the admission of Roman Catholics to the studies of the university A natural leaning to popular views in politics led to a close friendship with Robert Emmet, which involved Moore in some trouble with the authorities of the college, but he was acquitted of complicity with the United Irish Society, and neither then nor later does Moore appear to have held views more advanced than those of the Whig leaders with whom he was to become so intimately associated tained, however, a cordial admiration for Emmet, and never lost an opportunity of testifying to the nobility of character possessed by his early friend.

Moore early developed the talent for versification and the taste for music which he was to combine to such great advantage, and even from his entrance into college had contributed sundry verses to Dublin periodicals. As early as 1794, in his sixteenth year, he had published in the Anthologia Hibernica a paraphrase of the fifth ode of Anacreon, and by the time he had left college he had completed his translation of the verses attributed to that writer. In 1799, having taken his degree, he proceeded to London, to enter at the Middle Temple with a view to joining the Bar, taking with him his translations, which had received in manuscript the approval of competent critics. In 1800 the Odes appeared, under the patronage of the Prince Regent, to whom Moore had been presented by influential Irish friends with whom the poet's remarkable social gifts had made him popular. Moore's version of the Greek poet, though it had about it much more of Moore than of Anacreon, caught the taste of the day, and his reputation was at once made. At two and twenty he had become the fashion in the most exclusive salons of London, he sang, improvised, and chatted with easy gaiety for the amusement of his patrons, and was, as he wrote at this time, 'happy, careless, comical, everything I could wish' In 1801 he published his first volume of original poetry, Poems by the late Thomas Little, which were much admired and served to increase his fame, and in which, though the inspiration of his highest poetry was wanting, he displayed a lively fancy, an agreeable sparkle, and a remarkable facility for versification

In 1803 Moore received, through the patronage of Lord Moira, an Admiralty appointment at Bermuda, but he soon found that the expectation of valuable receipts from prize causes which had been held out to him would not be realised, and in 1804 he returned to England, leaving his duties to the care of a deputy. In 1806 appeared his Epistles, Oiles, and other Poems, with a dedication to Lord Moira, his constant friend. The contents of this volume were chiefly written during his absence from Europe, and were much coloured by allusions to America, which Moore had visited on his way home, and of whose institutions he had formed an unfavourable judgment. In his preface he spoke with unmeasured disapproval of American politics, and of the state of American society, both of which were severely satirised in his Epistles Unfortunately he said 'just enough to offend, and by no means sufficient to convince,' and his book was in consequence most unfavourably reviewed by Jeffrey in the Edinburgh. The acrimony of the article led to a challenge and a hostile meeting, which happily had none but ludicrous results. Ultimately, through the mediation of Rogers, the critic apologised, and the poet became a regular contributor to the review in which he had been maligned

The year 1807 witnessed a much more successful literary venture. In conjunction with Sir John Stevenson, who adapted the music of familiar Irish airs, Moore published the first number of his Trish Melodies With these he at once achieved a popularity which was not confined to the compara? tively narrow circle in which he had previously/ been admired. The Melodies long retained the hold upon the English public which they immediately acquired, with the Irish they have never lost it. National verse wedded to national musicif and brightened in every line by the poet's charm, and felicity of sentiment and language, the Irish Melodies served to symbolise the national aspirations of Ireland in a form which touched without offending the susceptibilities of the sister people, and Moore displayed in his handling of his theme! a tact which was as remarkable as the technical. Though occasionally marred, finish of his songs by an excess of epigram which scarcely harmonised with the subjects of his verse, the Melodies as a whole display Moore's lyrical genius at its highest; and the topics to which they relate lent them the dignity which is sometimes wanting in their author's? Muse. Few literary enterprises have ever been better remunerated Moore received a hundred guineas for each song in a series of above one, hundred and thirty, but the publication was spreadover a period of more than twenty-five years. Akin? to the Irish Melodies, but less naturally inspired and on the whole much inferior to them; is the series of National Airs (1815), but the latter contains some of Moore's most characteristic verses, and in particular one of the most familiar, of all, the well-known 'Oft, in the Stilly Night?" Sacred Songs (1816), also in the same vein, have - 别年遗传 little to commend them

In 1813 Moore, who had previously tried his hand unsuccessfully as a satirist in three ambiatious pieces, Corruption, Intolerance, and The Sceptic, a philosophical satire—of which the first dwelt upon the ill effects on Ireland of the Revolution of 1688—fell back on his earlier manner. Adapting to political topics the turn for epigram which had been so marked in his Odes and Epistles, he devoted himself to the congenial task of lampooning the Prince Regent and his circle, to the great delight of the Whig politicians, who felt themselves aggrieved by the desertion of their

Moore contrived to cover the former patron. Prince and his Ministers with a ridicule as galling as it was diverting, and his lampoons, republished in The Twopenny Post Bag (1813), ran rapidly Nothing that Moore through several editions attempted in his long career better suited his powers than these admirable pasquinades, and in the Fudge Fanily is Paris (1818), as well as in a series of saturical verses of a similar kind-Fables for the Holy Alliance, Odes upon Cash. Corn, and Catholics, and Tom Cribs Menorial to Congress—he illustrated still further a talent for political saure which no English writer in the same kind has surpassed or indeed equalled

Moore was now at the zenith of his fame, and even the splendour of Byron's rising star could not eclipse his extraordinary reputation. With that amazing genius, whose life he was afterwards to write and with whose name his own is so closely associated in so many ways, Moore was already on terms of friendship. The influence of the younger on the elder poet, whose genus was essentially imitative, was plainly allown both in Moore's choice of a subject for his next important performance and in his mode of handling it Rocks, commenced in 1815, was published in 1817 and at once led to comparisons not unfavourable to Moore with Byron and Scott, whose inetrical methods were followed by the Irish poet great was the repute of Moore that he received from Longmans for this poem the immense suin of £3000. Moore caught with great felicity the Oriental tone and colouring, and the work which should never be read apart from its admirable prose setting, is certainly a maryellous metrical But there is a note of artificiality tour-de-force about the whole, and even the strongest passages of the pocin are lacking in sincerity of passion or emotion

In 1818, owing to defileations by his deputy at Bermuda, Moore was obliged to seel refuge in Paris from his creditors, and remained abroad for three years. During his absence he wrote The Loves of the Angels, with the exception of Lalla Roof h the longest and most ambitious of his works but much inferior in quality and treatment to the Oriental tale. As in the case of the earlier work, this poem evinces very markedly the influence of Byron. He also virote at this period a prose fiction, The Efreurean, published in 1827.

For the remaining years of his career Moore's industry was chiefly devoted to prose. In 1824 he wrote the Memoirs of Captain Rack, in which the abuses of the Irish Church establishment were severely satirised, and in 1827 a Life of Sheridan, which showed emisderable biographical skill—In 1830 Moore produced in his Life of Byron one of the best known and most criticised books in the language. No literary contemporary was so well fitted as Moore to be the biographer of his friend, and he liad been marked out for the task by Byron's gift of his own Memoirs. His exercise of a discretion he was entitled to use in destroying a work which, whatever its faults, must have abounded in personal interest, has been much canvassed. It is certain that no one in Moore's position would now act as Moore acted, but not so certain that Moore was not in the right. At any rate it is impossible not to admire his loyalty to a friend's memory and the unselfish spirit which he showed in this action. Moore's biography did much to set Byron right with the public opinion of his contemporaries, and can never be entirely superseded, while his edition of Byron's works has only very recently been displaced as the standard publication.

In 1831 appeared the Lafe of Lord Earward Litz-Gerald, a task for which Moore was well qualified. and in 1834 lie returned, in Tra els of an Irish Gertlen an in Sear of of a Religion, to the subject he had touched in the Memoirs of Captain Lock A History of Ireland which he undertook about this time is despitute of merit of any kind, but it was written in ill health and with declining powers. and is therefore no fair specimen of Moore's capacity in this form of composition latter years, from the publication of this work in 1846 were spent in the shadow of continually decreasing health, and from 1840 to his death on the 25th of February 1852 his state was little better than that of Swift's closing years. Despite the liberalit with which his work was remuneratedhe received, as he states in his Diara not less than £20,000 for converght—his circumstances were almost continuously embarrissed, but the friend ship of Lord Melbourne alleviated his anxieties by the bestownl in 1835 of a literary pension of £300 a year. To this was added in 1850 a Civil List pension of £100 to Mrs Moore

It was the fortune of Moore to achieve among his contemporaries a reputation for in excess of that to which his talents entitled him. But the reaction has been equal and opposite, and it has been his fate to be as unduly belittled by posterity as he was once extravagantly behauded. It is easy to institute comparisons with Byron and Scott, or contrasts with Wordsworth and Shelley, which are not to But however unfavourable Moore's advantige the conclusions which may be drawn by such methods of criticism, they cannot affect the title of the author of such varied work as the Irish Melodies, Lalla Rookh, the Twopenny Post Bag, and the Life of By ron to be considered is the most versatile writer of a period singularly wealthy in literary merit of every kind 'A man who was courted and esteemed by Lord Lansdowne, Mr Canning, Sir Robert Pecl, Rogers, Sydney Smith, Sir Walter Scott, and Lord Byron must,' says I ord John Russell, 'line and social as well as literary ments of no common order? But in truth the testimony of such men to his poetical ability is even more striking than their tribute to his social worth, and posterity may not lightly assail a reputation so powerfully guaranteed Few writers have ever succeeded in a greater degree in attracting the admiration of those whose praise is in itself distinction, and though it be true that the homage rendered to Moore by his contemporaries was largely increased by his rare personal charm, the impression he created in the minds of the best judges of his day must not be wholly lost sight of in estimating his position as a poet His origin considered, the rapidity with which Moore won his way to the affectionate regard of the most distinguished men in English politics and letters is a sufficient proof of Moore's great personal attractiveness, while the fact that he never lost through life the friendships he so easily acquired is the best evidence of the real sincerity and rectitude which formed the basis of a character essentially loving and lovable.

At the Mid Hour of Night.

At the mid hour of night, when stars are weeping, I fly To the lone vale we loved, when life shone warm in thine eye.

And I think oft, if spirits can steal from the region of air

To revisit past seenes of delight, thou wilt come to me there,

And tell me our love is remembered, even in the sky

Then I sing the wild song 'twis once such a pleasure to hear'

When our voices, commingling, breathed like one on the ear.

And, as echo far off through the vale my sad or son rolls,

I think, O my love! 'tis thy voice from the kingdom of souls,

Faintly answering still the notes that once were so dear

When He who Adores Thee

When he who adores thee has left but the name
Of his faults and his sorrows behind,
Oh! say wilt thou weep, when they darken the fame
Of a life that for thee was resigned?
Yes, weep, and however my foes may condemn,
Thy tears shall efface their decree,
For Heaven can witness, though guilty to them,
I have been but too faithful to thee.

With thee were the dreams of my carliest love,

Every thought of my reason was thine,

In my last humble prayer to the Spirit above,

Thy name shall be mingled with mine.

Oh! blest are the lovers and friends who shall live

The days of thy glory to see,

But the next dearest blessing that Heaven can give

Is the pride of thus dying for thee

She is far from the Land.

She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps, And lovers around her are sighing But coldly she turns from their gaze and weeps, For her heart in his grave is lying

She sings the wild songs of her dear native plains,

Every note that he loved awaking—

Ah! little they think, who delight in her strains,

How the heart of the minstrel is breaking!

He had lived for her love—for his country he died,
They were all that to life had entwined him—
Nor soon shall the tears of his country be dried,
Nor long will his love stry behind him!

Oh! make her a grave where the sunbeams rest,
When they promise a glorious morrow,
They'll shine o'er her sleep, like a smile from the west.
From her own loved island of sorrow

Ech

How sweet the answer Echo makes
To music at night,
When, roused by lute or horn, she wakes,
And far away, o'er hwns and lakes,
Goes answering light!

Yet Love hath echoes truer far,
And far more sweet,
Than e'er beneath the moonlight's star,
Of horn, or lute, or soft guitar,
The songs repeat

'Tis when the sigh is quite sincere—
And only then—
The sigh that 's breathed for one to hear
Is by that one, that only dear,
Breathed back again!

The Light of other Days

Oft, in the stilly night,

Ere Slumler's chain hath bound me,

Fond Memory brings the light

Of other days around me,

The smiles, the tears

Of boyhood's years,

The words of love then spoken,

The eves that shone,

Now dimmed and gone,

The cheerful hearts now broken!

Thus, in the stilly night,

Ere Slumber's chain hith bound me,

Sad Memory brings the light

Of other days around me.

When I remember all
The friends so linked together,
I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in wintry weather
I feel like one
Who trends alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dend,
And all but he departed!
Thus, in the stilly night,
Ere Slumber's chain hath bound me,
Sad Meinory brings the light
Of other days around me.

As Slow our Ship

As slow our ship her foamy track
Against the wind was cleaving,
Her trembling pennant still looked back
To that dear isle 'twas leaving
So loth we part from all we love,
From all the links that bind us,
So turn our hearts, as on we rove,
To those we've left behind us!

When round the bowl, of vanished years
We talk with joyous seeming—
With smiles that might as well be tears,
So faint, so sad their beaming,
While memory brings us back again
Each early tie that twined us,
Oh, sweet's the cup that circles then
To those we've left behind us!

And when, in other climes, we meet
Some isle or vile enchanting,
Where all looks flowery, wild, and sweet,
And nought but love is wanting,
We think how great had been our bliss
If Heaven had but assigned us
To live and die in scenes like this,
With some we've left belind us

As travellers oft look back at eve,
When eastward darkly going,
To gaze upon that light they leave,
Still faint behind them glowing,—
So, when the close of pleasure's day
To gloom hath near consigned us,
We turn to catch one fading ray
Of joy that's left behind us

The Last Rose of Summer

Tis the last rose of summer Left blooming alone, All her lovely companions Are fided and gone, No flower of her kindred, No rose bud is nigh, To reflect back her blushes, Or give sigh for sigh

I'll not leave thee, lone one '
To pine on thy stem,
Since the lovely are sleeping,
Go, sleep thou with them
Thus kindly I scatter
Thy leaves o'er the bed,
Where thy mates of the garden
Lie scentless and dead

So soon may I follow,
When friendships decay,
And from Love's shining circle
The gems drop away
When true hearts lie withered,
And fond ones are flown,
Oh! who would inhabit
This bleak world alone?

A Vision

'Up,' said the Spirit, and, ere I could pray
One hasty orison, whirled me away
To a limbo, lying—I wist not where—Above or below, in earth or air,
For it glimmered o'er with a doubtful light,
One couldn't say whether 'twas day or night,
And 'twas crost by many a mazy track,
One didn't know how to get on or back,
And I felt like a needle that's going astray (With its one eye out) through a bundle of hay,

When the Spirit he grinned and whispered me, 'Thou'rt now in the Court of Chancery'

I looked and I saw a wizard rise, With a wig like a cloud before men's eyes, In his aged hand he held a wand, Wherewith he beckoned his embryo band, And they moved and moved, as he waved it o'er, But they never got on one inch the more, And still they kept limping to and fro, Like Ariels round old Prospero-And I heard the while that wizard elf Muttering, muttering spells to himself, While o'er as many papers he turned As Hume ere moved for, or Omar burned He talked of his Virtue, though some, less nice, He owned, with a sigh, preferred his Vice-And he said 'I think,' 'I doubt,' 'I hope,' Called God to witness, and damned the Pope, With many more sleights of tongue and hand I couldn't for the soul of me understand Amazed and posed, I was just about To ask his name, when the screams without, The merciless clacks of the imps within, And that conjurer's mutterings, made such a din That startled I woke-leaped up in my bed-Found the Spirit, the imps and the conjurer fled, And blessed my stars, right pleased to sec That I wasn't as yet in Chancery

(From Odes on Cash, Corn, Catholics, &c.)

The Vale of Cashmere

Who has not heard of the Vale of Cashmere,
With its roses the brightest that earth ever gave,
Its temples and grottos, and fountains as clear
As the love lighted eyes that hang over their wave?
Oh! to see it at sunset—when warm o'er the lake
Its splendour at parting a summer eve throws,
Like a bride full of blushes, when lingering to take A last look at her mirror at night ere she goes!—

When the shrines through the foliage are gleaming half shown,

And each hallows the hour by some rites of its own

Here the music of prayer from a minaret swells,

Here the Magian his urn full of perfume is swinging,
And here, at the altar, a zone of sweet bells
Round the waist of some fair Indian dancer is ringing
Or to see it by moonlight—when mellowly shines
The light o'er its palaces, gardens, and shinnes,
When the waterfalls gleam like a quick fall of stars,
And the nightingale's hymn from the Isle of Chenars
Is broken by lrughs and light echoes of feet [meet —
From the cool, shining walks where the young people
Or at morn, when the magic of drylight awakes
A new wonder each minute, as slowly it breaks,
Hills, cupolas, fountains called forth every one
Out of darkness, as they were just born of the Sun

Hills, cupolas, fountains called forth every one
Out of darkness, as they were just born of the Sun
When the spirit of fragrance is up with the day,
From his Harem of night flowers stealing away,
And the wind, full of wantonness, woos like a lover
The young aspen trees, till they tremble all over
When the East is as warm as the light of first hopes,
And Day, with his banner of radiance unfurled,

Shines in through the mountainous portal that opes
Sublime from that valley of bliss to the world!

(From 'The Light of the Harem' in Lalla Rooks.)

Namouna, the Enchantress

Hence is it, too, that Nourmahal, Amid the luxuries of this hour, Far from the joyous festival, Sits in her own sequestered bower, With no one near to soothe or aid But that inspired and wondrous maid, Namouna, the enchantress-onc O er whom his golden race the sun For unremembered years has run Yet never saw her blooming brow I ounger or fairer than 'tis now Nay rather, as the west wind's sigh Freshens the flower it passes by, Time's wing but seemed, in stealing o'er, To leave her lovelier than before Yet on her smiles a sadness hung And when, as oft, she spoke or sung Of other worlds, there came a light From her dark eyes so strangely bright, That all believed nor man nor earth Were conscious of Namouna's birth

(From The Light of the Harem in Lalla Rookh)

The Memoirs, Journal, and Correspondence of Thomas Moore were edited by Lord John Russell who applied the £3000 paid by Longmans for the copyright to the benefit of Moore's widow. This work, published in 1856 is in many respects most unsatisfactory, but remains the only Memoir of the poet on a large scale. Moore's poetical works were collected and edited by himself in 1842 with autobiographic introductions to the principal pieces.

C LITTON FALKINER

James Wills (1790-1868) was the younger son of a Roscommon squire of good estate and of Cornish extraction He was educated near Dublin, and entered Trinity College, Dublin, in Here he formed one of a brilliant coterie of undergraduates, among whom the best-known name is that of Charles Wolfe the poet In 1821 he entered at the Middle Temple with the intention of being called to the Bar, but the loss of a considerable fortune through the improvidence of an elder brother left him without the means of pursuing a legal career. He returned to Ireland, and, having married, in 1822 he settled near Dublin He took orders in the same year, but being for a time without preferment, he devoted himself eagerly to literary pursuits, which were thenceforth the main interest of his life. He became an active contributor, both in prose and verse, to the Dublin University Magazine, Blackwood's Magazine, the Dublin Penny Journal, and other periodicals Later he was connected with the Irish Quarterly Review In 1831 he published in Dublin The Disembodied and other Poems, being a collection of poems written during several years, and in 1835 there appeared the Philosophy of Unbelief, a work which had a wide vogue in its day, and in which the author's strong bent for metaphysical speculation asserted itself. By this time Wills had been nominated to a curacy in Kilkenny, the county in which most of his subsequent life was passed, and in which he held successively two important parishes his clerical duties interfered but little with his literary activity, and in 1839 he published the first volume of an important biographical work, Lives of Illustrions and Distinguished Irishmen, which occupied him for several years. This work was subsequently reissued under the rather misleading title of The Irish Nation Though scarcely designed on any scientific principle, it was prose cuted with great industry, and is still valuable for its notices of many minor figures in Irish history and literature who are not elsewhere commemorated. Wills's other original contributions to literature in clude Dramatic Sketches and other Poems (1845), The Idolatress and other Poems (1868), as well as several theological publications His longer poems give evidence of a strong dramatic instinct, while his shorter pieces are frequently spirited and even powerful, and indicate the striking personality and many-sided sympathies of their author. Wills was the father of the well-known nineteenth century dramatist, W G Wills

To the Minstrel O'Connellan

Whenever harp note ringeth Ierne's isle around, Thy hand its sweetness ringeth, Surpassing mortal sound, Thy spirit music speaketh Above the ministrel throng, And thy rival vainly seeketh The secret of thy song

In the castle, in the shieling,
In foreign kingly hall,
Thou art master of each feeling,
And honoured first of all!
Thy wild and wizard finger
Sweepeth chords unknown to art,
And melodies that linger
In the memories of the heart

Though fairy music slumbers
By forest glade and hill,
In thy unearthly numbers
Men say 'tis living still '
All its compass of wild sweetness
Thy master hand obeys,
As its airy, fitful fleetness
O'er harp and heart-string plays.

By thee the thrill of anguish
Is softly fulled to rest,
By thee the hopes that languish,
Rekindled in the breast
Thy spirit chaseth sorrow
Like morning mists away,
And gaily robes to morrow
In the gladness of thy lay

Thomas Colley Grattan (1792-1864) was the son of a Dublin solicitor, read law for a time, became a militia officer, lived much in Paris and Brussels, and for a while was consul in Boston, US He commenced his literary career with a poetical romance entitled Philibert (1819) In 1823 up peared his Highways and Byways, picturesque tales of Continental wandering and adventure. These were so well received that he wrote a second series, published in 1825, and a third in 1827. In 1830 he ventured on a novel in four volumes, The Heiress of Bruges, a Tale of the Year Stateen Hundred, dealing with the Flemish struggle against the Spaniards. He produced also Tales of Travel, histories of the Netherlands and of Switzerland, and some twenty works in all, including a tragedy, several novels, and books on America. His pictures of ordinary life in French provinces, sketched with cheerful observant spirit as he wandered in highways and byways, were perhaps his best work.

Richard Lalor Sheil (1791-1851) was a distinguished ornament of that school of Irish rhetoric in which Grattan's is the most illustrious name The son of a retired Cadiz mercliant, a native of Tipperary, he was born at Drumdowney, County Kilkenny He received his school education in England, first at the establishment of a Trench emigré at Kensington, and afterwards at Stonyhurst In 1807 Sheil matriculated at Trinity Four years later he entered College, Dublin Lincoln's Inn, but his call to the Irish Bar was deferred through straitened means until 1814 defray the expenses preliminary to his admission to the Four Courts he wrote Adelaide, the first of a series of plays which were to engage his leisure in the next few years Sheil, however, though possessed of considerable literary gifts, was no Sheridan, and it cannot be said that his plays are undeserving of the oblivion that has overtaken them. What success they enjoyed in their day was due mainly to the fine acting of Miss O'Neil The defect which was noted in most of them-that the interest was too exclusively concentrated on the heroine—was doubt less due to their being written largely to suit that actress The most fortunate, and perhaps the most deservedly fortunate, of these dramatic efforts was Evadue, produced in 1819 Sheil's progress at the Bar was slow, nor did he ever attain a commanding position there. His earlier years at the profession were, indeed, much more occupied with literature than with law, and when he did apply himself to legal matters it was chiefly to observe and reproduce the characteristics of the leading lawyers of the day In 1821, in conjunction with W H Curran, 1 son of the great orator of that name, he con tributed to Colburn's New Monthly Magazine a series of 'Sketches of the Irish Bar,' which attracted considerable attention Sheil's articles in this series were subsequently collected in Legal and Political Sketches They are in every instance brightly and pointedly written, and, though meant for the hour only, they embalm much that the historian of the times will value. It is neither by his dramas nor by his essays that Sheil best deserves remembrance, and yet it was not until he had acquired a notable reputation in both these capacities that he attuned to fame as an orator As early as 1813 he had made a speech on the Catholic question before a Dublin audience which had been highly praised by competent critics, but more than ten years were to elapse before he revealed his real powers in this direction. The agitation for Catholic Emancipation aroused all the strongest feelings of an imaginative and emotional temperament, and the speeches he delivered on political platforms in Ireland in 1825 had a marked influence on public opinion in that country Sheil heartily co operated with O'Connell in the campaign which terminated in the Clare election, but it was not until three years after the cause of Emancipation had triumphed that he entered the House of Commons that assembly Sheil was less successful than on the platform, for reasons which have been sufficiently given by a most friendly critic, Thomas Moore 'His voice has no medium tone, and, when exerted, becomes a scream, his action theatrical and of the barn order of theatricals, but still his oratorical powers are great, and capable of producing (in an Irish nudience at least) great excitement' (Moore's Diary, September 1830) But despite these drawbacks some of Sheil's parliamentary speeches reach the highest level of oratory, and the fine rebuke (quoted below) to Lord Lyndhurst for his scornful description of the Irish people as 'aliens' is a good example of the force and dignity of his best passages. Sheil was asso cirted, but not very closely or heartily, with the Repeal movement, and subsequently drew closer to the Whig than to the avowedly Irish party in the House of Commons As such he was taken up by Lord John Russell, was appointed Vice President of the Board of Frade, and nominated to the Privy Council In Russell's Ministry of 1846 Sheil was Master of the Mint, and in 1850 he became Minister at the court of Fuscany, a position lie continued to hold until his death in the year following

Speech in the House of Commons on Irlsh Municipal Bill, 1837

Tell me, for you were there-I appeal to the gallant soldier before me (Sir Henry Hardinge), from whose opinions I differ, but who bears, I know, a generous heart in an intrepid breast-tell me, for you must needs remember-on that day when the destines of mankind were trembling in the balance-while death fell in showers-when the artillery of France was levelled with a precision of the most deadly sciencewhen her legions, incited by the voice and inspired by the example of their mighty leader, rushed again and again to the onset-tell me if for an instant, when to hesitate for an instant was to be lost, the 'aliens' blenched And when at length the moment for the last and decisive movement had arrived, and the valour which had so long been wisely checked was at last let loose-when, with words familiar but immortal, the great captain commanded the great assault, tell me if Catholic Ireland, with less heroic valour than the natives of your own glonous country, precipitated herself upon the foc-The blood of England, Scotland, and of Ireland flowed in the same stream and drenched the same field the chill morning dawned, their dead lay cold and stark together, in the same deep pit their bodies were deposited, the green corn of spring is now breaking from their commingled dust, the dew falls from heaven upon their union in the grive takers in every peril, in the glory shall we not be permitted to participate? And shall we be told, as a requital, that we are estranged from the noble country for whose salvation our life blood was poured

The Speeches of the Right Honourable Richard Lalor Sheil, MP, were edited in 1845, with a Memoir, by Thomas MacNevin Sketches, Legal and Political, were edited with notes, in 1855, by M W Savage (2 vols), Memoirs of Richard Lalor Sheil, by W Torrens McCullagh, were published in the latter year

William Carleton (1794-1869) was the son of a small farmer in Tyrone, and the youngest of fourteen children. His origin was of a kind well suited to equip the future story-teller for his task, for Carleton's father, though of humble position, was a man of considerable native power, and acquainted with the Irish as well as the English tongue. Carleton got most of his early education in one of those hedge schools which he was afterwards to describe so inimitably Born a Roman Catholic, he was intended by his parents for the priesthood, but conscientious scruples interfered with this prospect, and eventually Carleton became a Protestant. Having somehow acquired a fair education, he became a tutor to a farmer's family in Louth, whence he removed to Dublin some time spent in the drudgery of teaching, he succeeded in getting appointed to a school in Mullingar, where he settled for a time, contributing articles on literary subjects to the local newspaper From Mullingar he went to Carlow, but in 1828 returned to the capital, where, becoming acquainted with the Rev Cæsar Otway, the editor of the Christian Examiner, he was invited to become a contributor, and began his literary career

From 1828 to 1834 Carleton contributed to the periodical just named the series of sketches which form his principal contribution to literature Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry were drawn from life, and in part, indeed, embalmed the actual experiences of the writer For minute observation, and for the insight into the character of the Irish peasantry which they display, Carleton's stories have never been surpassed. The first collected scries appeared in 1830, and a second in 1833, while Tales of Ireland were issued in 1834. The Traits and Stories soon won their way to public favour, and for the next few years Carleton was a constant contributor to Irish periodicals of every kind In 1837 he commenced in the Dublin University Magazine his first sustained novel,

Fardorougha the Miser Though this work, by far the best of his more elaborate efforts, more than sufficed to refute the criticism that Carleton could only write short tales, its importance is not comparable with that of the Traits, nor, indeed, can it be said that the author achieves in any of his novels the success of his shorter stories Tardorougha was followed in 1841 by The Missortunes of Barney Branagan, another series of tales, and in 1845 by Tales and Stories of the Irish Peasantry Valentine M'Clutchy (1845), Rody the Rover (1847), and The Tithe Proctor (1848) are all novels in which various phases of the Irish land wir supply the colouring matter, while The Black Prophet (1847) is occupied with the Potato Famine Others of Carleton's novels are The Red Hall, or the Baronel's Daughter (1852), The Squanders of Castle Squander (1854), Willy Reilly and his dear Colleen Bawn (1855), and Redmond, Count O'Hanlon (1862) Interspersed between these were written a vast quantity of short tales In 1848 the ment of Carleton's work was acknowledged by the grant of a Civil List pension of £200 1 year. The last months of his life were occupied with a long con templated, but constantly postponed, autobiography, which was left unfinished

It is by his Traits and Stories rather than by his novels that Carleton lives and deserves to live. Of the many writers who in the second quarter of the nincteenth century sought to illustrate the manners and character of the Irish peasant, none used so realistic a brush and none produced so wind an impression. His verse is not a very considerable part of Carleton's work, but Sir Turlough, or the Churchyard Bride, has a weird impressiveness, and has been praised by Sir Theodore Martin as 'the most successful legendary ballad of modern times'

An Irish Village.

The village of Findramore was situated at the foot of a long green hill, the outline of which formed a low arch as it rose in the eye against the horizon. This hill was studded with clumps of beeches, and sometimes enclosed as a meadow. In the month of July, when the grass on it was long, many an hour have I spent in solitary enjoyment, watching the wavy motion produced upon its pliant surface by the sunny winds, or the flight of the cloud shadows, like gigantic phantoms, as they swept rapidly over it, whilst the murmur of the rocking trees, and the gluncing of their bright leaves in the sun, produced a heartfelt pleasure, the very memory of which rises in my imagination like some fiding recollection of a brighter world.

At the foot of this hill run a clear, deep banked river, bounded on one side by a ship of rich level meadow, and on the other by a kind of common for the village geese, whose white feathers, during the summer season, lay scattered over its green surface. It was also the play ground for the boys of the village school, for there ran that part of the river which, with very correct judgment, the urchins had selected as their bithing place. A little slope, or watering ground in the bank, brought them to the edge of the stream, where the bottom fell away into the fearful depths of the whirlpool, under the hanging oak on the other bank. Well do I remember the first time that I ventured to swim across it, and even yet do I see, in imagination, the two bunches of water flaggons on which the inexperienced swimmers trusted themselves in the water.

About two hundred yards above this, the boreen [a little road or by road] which led from the village to the main road crossed the river by one of those old narrow bridges whose arches rise like round ditches neross the road - an almost impassable barrier to horse and car On passing the bridge, in a northern direction, you found a range of low thatched houses on ench side of the road, and if one o'clock, the hour of dinner, drew near, you might observe columns of blue smoke curling up from a row of chimneys, some made of wicker creels plastered over with a thick coat of mud, some of old, narrow, bottomless tubs, and others, with a greater appearance of taste, ornamented with thick circular ropes of straw, secured together like bees' skeps with the peel of a brier, and many having nothing but But the smoke by no means the open vent above escaped by its legitimate aperture, for you might observe little clouds of it bursting out by the doors and windows, the panes of the latter, being mostly stopped at other times with old hats and rags, were now left entirely open for the purpose of giving it a free escape

Before the doors, on right and left, was a series of dunghills, each with its concomitant sink of green, rotten water, and if it happened that a stout looking woman, with watery eyes, and a yellow cap hung loosely upon her matted locks, came, with a chubby urehin on one arm, and a pot of dirty water in her hand, its incere monious ejection in the aforesaid sink would be apt to send you up the village with your finger and thumb (for what purpose you would yourself perfectly understand) elosely, but not knowingly, applied to your nostrils But independently of this, you would be apt to have other reasons for giving your horse, whose heels are by this time surrounded by a dozen of barking curs, and the same number of shouting urchins, a pretty sharp touch of the spurs, as well as for complaining bitterly of the odour of the atmosphere. It is no landscape without figures, and you might notice, if you are, as I suppose you to be, a man of observation, in every sink as you pass along, a 'slip of a pig' stretched in the middle of the mud, the very beau ideal of luxury, giving occasion ally a long luxuriant grunt, highly expressive of his enjoy ment, or, perhaps, an old farrower, lying in indolent repose, with half a dozen young ones jostling each other for their drought, and punching her belly with their little snouts, reekless of the fumes they are ereating, whilst the loud erow of the cock, as he confidently flaps his wings on his own dunghill, gives the warning note for the hour of dinner (From 'The Hedge School in Traits and Stories)

C. LITTON FALKINER

Michael, Banim (1796-1874) and John Banim (1798-1842), two brothers who are best known as the authors of Tales of the O'Hara I analy, represent a remarkably successful instance of literary collaboration. It has never been possible to assign correctly the respective shares of the two brothers in the fame collectively acquired. But it seems as though the higher reputation enjoyed by the younger was due rather to the resolute self-abnegation of his senior than to his The Banims were born in Kilsuperior ment kenny, where their father kept what Moore in his Diary describes as 'a little powder and shot shop,' much resorted to by local sportsmen They were educated together at Kilkenny College, but John, evincing a taste for painting, was in 1813 sent to Dublin to study drawing After some years devoted to art John turned to literature, and quickly produced two dramas, Turgesius and Damon and Pythas, of which the latter was produced at Covent Garden by Macready and Charles Kemble in 1821 He also wrote an elaborate poem, The Celt's Paradise In the following year-John having settled in London, where he contributed to the Literary Register—the brothers commenced the publication of the O'Hara series The tales at once became popular, and as a result of their success the next work published by them, Boyne Water (1825), found a numerous audience. These stories were mostly conceived on historical lines, and they did much, as was intended, to interest the English public in Irish questions and to lead to a fuller comprehension of certain phases of Irish character A further series of Tales appeared in 1826, and included The Nowlans, for which Colburn give a large sum. This work failed, however, to sustain the reputation of its predecessors, a failure due probably to the breakdown of John Banim's health The brothers, however, continued to collaborate, John's intellectual activity being maintained in spite of bodily failure, and in 1829 a final series of O'Hara Tales appeared John had meantime produced independently a set of essays, Reflections on the Dead Alive (1824), and Sylla, a tragedy, besides numerous contributions to maga-In 1836 he became paralysed in the lower limbs, and received a pension of £150 from the Civil List, together with a further grant of £40 yearly for his daughter His strength thence forward ebbed away, and though he survived six years longer, he had ceased to work. A Life by P J Murray appeared in 1857

Michael Banim long survived his younger brother, but like him was all his life in straitened circum-In 1853, however, he was appointed post master of Kilkenny, and on his retirement twenty years later received an allowance from the Royal Literary Fund His chief works after his brother's death were Clough Fronn (1852) and The Town of the Cascades (1864) The O'Hara Tales have often been compared to the Waverley Novels, and no doubt they, like Miss Edgeworth's and Gerald Griffin's works, served in a great degree to do for Ireland what the 'Waverley' series did for Scotland But the Braims lacked the broad sanity and kindly humour of Scott, while they were without the wholesome cheerfulness of Maria Edgeworth They moved, especially the younger, on a more tragic plane, and it is the more gloomy elements in the Celtic temperament that they most successfully reproduce. But they possessed in a high degree that brooding historical imagination which is a conspicuous trait in the Irish peasantry, and their stories are true to that side of Irish life which they chose to illustrate.

Soggarth Aroon

Am I the slave they say,

Soggarth aroon?

Since you did show the way,

Soggarth aroon,

Their slave no more to be,

While they would work with me
Old Ireland's slavery,

Soggarth aroon

Why not her poorest man,

Soggarth aroon,

Try and do all he can,

Soggarth aroon,

Her commands to fulfil

Of his own heart and will,

Side by side with you still,

Soggarth aroon?

Loval and brave to vou,

Soggarth aroon,
Yet be not slave to you,

Soggarth aroon,
Nor out of fear to vou—
Stand up so near to you—
Och! out of fear to you,

Soggarth aroon?

Who, in the winter's mght,
Soggarth aroon,
When the cold blast did bite,
Soggarth aroon,
Came to my cabin door,
And, on my carthen floor, knelt by me, siek and poor,
Soggarth aroen?

Who, on the marriage day,
Soggarth aroon,
Made the poor cabin gay,
Soggarth aroon?
And did both laugh and sing,
Making our hearts to ring,
At the poor christening,
Soggarth aroon?

Who, as friend only met,
Soggarth aroon,
Never did flout me yet,
Soggarth aroon?
And when my eye was dim,
Gave, while his eye did brim,
What I should give to him,
Soggarth aroon?

Och ' you and only you,

Soggarth aroon '

And for this I was true to you,

Soggarth aroon ,

In love they 'll never shake,

When for Ould Ireland's sake,

We a true part did take,

Soggarth aroon?

Terence O'Brien

During his term of sea service Terence O'Brien had unconsciously contracted some characteristics which rendered him a puzzle to his present neighbours and, indeed, a contradiction to himself-or, at least, to Ference O'Brien that then was, and Terence O'Brien that used to be, once upon a time I or instance. In his more youthful days, he had engaged in some one of those many rustic combinations for which the Irish peasantry are eelchrated, and which can best be ae counted for by considering that their wants make them discontented, and the injuries which often produce those wants, reckless of all consequences, when their object is vengeance on the nearest palpable aggressor. Terence and his associates violated the law of the land, rewards for their apprehension were offered, some of them were discovered, tried, and hanged, and he himself, to avoid the fate that seemed to await him, abseonded from his native place, 'and never ened stop, nor let the grass grow under his feet,' till he had arrived in 'Cork's own town,' distant about one hundred miles (Irish) from his starting point. There, scarce yet pausing to take breath, he entered on board a man of war, as his most secure hiding place, and thus the wild Irishman, who, but a few hours before, had been denounced as almost a traitor to the State, became one of its sworn defenders, ay, and in a very short time, if not at that very moment, one of its most loyal and sincere defenders This character grew upon him, and in it fully confirmed he returned home after a long absence, in peaceful and oblivious times, much to the non edification of his stationary neighlours, as has been intimated Further As a Whiteboy, before going on his travels, Terence had mortally hated England, England's king and the very name of every thing English in the same ratio, and loved England's foes, of all denominations—the I reneli, her 'natural enemies,' as they have been somewhat strangely called, above all others. But none of these youthful prejudices did Terence bring home with him 'Long life and a long reign to King George!' was now his shout, while the hairs on his head bristled in enmity against 'parly woos,' and good reason why for both centimentssensations rather During half his amphibious existence, Terenee's grog had been sweetened by pouring it down his throat, among his ship comrades, with a grateful mention of the name of his Britannic Majesty, and Terence's only thoughts and efforts constantly directed towards the discomfiture of the ill wishers of that august personage. The loss of his arm, and of half his nose, with the disgraceful substitution of that half by the half of a Frenchman's 'snub,' gave him personal cause to detest the Gallie race. So that he might be said to loathe the French to the marrow of his bones-jea, even of those portions of his bones which had been severed from his body and east to the sharks

The Pirate's Return.

'It was of a dreary night in December I first met your brother Collum, sir,' said Father Fenelly when he and Mr Felix M'Carty, as we are now obliged to call him, discoursed together shortly after the old pirate's story had been related, 'of a Saturday night, too, I remember it well, one of the last upon which my poor people crowd into the little chapel to prepare for their Christmas duty

Ere I entered the confessional I had observed a very remarkable man sauntering, or rather dodging, about the chapel yard that was before the chapel door He wore a sailor's dress, one marking the degree above the common sailor, for aught I know, but his air, his face, his step, and the whole bearing of his tall, straight figure suggested, at all events, the idea of a superior person Something wondering to see a stranger of his kind in such a place, and also recollecting that on one or two occasions before I had noticed him, at a distance, in the lonesome walks about the village, I passed into the chapel, sat down in my confession box, and began the duties of the evening A great number, as is usual on the approach of Christmas and Easter, were waiting on my ministry, or "to be heard," as we call it, in their turns, and I could not change fast enough in my box for them, and open the shde of the little round onfice at either side, to listen alternately to the varied avoids of hnman frailty that craved my advice, my control, and finally, through my mouth, a conditional promise of pardon from my God An honr might have been thus spent, when, chancing to look out through the slit in the cartain of my box, I recognised the tall and almost sublime figure of the stringer, leaning against one of the little rude props that supported the thatched roof of my hamble chapel. From another prop, the weak light of a tin sconce, or lamp, fell upon his features, and allowed me to see their expression, and I thought I read upon his cloudy hrow, and his rolling eye, and in his half open and contorted mouth the story of a bosom blackened with crime, torn with remorse, and just be ginning to work in the terrible labour of a first repent ance. I could perceive that he eyed askance the humble crowds that, in the twilight, knelt around him where he stood, and, now and then, that his agitated glance followed those who came, some moving on their knees, to confess their burden of sin, and those who, their ordeal over, returned from the confessional to the railing of the sanetuary to throw themselves there, in aspirations of thanks to God, and of promises of future virtue Having remarked him for some time, I proceeded in my duty About another hour clapsed before I thought I could properly spare time to pay him more attention, and a sweet little child of thirteen or fourteen, who went from me with permission to approach her first com munion, had, accompanied by her father, also a penitent of the evening, gone to the sanctuary to complete their devotions, when I was alarmed by a sudden noise and outcry, that spread among all the people of the chapel, and hastily stepping out of my box, I found the poor stranger just after flinging limiself prostrate by the side of the child, while his frame shook, grouns and sobs broke from his manly breast, and the glorious tears of a true repentance ran down the backs of the hands with which he covered his face. Not unaffected myself, I rused him and held him in my arms, and whispered the words of sublime consolation my merciful and Almighty Master lind commanded me to drop as so many drops of oil upon the torn heart of the remorseful sinner My words seemed to overwhelm him with greater agony He would have again fallen at my feet I resisted his attempt. We retired from the wondering and sym pathising crowd, into the little sacristy at the back of the altar That night-that moment, Collum M'Carty first sued for peace with his God '

(From Tales of the O'Hara Family -second series.)

Samuel Lover (1797-1868), one of the most versatile of Irish nineteenth-century writers, though hardly one of the greatest, was born in Dublin, and there received his education. The son of a stock broker, he was intended to follow his father's calling, but the business instincts required for this career were foreign to a youth who early developed tastes for painting, music, and letters of a most marked kind Leaving his parental roof, Lover devoted himself to the first of these arts, and at once achieving distinction as a portrait painter, he in a few years took high rank among Dublin artists, and was elected a Royal Hibernian Academician He was particularly successful with miniatures, and a portrait of Paganini won him much praise in 1832 Lover early became acquainted with Moore, who exercised a considerable influence on the development of the literary proclivities which he joined to his artistic aptitudes, and the character of his verse is largely imitative of the author of Irish Melodies But his first published work belongs to a school in which Moore never studied The Legends and Stories of Ireland (1831) at once announced that a clever artist was likely to be extinguished by a still more clever writer, and soon led to Lover's association with the distinguished group of literary Irishmen by whom the Dublin Uni versity Magazine was founded To this periodical Lover remained for many years a constant con While still busy as an artist he had won fame as a ballad writer with Rory O'More (1826), and no one could recite it so well as its author Thus, when in 1835 he resolved to move to London, it was little wonder that with a reputation for versatility little short of marvellous Lover speedily became fashionable in the society of the capital He painted Brougham, fraternised with Dickens, and was honised everywhere

In 1837 Lover came out as a novelist, expanding the theme of his ballad of Rory O'More into a popular romance. Shortly afterwards the same theme did duty for a play This was the beginning of a considerable apprenticeship to the drama, and a succession of pieces, including a burlesque opera called Il Paddy Whack in Italia, were rapidly He then fell back on his earlier parts, produced and Songs and Ballads (1839), Handy Andy, his principal work of fiction (1842), and Treasure Trove (1844)—first published by the title of LSD-proclaimed that neither the song-writer nor the novelist had been lost in the dramatist Obliged by a failure of vision or musician to abandon painting, which all this time had not ceased to be a source of income, Lover resolved to woo fame in a new character. An entertainment called 'Irish Evenings,' in which the items of the programme, whether musical or literary, were exclusively the composition of the reciter, testified to Lover's extraordinary adapta Repeated in America, the recitations were even more popular in New York than in London

The success of this tour was comparable with those of Dickens, and marks the climax of Lover's fortunate career His experiences in America were utilised by Lover on his return in another entertainment, called 'Paddy's Portfolio' Lover's later vears were not marked by much literary fertility, and, indeed, it was inevitable that an inventiveness which reflected in its brightness the abounding animal spirits of the man should have declined with declining years Two dramas, The Sentinel of the Alma and MacCarthy More, some contributions to operatic libretti, a clever series of parodies of popular authors, and Metrical Tales and other Points (1858) are the only original work of his last twenty years. He was, however, a diligent contributor to the magazines, and in 1858 edited a collection of Lyrics of Ireland In 1859 lic threw himself into the Volunteer movement, and wrote the popular song 'Defence, not Defiance' In 1856, in recognition of his virious services to irt and literature, I over received a Civil List Lover's reputation has certainly not en dured the test of time. But it was scarcely possible that it should. His was one of those winning personalities which serve to invest an author's writings with an added charm in the eves of contemporanes But such a charm is necessarily evanescent, and the body of Lover's work is unequal to his former fame. His songs in particular, though many of them remain popular, seem to lack the salt that makes verse literature. But his prose works have more enduring qualities And as the counterpart, not to say antithesis, of such writers as the authors of the Tales of the O'Hara I amily, his characterisations of the whimsical and devil may care Irishman and his illustrations of the more grotesque forms of Irish humour will always cnable Lover to fill an important place among the Irish prose writers of his age

King O'Toole and St Kevin

Well, the ling was nigh hand broken hearted, and melancholy intirely, and was walkin' one mornin' by the edge of the lake, lamentin' his cruel fate, an' thinkin' o' drownin' himself that could get no divarshin in life, when all of a suddint, turnin round the corner be yant, who should he meet but a mighty dacent young man comin' up to him

'God save you,' says the king (for the king was a civil spoken gentleman by all accounts), 'God save you,' says he to the young man

'God save you kindly,' says the young man to him back agun, 'God save you,' says he, 'King O'Toole'

'True for you,' says the king, 'I am King O'Toole, prince and plennypennytinchary o' these parts,' says he, 'but how kem you to know that?'

'Oh, never mind,' says Shint Kevin

For you see, said Old Joe, in his indertone again, and looking very knowingly, it was Saint Kevin, sure enough—the saint himself in disguise and nobody else. 'Oh, never mind,' says he 'I know more than that,' says he, 'nor twice that'

'And who are you,' said the king, 'that makes so bowld-who are you at all at all?'

'Oh, never you mind,' says Saint Kevin, 'who I am, you'll know more o' me before we part, King O'Toole,' says he.

'I'll be proud o' the knowledge o' your acquantance, sir,' says the king, mighty p'hte

'Troth, you may say that,' says Saint Kevin 'And nou, may I make bould to ax how is your goose, king O'Toole' says he

'Blur an agers, how kem you to I now about my goose?' says the king

'Oh, no matther, I was given to understand it,' says Saint Kevin

'Oh, that's a folly to talk,' says the king, 'bekase myself and my goose is private friends,' says he, 'and no one could tell you,' says he, 'barrin' the fairies'

'Oh thin, it wasn't the fairies,' says Saint Kevin, 'for I'd have you to know,' says lie, 'that I don't leep the likes o sitch company'

"You might do worse then, my gry fellow,' says the king, 'for it's they could show you a crock o' money as risy as kiss hand, and that's not to be sneezed at,' says the king, 'by a poor man,' says he.

'Maybe I we a bettlier way of making money myself,' says the saint

'By gor,' says the king, 'barrin' you're a comer,' says he, 'that's impossible'

'I'd seorn to be the like, my lord I' says Saint Kerin, mighty high, 'I'd scorn to be the like,' says he

'Then, what are you,' says the ling, 'that makes money so also, by your own account?'

'I man honest man,' says Saint Kevin

'Well, horest man, says the ling, 'and how is it you make your money so alsy ?'

'By makin' ould things as good as new,' says Saint Kevin

'Blur an ouns, is it a tinker you are?' says the

'No,' says the saint, 'I'm no tinker by thride, king O'Toole, I've a betther thrade than a tinker,' says he 'What would you say,' says he, 'if I made your ould goose as good as new?'

My dear, at the word o' makin' his goose as good as new, you'd think the poor ould king's eyes was ready to jump out it his head, and says he, 'Troth thin I'd give you more money nor you could count,' says he, 'if you did the like and I'd be behoulden to you into the bargain'

'I scorn your dirty money,' says Saint Kevin

'Futh then, I'm thinkin' a trifle o' change would do you no harm,' says the king, lookin' up sly at the ould caubeen that Saint Kevin had on him

'I have a vow agin it,' says the saint, 'and I am book sworn,' says he, 'never to have goold, silver, or brass in my company'

'Barrin' the trifle you can't help,' savs the king, mighty cute, and looking him straight in the face

'You just hot it,' says Saint Kevin, 'but though I can't take money,' says he, 'I could take a few acres of land if you'd give them to me'

'With all the veins o' my heart,' says the king, 'it you do what you say '

'Thry me,' says Saint Kevin 'Call down your goose here,' says he, 'and I'll see what I can do for her'

With that the king whistled, and down kem the poor goose, all as one as a hound, and as like him as two

The Life of Gerald Graffin by his Brother (1842), is the main authority The novels were published in Duffy's Popular Library (1854) and have often been reprinted. The poetical works were collected in 1854, and reprinted with the dramas in 1857

James Clarence Mangan (1803-49) was born in Dublin, and was the son of a small grocer His youth was passed in very straitened circumstances, and he owed his education to the benevolence of a priest But through the kindness of this clergy man he acquired a knowledge of Spanish, French, and Italian, which subsequently stood him in good stead, leading to his employment in the library of Trinity College, Dublin His earliest occupation was that of a clerk in a scrivener's office, but irregular habits and a crav ing for drink always prevented him from attaining to any responsible position, and he was all his life something between a pariah and a Bohemian Mangan's earliest poetical efforts, apart from a few occasional contributions to the daily press, were made in the pages of the Comet, the journal of a coterie called the Coinct Club, of which he became n member in 1831 To this journal he contributed pretty frequently over the signature 'Clarence,' which he adopted as a Christian name. He also contributed to the Dublin Penny Journal, a pen odical of great importance in its day, as well as to a less reputable publication, the Dublin Penny Saturst In 1834 he began a long series of trans lations from the German in the Dublin University Magazine, with articles on German poetry were republished in 1845 as a German Anthology For this magazine Mangan wrote much and fre quently for the next few years, until in 1842 he joined the staff of the Nation To this journal and to the United Irishman he was thenceforward as constant a contributor as his hopelessly irregular habits permitted, writing over the signature of 'A Yankee' and other pseudonyms In 1849 he fell a victim to cholera, a disease to which his enfeebled constitution left him an easy prev It is extremely difficult to gauge the true powers of Mangan He has been praised by critics of insight, if not of very balanced judgment, as the greatest poet in the Irish literature of the nineteenth century questionably he had great poeuc possibilities, and is among the great might-have beens of literature. His best work is mainly that which was inspired by patriotism, and betokens a temperament in tensely sensitive to the tragic elements of life. themes he preferred were those which gave the fullest scope to his dreamy delight in the emotions of sorrow and the sense of magnificent gloom with which the history of his country filled him most striking pieces are a strange blend of dirge and prenn But his work, as was inevitable from the weak nature of the man, is most uneven, and while some of the lyrics are of a very high order of excellence, his flights are always short, and he was incapable of exhibiting sustained power Life, which has lately been written with sympathy (by D J O'Donoghue, 1897), is as depressing a chronicle as any in the annuls of literature. No complete edition of his poetry has been published

Dark Rosaleen. O, my dark Rosaleen, Do not sight, do not weep! The priests are on the ocean green, They march upon the deep There's wine from the royal Pope, Upon the ocean green, And Spanish ale shall give you hope, My dark Rosaleen ! My own Rosalcen! Shall glad your heart, shall give you hope, Shall give you health, and help, and hope, My dark Rosaleen ' Over hills, and through dales, Have I roamed for your sake, All yesterday I sailed with sails,

On river and on lake.

The Bramleighs appeared in 1868, That health Boy of Norcotts in 1869, and Lord Kilgobbin, the author's last work, in 1872 In the last named year, not long after his return from a visit to Ireland, he died suddenly at Trieste For a great part of the nineteenth century, it may be said without much evaggeration that Englishmen knew Ireland mainly through Lever's novels He was himself the incarnation of the high spirits, careless fun, and love of sport which he attributed to most of his heroes, and though the standard of manners which he depicts was really more characteristic of the generation preceding his own than of that to which he belonged, the picture he drew of Ireland and the Irish was not untrue to life and certainly not unduly flattering No successful novelist was ever less indebted than Lever to the devices of art He wrote out of the abundance of his heart rather than of his head, and, in his earliest and best novels at any rate, never troubled himself about plot, construction, or form A quick eye, a graphic pen, and boundless good humour were his sufficient equipment, and it is remarkable how long they No writer was ever less of a poet than the author of Harry Lorrequer But the author had a distinct talent for humorous verse, and the songs which are scattered through his novels are racy and bright, thoroughly characteristic of the man and his books

The Man for Galway

To drink a toast,
A proctor roast,
Or builiff as the case is,
To liss your wife,
Or take your life
At ten or lifteen paces.
To keep game cocks, to hunt the fox,
To drink in punch the Solway,
With debts galore, but fun far more,
Oh' that's 'the man for Galway'
Chorus—With debts galore, &c.

The king of Oude
Is mighty proud,
And so were once the Caysars,
But ould Giles Eyre
Would make them stare,
An' he had them with 'the Blazers,'
To the devil I fling ould Runjeet Singh,
He s only a prince in a small way,
And knows nothing at all of a 'six foot wall,' Oh' he'd never do for Galway

Chorus—With debts galore, &c.

Ye think the Blakes
Are 'no great shakes,'

They're all his blood relations,
And the Bodkins sneeze
At the grim Chinese,

For they come from the Phenayerans
So fill the brim, and here's to him

Who'd drink in punch the Solway,
With debts galore, but fun far more,
Oh' that's 'the man for Galway'

A Day in the Phœnix

When we were once more in the coupl of the diligence, I directed my entire attention towards my Irish acquaintance, as well because of his apparent singularity as to avoid the little German in the opposite corner

'You have not been long in I rance, then, sir?' said I, as we resumed our conversation

'Three weeks, and it seems like three years to menothing to eat-nothing to drink- and nobody to speak to But I'll go back soon-I only came abroad for a month'

'You'll scarcely see much of the Continent in so short a time.'

CHARLES JAMES 1 EVER
From a Photograph.

'Devil a much that will grieve me-I didn't come to see it'

'Indeed 1'

'Nothing of the lind, I only came-to be away from

'Oh 1 I perceive'

'You're quite out there,' said my companion, mis interpreting my meaning 'It wasn't anything of that kind I don't owe sixpence. I was laughed out of Ireland—that's nll, though that same is bad enough'

'Laughed out of it ''

'Just so And little you know of Ireland if that surprises you '

After acknowledging that such an event was perfectly possible, from what I had myself seen of that country, I obtained the following very brief account of my companion's reasons for foreign travel

'Well, sir,' began he, 'it is nbout four months since I brought up to Dublin from Galway a little chestnut mare, with cropped ears and a short tinl, square jointed and rather low—just what you'd call a smart hack for going to cover with—a lively thing on the road with a light weight. Nobody ever disputed that she was a clean bred thing—own sister to Jenny that won the Corinthians, got to enty yards farther. The race was, however, won My odds were lost to every man on the field, and worse than all, I was so laughed at that I could not centure out in the street without hearing allusions to my misfortune.

Micley Free

Whenever my uncle or Considine were not in the room, my companion was my own screamt Michael, or, as he was better known, 'Mieles I ree' Now had Mickey liven left to his own free and unre-tricted devices, the time would not have hung so heavily, for, among Miles manifold gifts, he was poste ed of a very great flow of gos iping conver ation. he knew all that was doing in the country and never was harren in his information wherever his may mation came into play Mickey was the best hurler in the barons, no mean performer on the violin could dince the national boleto of 'Pather Jack Walsh' in a way that charmed more than one soft heart beneath a red volve bouce, and had, withal, the peculiar free and east devil may care kind of off hand Irish way that never devited him in the most of his valuest and most subtle morn ats giving to a very deep and cunning fellow all the apparent frankine's and opennes of a courtivital

He had attached him off to me as a land of sporting companion, and, growing daily more and more usful had been gridually admitted to the honour of the Litchen and the prerigation of cast clothes, without ever having been retually engaged as a servant, and while thus no warrant officer, as in fact he dischar, id all his duties well and punctually was rated among the ships company though no one could ever as at what preciperiod he changed his enterpillar existence and became a gry butterfly, with cords and top, a striped vest, and a most knowing ping hat, who stalked also it the stables and and bulled the helpers. The Life of Charles Lever, by W. J. Fitrpatrick (1877) newed. 1866) the only formal biography of Lever, is not at all an adequate picture of the novelist. The principal novels have been collected and reprinted in a handsome and elaborate edition (18 vols. 1898-99).

Sir Samuel Lerguson (1810-86) was born in Bellist of parents who were of Scotush extrac tion, and having received his school education at the Academical Institution in that city, passed to Frants College, Dublin 1115 university studies were interrupted however, and he never graduated though in 1865 he received from the university the degree of LLD honoris cause In 1236 he cas called to the Irish Bar, at which he precued with success becoming a Outen. Counsel in 1859, and remaining in the active pursuit of his professor until his appointment, in 1867, to the position of Deputy I ceper of the neath created Ir -h Re ord Office. In 1878 in recognition of his efficient service in this position is well is of his literary enunence, he received a linglithood Lerguson was thus far from Lading the life of a mere man of letters, letters were in fact his constant interest and it may even be said the main preoccupation of his thou, hts is cith as 1832 he had made in a vist of Edinburgh, the equant ance of William Black and, Profe or Wilson and This was the beginning of in endance connection with "Maga," to which he contained the first and most popular of his poems, The Lorging of the In vor written at one and trents, as well is a humorous prose extravelance called Lather Iom and the Pofe (1838, which won vide popularity. He was also a diligent contributor both in prose and verse, to the Dielor (1), rair Wagaziri, drawing his subjects almost in anabi from Celtic history and the bardic chronicles of Ireland Terguson's earlier poems fire published in this way, were collected by him in 1865 in Loss of the Hesteri Gael, while his prove stories were postliuntously republished in Hillern at Aigris Literaum mis (1887 - In 1972 appeared Congil ar Lpic Poen is Ire Inc s, and in 1820 3 further volume of Poems, which was really a second series of Lors of the Western Gal poems in this volume 'Dairdre' and 'Conan' have been enthusiastically proved by Insh en us-Of the former Allmgham and that his pecul w form of unity is perfectly managed, while is general effect recalls nothing so much as a Greek play! Throughout his busy career he was a zealous promoter of the fame of Ireland in every department of intellectual effort and did much to stimulate the intelligent study of her history and antiquities, her ancient laws and learning. In this respect he evanced throughout his career the ardent national spirit which in his earlier days land allied him temporarily with the 'Young Ireland' movement in politics, an alliance which had its best fruit in the noble Lament for Tromas Davis, in which he has embalmed the memory of that patriot. Ferguson occupies, by reason of his influence upon what is now known as the 'Gaelic revival' in Irish literature, a position among Irish poets considerably higher than the intrinsic merit of his work won for him in his lifetime. 'It was in his writings,' says a very competent authority, 'that the great work of restoring to Irish deep the guston was decisively begun'. Yet though Ferguson was an accomplished Irish scholar, and drew largely upon Irish bardic sources for the subjects of his poems, it may be doubted whether he ever consciously identified himself with the revival which is ascribed to him.

Lament for Thomas Davis

I walked through Ballinderry in the spring time When the bud was on the tree,

And I said, in every fresh ploughed field beholding The sowers striding free,

Scattering broadcast forth the corn in golden plenty On the quick seed clasping soil,

'Even such, this day, among the fresh stirred hearts of Thomas Davis is thy toil!' [Erin,

I sat by Ballyshannon in the summer, And saw the salmon leap,

And I said, as I beheld the gallant creatures
Spring glittering from the deep,

Thro' the spray and through the prone heaps striving To the calm clear streams above, [onwards
'So seekest thou thy native founts of freedom, Thomas

In thy brightness of strength and love!' [Davis I stood on Derry bown in the autumn,

And I heard the eagle call
With a elangorous cry of wrath and lamentation

That filled the wide mountuin hall,
O'er the bare deserted place of his plundered eyry,
And I said, as he screamed and soared,

'So callest thou, thou wrathful soaring Thomas Divis,
For a nation's rights restored ''

And, alas ' to think but now, and thou art lying, Dear Davis, dead at thy mother's knee,

And I, no mother near, on my own sick bed, I hat face on earth shall never see,

I may lie and try to feel that I am not dreaming, I may lie and try to say, 'Thy will be done'—

But a hundred such as I will never comfort Erin
For the loss of her noble son '

Young husbandman of Erin's fruitful seed time, In the fresh track of danger's plough <sup>1</sup> Who will walk the weary toilsome, perilous furrow

Girt with freedom's seed sheets now? Who will banish with the wholesome crop of knowledge

Who will banish with the wholesome crop of knowledge.

The flaunting weed and the bitter thorn,

Now that thou thyself art but a seed for hopeful planting Against the Resurrection morn?

Young salmon of the flood tide of freedom
That swells round Erin's shore!
Thou wilt leap against their loud oppressive torrent
Of bigotry and hate no more

Drawn downward by their prone material instinct,

Let them thunder on their rocks and foam—

Thon hast leaped, aspiring soul, to founts beyond their

Where troubled waters never come! [rag
But I grieve not, eagle of the empty eyr,

That thy wrathful cry is still,

And that the songs alone of peaceful mourners

Are heard to day on Erm's hill,
Better far, if brothers' war be destined for us,

(God avert that horrid day, I pray ')
That ere our hands be straned with slaughter fratricidal
Thy warm heart should be cold in elay

But my trust is strong in God, who made us brothers,
That He will not suffer those right hands
Which thou hast joined in holier rites than wedlock

To draw opposing brands.

Oh, many a timeful tongue that thou mad'st vocal

Would he cold and silent then,

And songless long once more, should often widowed Erin Mourn the loss of her brave young men

Oh, brave voung men, my love, my pride, my promise, 'Tis on vou my hopes are set,

In manliness, in kindliness, in justice,

To make Erin a nation yet

Self respecting, self relying, self advancing, In union, or in severance, free and strong,

And if God grant this, then, under God, to Thomas Davis
Let the greater praise belong

John Francis Waller (1810-94), a prolific writer of verse, was born in Limerick, and belonged to a well known Irish family of Cromwellian origin He received his education in frinity College, Dublin, where he graduated in 1831, and in 1833 he was called to the Irish Bar Early developing a strong literary bent, Waller became an active contributor to the Dublin University Magazine, then lately founded, and eventually succeeded the novelist Lever in its editorial chair periodical he contributed a series of articles, sub sequently (1852) separately published, in which he imitated with some success the manner of Wilson's Noctes Ambrosiana Like Wilson, too, he wrote under a pseudonym, and was known to his readers as 'Jonathan Freke Slingsby' He was also from the first a constant contributor of verse to the magazine Many of his poems, being set to music, attained to very general popularity, and some were translated into German 'The Song of the Glass' has been prused by a very competent critic, Lord Houghton, as the best drinking-song of the nine Willer was distinctly happy as a teenth century writer of what may be termed ccremonial verse, and some of his odes on various public occasions are successful attempts in a kind of writing in which it is very easy to fail. His poetical works include Ravenscroft Hall and other Poins (1852), The Dead Bridal (1856), Occasional Odes (1864), and Peter Brown (1872) Waller was an indus trious editor of popular issues of the works of Irish authors of eminence-for example, Goldsmith and Moore. 'Cushla ma chree' ('pulse of my heart') is one of his best-known songs

Cushla-ma-chree

By the green banks of Shannon I wood thee, dear Mary,
When the sweet birds were singing in summer's gay pride, [dream,

From those green banks I turn now, heart broken and As the sun sets, to weep our the grave of my bride.

Idly the sweet birds around me are singing,

Summer, like winter, is cheerless to me,

I heed not if snow falls, or flow'rets are springing,
For my heart's light is darkened—my Cushla ma chree

Oh! bright shone the morning when first as my bride, love,

Thy foot, like a sunbeam, my threshold crossed o'er, And blest on our hearth fell that soft eventide, love,

When first on my bosom thy heart lay, asthore Restlessly now on my lone pillow turning

Wear the night watches, still thinking on thee, And darker than night breaks the light of the morning, For my aching eves find thee not, Cushla ma chree

Oh my loved one! my lost one! say, why didst thou leave me

To linger on earth with my heart in thy grave!

Oh! would thy cold arms, love, might ope to receive me

To my rest 'neath the dark boughs that over thee wave.

Still from our once happy dwelling I roam, love,

Ever more seeking, my own bride, for thee, Ah, Mary I wherever thou nrt is my home, love, And I'll soon lie beside thee, my Cushla ma chree

Thomas Osborne Davis (1814-45) was born at Mallow, County Cork Of Welsh parentage through his father, Anglo-Irish through his mother, Davis inherited in a large degree the Celtic spirit which inspires his muse. He was educated at first privately, and later at Frinity College, Dublin, where he graduated in 1836, and where, as a member of the well-known Historical Society which Burke had founded, he first evinced that enthusiasm for Ireland, its politics and its literature, which was the master-passion of his short life He was called to the Bar in 1838, but scarcely attempted to practise. In 1839 he joined the Repeal Association, and in the following year became part editor of a Dublin daily journal de voted to Nationalist views. In 1842, in conjunction with Charles Gavan Duffy and John Dillon, he founded the Nation newspaper, which was thenceforward to be the vehicle for the emanations in prose and verse of his extraordinarily active brain Prior to this Davis land never published, possibly he had never written, a line of verse, but in re sponse to the call for popular lyrics associated with the aspirations of 'Young Ireland,' he suddenly To the sixth number of the burst into song Nation he contributed the striking and powerful 'Lament of Owen Roe O'Neill,' which was to be the first of a series of poems permeated with that patriotic emotion which entitled them to the name under which they were afterwards republished, The Spirit of the Nation At the same time Davis designed a series of volumes of the leading orators of Ireland, and himself edited, with an elaborate memor, the Speeches of the Right Honourable John Philpot Curran His correspondence teems with suggestions of literary work which unhappily he did not live to accomplish, and at his death he was engaged on the early chapters of a Life of Theobald Wolfe Tone, of which the fragment that has been published is a good example of Davis's rather His literary and historical turgid prose style ess tys contributed to the Nation have been pub lished in Duffy's Irish Library His poetry has been edited in the same series by Thomas Wallis. The views of Davis and his associates in the Young Ireland inovement placed him in sharp antagonism to O'Connell and the elder patriots of the school which had won Catholic eman cipation, and on his last appearance on a public platform he was angrily attacked by 'the Liberator,' but undoubtedly Davis and his party represented a larger and nobler ideal than that represented by their predecessors tember 1845 Davis was attacked with scarlatina, and succumbed to the disease in a few days writer that ever lived has better illustrated the aphorism of Fletcher of Saltoun Let legislators do what they would, Davis's stirring lyrics were for the time the voice of Irish patriotism breathe the very spirit of 'The Celt'-the pseudonym by which his poems in the Nation were signed, and though they might be criticised as wanting in technical perfection, their force, their passion, and their intensity were characteristic of the Celtic imagination at its strongest. The sources of Davis's power, the fascination he everted upon the people to whom he dedicated his life, and the loftiness of his ideals are well indicated in Sii Samuel Ferguson's impressive Lament for Thomas Davis

My Land.

She is a rich and rare land,
Oh' she's a fresh and fair land,
She is a dear and fair land—
This native land of nine

No men than hers are braver — Her women's hearts ne'er waver, I'd freely die to save her, And think my lot divine

She s not a dull or cold land,
No! she's a warm and bold land,
Oh! she s a true and old land—
This native land of inine.

Could beauty ever guard her,
And virtue still reward her,
No foe would cross her horder—
No friend within it pine!

Oh' she's a fresh and fair land,
Oh' she's a true and rare land,
Yes' she's a rare and fair land—

The Sack of Baltimore

The summer sun is falling soft on Carbery's hundred isles— The summer sun is gleaming through Gabriel's rough defiles—

Old Inwherkin's crumbled fane looks like a moulting bird,

And in a calm and sleepy swell the ocean tide is heard, The hookers he upon the beach, the children cease their play,

The gossips leave the little inn, the households kneel to pray-

And full of love and pence and rest, its daily labour o'er, Upon that eosy creek there by the town of Baltimore.

All, all askep within each roof, along that rocky street, And these must be the lover's friends, with gently gliding feet—

A stifled gasp' a dreary noise! 'The roof is in a flame!'
From out their beds, and to their doors, rush maid, and sire, and dame—

And meet, upon the threshold stone, the gleaming sabre's

And o'er each black and bearded face the white or erimson shawl--

The yell of 'Allah' breaks above the prayer and shrick and roar—

Oh, blessed God! the Algerine is lord of Baltimore!

'fis two long years since sink the town beneath that bloody bind,

And all around its trampled licarths a larger concourse stand,

Where, high upon a gallows tree, a velling wretch is seen— Tis Hackett of Dungarvan—he who steered the Algerine! He fell amid a sudden shout, with scarce a passing prayer, I or he had slain the kith and kin of many a hundred there—

Some muttered of MacMurchadh, who brought the

Some cursed him with Iscariot that day in Baltimore.

Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu (1814-73) occupies a place by himself among Irish men of letters of the nineteenth century, for, though belonging in many respects to the school of Carleton, Lover, and Lever, he possessed imaginative qualities of a different and perhaps higher kind than they, though in characteristically Irish humour he is hardly their equal. Le Fing was the son of a dean of the Irish Establishment, whose mother was a sister of Richard Brinsley Sheridan In 1833, after a private education, he entered Trinity College, Dublin While at the university he began his literary career as a contributor to the Dublin University Maga zine, with which he was for the rest of his career closely identified, ultimately becoming its proprietor, and it was in the pages of that periodicil that most of his novels first appeared. In 1839 Le Fanu was called to the Bar, but becoming in the same year the owner and editor of a Dublin evening paper, he devoted himself thenceforward to letters and journalism Le Fanu's early fame was won as the author of two extraordinarily successful Insh ballads, Phandrig Crochooic and Shamus O'Brien, of which the latter was long attributed to Lover, who greatly contributed to its popularity by reciting it in America poetical reputation rests almost exclusively on these pieces, for the Poems, posthumously collected in 1896, though more akin than these ballads to the qualities of his prose works can hardly be said to have impressed the public. I e Fanu's earliest effort in prose was the Purcell Papers, a series of short tales, and this was followed by The Coul and Anchor (1845), a chronicle of old Dublin, and Torlogh O'Brien (1847) It was not, however, until many more years had elapsed that he won with The House by the Church; and (1863) an acknowledged position as a master of the mysterious and supernatural in prose fiction The remaining ten years of Le Fanu's life were marked by a rapid succession of novels, of which Uncle Silas (1864), Guy Deverell (1865), The Tenants of Malory (1867), and In a Glass Darkly (1872) have perhaps proved the most popular His list novel, Il illing to Du, was pub lished after his death. Besides the tragic elements of the terrible and the mysterious which give them a distinctive note, Le Fanu's novels are admirable for their constructive excellence and for their narrative vigour

The Hour of Death.

It was a very still night and frosty. My candle had long burnt out. There was still a faint moonlight, which fell in a square of vellow on the floor near the window, leaving the rest of the room in what to an eye less acciss tomed than mine had become to that faint light would have been total darkness. Now, I am sure, I heard a soft whispering outside my door. I knew that I was in a state of siege. The erisis was come, and, strange to say, I felt myself grow all at once resolute and self possessed. It was not a subsidence, however, of the dreadful excitement, but a sudden screwing up of my nerves to a pitch such as I cannot describe. I remained for a space which I cannot pretend to estimate in the same posture, afraid to stir—afraid to remove my eye from the door.

A very peculiar grating sound above my head startled me from my watch-something of the character of saw ing, only more crunching, and with a faint continued rumble in it-utterly inexplicable. It sounded over that portion of the roof which was farthest from the door, towards which I now glided, and as I took my stand under cover of the projecting angle of a clumsy old press that stood close by it, I perceived the room a little darkened, and I saw a man deseend and take his stand upon the window stone. He let go a rope, which, how ever was still fast round his body, and employed both his hands, with apparently some exertion, about some thing at the side of the window, which in a moment more in one mass, bars and all, swung noiselessly open, admit ting the frosty night air, and the man, whom I now distinctly saw to be Dudley Ruthyn, kneeled on the sill, and stepped, after a moment's listening, into the room. His foot made no sound upon the floor, his head was bare, and he wore his usual short shooting jacket

I cowered to the ground in my post of observation. He stood, as it seemed to me, irresolutely for a moment, and then drew from his poeket an instrument which I distinctly saw against the faint moonlight. Imagine a hummer, one end of which had been beaten out into a longish tapering spike, with a handle something longer than usual. He drew stealthily to the window, and seemed to examine this hurriedly, and tested its strength with a twist or two of his hand. And then he adjusted it very carefully in his grasp, and made two or three little experimental picks with it in the air.

I remained perfectly still, with a terrible composure, crouched in my liiding place, niv teeth clenched, and prepared to struggle like a tigress for my life when dis I thought his next measure would be to light I saw a lantern, I fancied, on the window sill a match But this was not his plan. He stole, in a groping way, which seemed strange to me, who could distinguish ob jects in this light, to the side of my bed, the exact position of which he evidently knew, he stooped over it Madame was breathing in the deep respiration of a heavy sleep Suddenly but softly he laid, as it seemed to me, his left hand over her face, and nearly at the same instant there came a scrunching blow, an unnatural shrick, begin ning small and swelling for two or three seconds into a yell such as are imagined in haunted houses, accompanied by a convulsive sound, as of the motion of cunning, and the arms drumming on the bed, and then another blow-and with a horrid grap he recoiled a step or two, and stood perfectly still I heard a horrible tremor quivering through the joints and curtains of the bedstead-the convulsions of the murdered woman. It was a dreadful sound, like the shaking of a tree and rustling of leaves. Then once more he stepped to the side of the bed, and I heard another of those hornd blows-and silence-and another-and more silence-and the diabolical surgery was ended (From Uncle Silas)

Song

The autumn leaf was falling
At midnight from the tree,
When at her casement calling,
'I'm here, my love,' cried he
'Come down and mount behind me,
And rest your little head,
And in your white arms wind me,
Before that I be dead

'You've stolen my heart by magic,
I've kissed your hips in dreams
Our wooing, wild and trigie,
Has been in ghostly gleams
The wondrous love I bear you
Has made one life of twun,
And it will bless or scare you,
In deathless peace or pain

'Our dreamland shall be glowing,
If you my bride will be,
To darkness both are going,
Unless you ride with me
Come now, and mount behind me,
And rest your little head,
And in your white arms wind me,
Before that I be dead'

The edition of the Parcell Pafers published in 1830 contains a sympathetic Meinoir by A. P. Graves, who has also written a brographical preface to the Pacins and a very charming volume published by Le Fanu's brother William, entitled Secrety I ears of Iruk Life bears incidentally much affectionate testimony to the charm of a personality which fascinated all who came in contact with the novelist.

Mountstuart Elphinstone (1779-1859), fourth son of the cleventh Lord Elphinstone, was educated at Edinburgh and Kensington, and entered the Bengal Civil Service in 1795 In 1803 he served with distinction on Wellesley's staff, and was appointed resident at Nagpur, in 1808 he was sent as envoy to Shah Shuja at Cabul, and as resident from 1810 at Poona he ended the Mahratta war of 1817 and organised the newly acquired During his governorship of Bombay (1819-27) he founded the present system of administration, and greatly advanced public educa Returning to England in 1829, he declined the Governor-Generalship of India, and lived in comparative retirement until his death at Hookwood in Surrey His well known History of India appeared in 1841, has been often reprinted, and is still the standard popular work on the Moham medan period. It followed the Persian historian Ferishta rather closely, but many newer data and conclusions were incorporated in the 1866 edition by Professor Cowell, and retained in the subsequent Elphinstone also wrote an editions (7th, 1889) Account of Caubul as he saw it during his embassy, as well as a sketch of the Rise of British Power in the East, edited in 1887 by Sir Edward Colebrooke, who had published a Life of him in 1884 Another Memoir by Forrest is prefixed to his Official Writings (1884), and he is the subject of a monograph by Cotton in the 'Rulers of India' series (1892)

Thomas Babington Macaulay.

Macaulay was probably the most widely read and most generally popular author of his generation, and though his literary reputation has been seriously assailed since his death, the steady sale of his works conclusively proves that his hold upon the reading public remains almost un-Born on the 25th October 1800, he shaken. was the eldest child of Zachary Macaulay, the earnest and disinterested opponent of the slavetrade and of slavery His childhood was passed at Clapham, the headquarters of the Evangelical sect, of which his father was a prominent member, but the influence of his early surroundings was stronger in the direction of repulsion than of attraction. He was educated at a private school till the age of eighteen, when he matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge His years at Cambridge were the formative period of his life. He was already an eager student of the classics and an omnivorous reader of modern literature. He now acquired self-confidence by familiar intercourse with men of equal intellectual power with himself, and he became prominent as a fluent talker in private society and as a brilliant and ready speaker in the debates of the Union the same time he formed those political opinions of which he was to be so consistent a champion, both by voice and pen, in later life. His degree was undistinguished on account of his distaste for mathematics, but he gained prizes for English verse, a Craven scholarship, and ultimately in 1824 a fellowship at Trinity Macaulay's subsequent career was vitally affected by the failure of his father's business. At the very outset he was compelled not only to support himself, but to undertake the burden of paying off the creditors and of contributing to the muintenance of the family / He was called to the Bar in 1826, and two years later he was appointed a Commissioner in Bankruptcy But he was impelled by urgent reasons to supplement his fellowship and his official income by the earnings of his pen. His first contributions, both prose and verse, were made to Knight's Quarterly, but in 1825 he established that connection with the Edinbrogh Review which for more than thirty years brought equal fame both to the journal and to its brilliant contributor The consequent improvement in his finances enabled Macaulay in 1830 to accept from Lord Lansdowne the offer of a seat in Parliament for the borough of Calne In the great struggle of the Reform Bill the young member played a part of no small importance, and he was rewarded for his services by a post on the Board of Control Everything seemed to point to a distinguished career in politics, when he was induced by the prospect of permanent freedom from financial difficulties to accept the post of legal adviser to the Supreme Council in India For four years, 1834-38,

Macaulay was in India, where his most important work was associated with the drafting of the penal code and with the organisation of Indian education He returned to England in 1839, with the intention of devoting himself to the writing of a History of England from the accession of James II to the early years of the nineteenth century this purpose he was for a time distracted, partly by the incessant demands of the editor of the Edinburgh Review, and partly by the temptation to return to political life. He accepted the post of Secretary at War in the Whig Ministry, and was elected to the House of Commons by the city of Edinburgh The fall of the Ministry in 1841 gave him more leisure, until in 1846 he was once more in office as Paymaster of the But in 1847 his fulure to secure reelection for Edinburgh put an end to his active political life, and though he was triumphantly returned at the head of the poll in 1852, spoke occasionally in the House of Commons in 1852 and 1853, and in 1857 was raised to the House of Lords, he never sought to resume the burden of office, and the last twelve years of his life, clouded as time went on by fuling health, were devoted to literary work, and especially to the composition of his History, which had hardly reached the death of William III when he died, sitting among his books, on 28th December 1859

There is no great room for dispute about Macaulay's rank as a poet. He does not claim a place among the great poets of the world He had too little insight into the deeper problems and motives of human life and character to justify such a pretension. His own life was too free from the strongest passions and temp tations of humanity to enable him to interpret men's inner nature to themselves But as a writer of ballads, as a story-teller in verse, he had no superior in his own generation. There is a ring and a rattle about his stanzas which carry away the reader or reciter, and it is no small tribute to Macrulay's grasp of his own limitations that he did not give more time to a species of composition in which he grined such easy and yet well deserved fame. intelligent boys and girls, and to all who retain in later life the spirit and sentiment of youth, Macaulay's Lays will always make a strong appeal. It is not easy to choose extracts from narrative poems so widely known, but the stanzas quoted below from 'Horatius' will serve to illustrate the best qualities of Macaulay's verse.

Macaulty's speeches are of great interest and importance to the student of his prose style. The whole temper of his mind was oratorical. His speeches are spoken essays, his essays are written speeches. Even his conversation, as contemporary rivals humorously complained, was declamatory. The diffuseness of his writing, the almost excessive emphasis and elaboration with which he made his points and drove them home to his readers, are the result of this oratorical method. In the House of Commons Macaulay was at his best. He gained the ear of the House on his first appearance, and he never lost it. The report that 'Macaulay is up'always brought members hurrying from the library, the smoking-room, and the lobby. Yet the himitations of his oratory are as obvious as those of his poetry, and spring from the same causes. He could command an endless supply of telling and sonorous phrases, which he poured forth with a fluency that made him the despair of reporters, he was never at a loss for a striking illus tration, his arguments were always well marshalled ind transparently clear Yet he lacked the subtle sympathy and the electrical force of a really giest orator, he could convince, but he could not enchant. and it is difficult to believe that he could ever have reached the first rank as a debater His speeches are so coherent and so level in their uniform merit that it is as hard to find extracts from them as from his poems Perhaps his most famous speeches are those on the Reform Bill

(16th December 1831) and on the Maynooth grant (14th April 1845), from which passages are given below

No contributions to historical literature have ever achieved such immediate and lasting populirity as the Essays which Macaulay wrote for the Lamburgh Review Of these, twenty-two were published before his departure for India, three during his residence in the East, and eleven after his return With them may be reckoned the five biographies which he con tributed in his later years to the Encyclopadia Britannica, one of which, that on William Pitt, is as perfect in its way as anything Macaulay ever wrote That these Essays, forty one in all, are of unequal merit was inevitable, and that some of them would never have been repub lished if any one else had written them will I hardly be denied. But there are at least twenty, including all those on English history in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which are immortal. The Essays will probably continue to have fifty readers for every one who reads through the more ambitious History. This preference is to be justified on literary grounds. The form of the essay, a brilli int dissertation rather than an essay proper as the term was understood by Bacon and Hume, was Macaulay's own invention, and it has been imi tated ever since For such an essay, giving a graphic picture of a period, or a character, or a cateer, Macaulay's style was pre eminently suited Its rather metallic resonance, us rhetorical antitheses, occasional 1 t 5 frults of taste and empliasis, some times weary or even irritate the reader of a long continuous narra tive, but they were well fitted to arrest the attention of the most jaded render of a solid quarterly And it is as literature, not as history, that the Essays deserve their repu trition As Macau lay himself says of Temple 'The style of his essays as if he were writing for a select circle of scholars and specialists

As a historian Macaulay must be judged, not by the Essays, nor by the first two chapters of the History, which are prefatory and scarcely more solid than the Essays, but by his account of the reigns of James II and William III forming an estimate we must remember what was Macaulay's deliberate aim in writing history We have it in his own words 'History, at least in its state of ideal perfection, is a compound of poetry and philosophy It impresses general truths on the mind by a vivid representation of particular characters and incidents' 'A truly great historian would reclum those materials which the novelist has appropriated' 'I shall not be satisfied unless I produce something which shall for a few days supersede the last fashionable novel on the tables of young ladies' His avowed intention was to combine the picturesqueness of the Instorical novel with the accuracy of the historian, his models were Thucydides and Sir Walter Scott History in his mind must be above all things pictorial and dramatic, it must bring the characters and their actions on the stage-all the accessories in the way of scenery and subordinate personages must be supplied by the writer And he unquestionably succeeded in his aim. Carlyle with a few impressive touches may paint isolated scenes even more vividly than Macaulty, but he cannot produce such a uniform and con tinuous pageant Some may hold that Macaulay's supreme art as a scene shifter is never sufficiently concealed, that the machinery by which the puppets are worked is too obvious, others may doubt whether the pictorial conception of history is the highest or even in the end the truest, but no one can deny that Macaulay had a perfectly clear conception of the object which he desired to attain, and that he showed himself a perfect master of the means by which it could be achieved. It is inevitable that in such a scheme the reader must be left in large measure to draw his own conclusions from the events which are described. It is a lengthy process to apply the methods of the cinematograph to history, and Macaulty took five volumes to complete the animated picture of some sixteen years But the machinery would hardly work at all if at every turn it was necessary to explain not only that the event took place in a particular way, but also the why and the wherefore of each occurrence

Lack of philosophic insight is not the only charge which is brought against Macaulty. He is also accused of excessive party-spirit and of maccuracy resulting from the use of uncritical methods. The first of these charges has been enormously exaggerated. That Macaulay was a Whig, that he admired William III, and that he thoroughly approved of the principles of the Revolution nobody disputes. It is neither possible

nor wholesome for a man to write as if he had no opinions of his own But it cannot be contended that Macaulty is deliberately unfair, or that he set himself to write, not a history, but a political pamphlet Within the permissible and easily recognisable limits of political inclination he distributes praise and blame with praiseworthy fairness It is less easy to disprove the assertion that he was violently prejudiced against individuals, as Shaftesbury, Penn, and Marlborough, but his diatribes against them are quite independent of party-spirit In fact, Shaftesbury was the founder and first leader of the Whigs, and Marlborough in his later life became their intimate ally The second charge is perhaps the most formidable. It is not that Macaulty neglected his authorities, but that he used them in an uncritical way, that he deliberately rejected the systematic analysis of sources which was inculcated and practised by Von Ranke and other eminent contemporaries. Macaulay had read everything that was accessible at the time on the period which he treated. That he did not do more was probably due to the extraordinity memory which too often saved him from the necessity of abstract thought All his informa tion was collected, sorted, and fused together in his mind. He adjusted the evidence and draw his conclusions not so much by the processes of reason as by a sort of instinct It is not a method that could be safely recommended to every student of the past, but it is marvellous how successful it was in Macaulay's case Considering the scale on which he worked, inaccuracy in occasional details wis inevitable, yet those which have been detected by malevolent critics are comparatively few and unimportant On the other hand, there is a subtle inaccuracy in Macaulty's methods of statement which is almost as serious a fault as actual blunders extreme precision and his excessive emphasis are often in themselves misleading. Two instances must suffice. 'The House of Commons was more zealous for royalty than the king, more zealous for episcopacy than the bishops' 'To the seared consciences of Shaftesbury and Buckingham the death of an innocent man gave no more uneasiness than the death of a partridge' Such assertions, which might be indefinitely multiplied, go much further than could be justified by any authority Macaulay is a great artist in black and white rather than a great colourist, and the most delicate shading, a process in which he did not excel, can never supply the place of the infinite gradations of colour, and of those neutral tints which may not produce such brilliant pictures, but are nevertheless predominant in human history

From 'Horatius'

But with a crush like thunder
Fell every loosened beam,
And, like a dam, the mighty wreck
Lay right athwart the stream

And a long shout of triumph Rose from the wills of Rome, As to the highest threet tops Was splished the yellow foam

And, like a horse unbroken
When first he feels the rein,
The furious river struggled hard,
And tossed his tawny mane,
And burst the eurb, and bounded,
Rejoicing to be free,
And whirling down in fierce career,
Battlement, and plank, and pier,
Rushed headlong to the sea

Alone stood brave Horatius
But constant still in mind,
Thrice thirty thousand foes before,
And the broad flood behind
'Down with him' 'cried false Sextus,
With a smile on his pale face
'Now yield thee,' cried Lars Porsena,
'Now yield thee to our grace'

Round turned he, as not deigning
Those craven ranks to sec,
Nought spake he to Lars Porsena
To Sextus nought spake he
But he saw on Palatinus
The white porch of his home,
And he spake to the noble river
That rolls by the towers of Rome

'O Tiber! Father Tiber!
To whom the Romans pray,
A Roman's life, a Roman's arms,
Take thou in charge this day!'
So he spake, and speaking sheathed
The good sword by his side
And with his harness on his back,
Plunged headlong in the tide.

No sound of joy or sorrow
Was heard from either lank,
But friends and foes in dumb surprise
With parted lips and straining eyes,
Stood gazing where he sank,
And when above the surges
They saw his crest appear,
All Rome sent forth a rapturous cry,
And even the ranks of Tuscany
Could scarce forbear to cheer

Parliamentary Reform

We support this Bill We may possibly think it a better Bill than that which preceded it But are we therefore bound to admit that we were in the wrong, that the Opposition was in the right, that the House of Lords has conferred a great benefit on the nation? We siw—who did not see?—great defects in the first Bill. But did we see nothing else? Is delay no evil? Is prolonged excitement no evil? Is it no evil that the heart of a great people should be made sick by deferred hope? We allow that the changes which have been made are improvements. There probably never was a law which might not have been amended by delay. But there have been many cases in which there would have been more mischief in delay than benefit in the amend ments The first Bill, however inferior it may have been in its details to the present Bill, was yet herein far superior to the present Bill, that it was the first. If the first Bill had passed, it would, I firmly believe, have produced n complete reconciliation between the anistocracy and the people. It is my carnest wish and prayer that the present Bill may produce this blessed effect, but I cannot say that my hopes are so sanguine as they were at the beginning of the last session.

The decision of the House of Lords has, I fear, excited in the public mind feelings of resentment which will not soon be allayed What then, it is said, would you legis late in haste? Would you legislate in times of great excitement concerning matters of such deep concern? Yes, sir, I would, and if any bad consequences should follow from the liaste and excitement, let those be held responsible who, when there was no need of haste, when there existed no excitement, refused to listen to any pro jeet of Reform-nay, who made it an argument against Reform that the public mind was not excited few meetings were held, when few petitions were sent up to us, these politicians said, 'Would you alter a constitution with which the people are perfectly satis fied?' And now, when the kingdom from one end to the other is convulsed by the question of Reform, we hear it said by the very same persons, 'Would you alter the representative system in such agitated times as these?' Half the logic of misgovernment has in this one sophistical dilemma. If the people are turbulent, they are unfit for liberty, if they are quiet, they do not want liberty

I allow that hasty legislation is an evil. I allow that there are great objections to legislating in troubled times. But reformers are compelled to legislate fast, because bigots will not legislate early. Reformers are compelled to legislate in times of excitement, because bigots will not legislate in times of tranquillity. If ten years ago, may if only two years ago, there had been at the head of affairs men who understood the signs of the times and the temper of the nation, we should not have been forced to hurry now. If we cannot take our time, it is because we have to make up for their lost time. If they had reformed gradually, we might have reformed gradually, but we are compelled to move fast, because they would not move at all.

On the Maynooth College Bill.

Can we wonder that the eager, honest, hot headed Protestants, who raised you to power in the confident hope that you would curtail the privileges of the Roman Catholics, should stare and grumble when you propose to give public money to the Roman Catholics? Can we wonder that, from one end of the country to the other, everything should be ferment and uproar, that petitions should, night after night, whiten all our benches like a snowstorin? Can we wonder that the people out of doors should be exasperated by seeing the very men who, when we were in office, voted against the old grant to Maynooth, now pushed and pulled into the House by your whippers in to vote for an increased grant? The All those fierce spirits, natural consequences follow whom you hallooed on to harass us, now turn round and begin to worry you. The Orangeman mises his wir whoop Exeter Hall sets up its briv Mr Macneile shudders to see more costly cheer than ever provided for the priests of Baal at the table of the Queen, and the Protestant operatives of Dublin call for impeachments in exceedingly bad English But what did you expect? Did you think when, to serve your turn, you called the Devil up, that it was as easy to lay him as to raise him? Did you think, when you went on, session after session, thwarting and reviling those whom you knew to be in the right, and flattering the worst passions of those whom you knew to be in the wrong, that the day of reckoning would never come? It has come There you sit, doing penance for the disingenuousness of years. If it be not so, stand np munfully and clear your fame before the House and the country Show us that some steady prin ciple has guided your conduct with respect to Insh affairs. Show us how, if you are honest in 1845, you can have been honest in 1841 Explain to us why, after having goaded Ireland to madness for the purpose of ingritiating yourselves with the English, you are now setting England on fire for the purpose of ingratiating Give us some reason which yonrself with the Irish shall prove that the policy which you are following, as Ministers, is entitled to support, and which shall not equally prove you to have been the most factious and unprincipled Opposition that ever this country saw

(From Speech on the Maynooth Grant.)

The Roman Catholic Church.

There is not, and there never was on this earth, a work of human policy so well deserving of examination as the Roman Catholic Church The history of that Church joins together the two great ages of human civilisation. No other institution is left standing which carries the mind back to the times when the sinoke of sacrifice rose from the Pantheon, and when camelopards and tigers bounded in the Flavian amphitheatre. The proudest royal houses are but of yesterday, when compared with the line of the Supreme Pontiffs That line we trace back in an unbroken series, from the Pope who erowned Napoleon in the ninetcenth century to the Pope who crowned Pepin in the eighth, and far beyond the time of Pepin the august dynasty extends till it is lost in the twilight of fable. The Republic of Venice came next in antiquity But the Republic of Venice was modern when compared with the Papaey, and the Republic of Venice is gone, and the Papacy remains. The Papacy remains, not in decay, not a mere antique, but full of life and youth ful vigour The Catholie Church is still sending forth to the farthest ends of the world missionaries as zealous as those who landed in Kent with Augustine, and still confronting hostile kings with the same spirit with which she confronted Attila. The number of her children is greater than in any former age Her requisitions in the New World have more than compensated her for what she has lost in the Old Her spiritual ascendency extends over the vast countries which lie between the plains of the Missouri and Cape Horn, countries which a century hence may, not improbably, contain a population as large ns that which now inhabits Europe The members of her communion are certainly not fewer than a hundred and fifty millions, and it will be difficult to show that all the other Christian sects united amount to a hundred and twenty millions Nor do we see any sign which indicates that the term of her long dominion is approaching saw the commencement of all the governments and of all the ecclesiastical establishments that now exist in the world, and we feel no assurance that she is not destined to see the end of them all She was great and respected before the Saxon had set foot on Britain, before the Frank had passed the Rhine, when Grecian eloquence still flourished in Antioch, when idols were still worshipped in the temple of Mecca. And she may still exist in undiminished vigour when some traveller from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St Paul's.

(From Essay on Ranke's History of the Popes, Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1840 in Works, 1866, vol. vl.)

There have been numerous anticipations of this famous last sentence, the latest by Macaulay himself at the very end of his article on Milford's History of Greece, published in Knight's Quarterly Magazine in 1824 Five years before, in the preface to Peter Bell the Flurd Shelley had spoken of the time 'when London shall be an habitation of bitterns when St Paul's and Westminster Abbey shall stand shapeless and nameless ruins for the contem plation of some transatlantic commentator Wilcocks in his Roman Conversations (1792-94) imagined foreigners 2000 years lience sailing up the Thames in search of antiquities, passing 'through some arches of the broken bridge and viewing with admiration the still remaining portico of St Pauls. Still earlier in 1791 there is Volney's meditation in the second chapter of Les Ruines that some day 'on the banks of the Seine the Thames or the Zuider Zee a traveller may seat himself on silent ruins and bemoan in solitude the ashes of nations and the memory of their greatness. And seventeen years before Volney's book appeared, Horace Walpole in 1774 had warned Sir Horace Mann that 'at last some curious traveller would visit England and give a description of the ruins of St Paul s. Other anticipations are cited in our articles on Mis Barbauld (Vol. II p. 582) and on Henry Kirke White (Vol. II

The Death of Chatham

The Duke of Richmond had given notice of an address to the throne, against the further prosecution of hostili ties with America. Chatham had, during some time, absented himself from Parliament, in consequence of his growing infirmities. He determined to appear in his place on this occasion, and to declare that his opinions were decidedly at variance with those of the Rockingham He was in a state of great excitement medical attendants were uneasy, and strongly advised him to calm himself, and to remain at home not to be controlled His son William, and his son in law Lord Malion, accompanied him to Westminster rested himself in the Chancellor's room till the debate commenced, and then, leaning on his two young rela tions, limped to his seat. The slightest particulars of that day were remembered, and have been carefully He bowed, it was remarked, with great courtliness to those peers who rose to make way for him and his supporters. His crutch was in his He wore, as was his fashion, a rich velvet His wig was His legs were swathed in flannel so large and his face so emaciated that none of his features could be discerned, except the high curve of his nose, and his eyes, which still retained a gleam of the old fire

When the Duke of Richmond had spoken Chatham rose. For some time his voice was inaudible. At length his tones became distinct and his action mimated. Here and there his hearers caught a thought or an expression which reminded them of William Pitt. But it was clear that he was not himself. He lost the thread of his discourse, hesitated, repeated the same words several times, and was so confused that, in speaking of the Act of Settlement, he could not recall the name of the Electress Sophia. The House listened in solemn silence, and with the aspect of profound respect and compassion. The stillness was so deep that the dropping of a handkerchief

The Rellef of Londonderry

It was the twenty eighth of July The sun has just se the evening sermon in the cathedral was over and the hart broken congregation and separated, when the s number on the tower saw the sails of three reserts coming up the Loyle. Soon there was a stir in the Irish cump. The he negers were on the alert for unles along to hishores. The ships were in extreme peril, for the river was low, and the only navigable channel ran very near to the left bank, where the headquarters of the enemy hall been fixed, and where the batteries were mot numerous. Lealer performed his duty with a skill and spirit worths of his noble profession, exposed his frighte to cover the merchantmen, and use I his guns with great e tect. At length the little squadron came to the place of peril. Then the Wruntyey tool the lead, and went right at the boom. The hije barricade cracked and give in, but the shock was such that the Mount, r rebounded, and stuck in the mid. A vell of triumph rose from the banks, the Irish rushed to their boats, and vere prepring to board, but the Darte with poured on them a ell directed broads de, which threw them into disorder. Just then the Phame dished at the breach brave my ter was no more. A shot from one of the batteric had struck him, and he died by the most cast able of all deaths, in sight of the city which was his birthplace, which was his home, and which had just been and by his courage and self-devotion from the most frightful form of destruction. The might had closed in before the conflict at the boom began, but the first and the guns was seen and the roise heard by the less and shastly multi-ude which covered the walls of the city. When the Mainton prounded, and when the hour of triumph rose from the Iri h on both sides of the river, the heart of the lesieged died within them. whole circuit of the rimparts. The Irish guns continued to roar all night, and all night the bells of the rescued city made answer to the Irish guns with a peal of joyous dehance. Through the three following days the batteries of the enemy continued to play. But on the third night firmes were seen arising from the camp, and, when the first of August dawned, a line of smoking ruins marked the site litely occupied by the huts of the besiegers, and the citizens saw far off the long column of spikes and standards retreating up the left bank of the Foyle towards Strabane.

Five generations have since passed away, and still the wall of Londonderry is to the Protestants of Ulster what the trophy of Marathon was to the Athenians. A lofty pillar, rising from a bastion which bore during many weeks the heaviest fire of the enemy, is seen far up and down the Foyle. On the summit is the statue of Walker, such as when, in the last and most terrible emergency, his eloquence roused the fainting courage of his brethren In one hand he grasps a Bible, the other, pointing down the river, seems to direct the eyes of his famished audience to the English topmasts in the distant bay Such a monu ment was vell deserved, yet it was scarcely needed, for in truth the whole city is to this day a monument of the great deliverance. The wall is carefully preserved, nor would any plea of health or convenience be held by the inhabi tants sufficient to justify the demolition of that sacred enclosure which, in the evil time, gave shelter to their The summit of the ramparts race and their religion forms a pleasant walk. The bastions have been turned into little gardens. Here and there, among the shrubs and flowers, may be seen the old culverins which scattered bricks, cased with lead, among the Irish ranks. There is still a Walker Club and a Murray The humble tombs of the Protestant captains have been carefully sought ont, repaired, and embellished It is impossible not to respect the sentiment which indicates itself by these tokens. It is a sentiment which belongs to the higher and purer part of human nature, and which adds not a little to the strength of states. A people which takes no pride in the noble reliievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered with pride by remote descendants Yet it is impossible for the moralist or the statesman to look with unmixed complicency on the solemnities with which Londonderry commemorates her deliverance, and on the honours which she pays to those who saved her Unhappily, the animosities of her brave champions have descended with their glory The faults which are ordinarily found in dominant castes and dominant sects have not seldom shown themselves without disguise at her festivities, and even with the expressions of pious gratitude which have resounded from her pulpits have too often been mingled words of wrath and definice Trevelyan's Life and Letters of Lord Macaula; (1876) is one of the great biographies of the inneteenth century. Interesting criticisms of Macaulay may be found in J. Cotter Morison's Macaulay (English Men of Letters series) in Leslie Stephen's Hours in a Library, in Bagehot's Literary Studies, in John Morley's Critical Miscellanues, and in vol in of M. Taine's History of English Literature. His accuracy has been disputed by John Paget in his Vew Examen (1861) and Puzzles and Paradoxes (1874), by James Spedding, in Evenings with a Reviewor (1881), and by Sir J. F. Stephen, in The Story of Nunconar (1885).

John Austin (1790-1859), born at Creeting Mill, Suffolk, served some five years in the army in Sicily and Malta, but in 1818 was called to the Bar In 1820 he married Sarah Taylor (daughter of John Taylor 'of Norwich,' see Vol II p 742), and from 1826 to 1832, when he resigned from lack of students, was Professor of Jurispru dence in the newly founded university of London (now University College) His Province of Juris prudence Determined, defining (on a utilitarian basis) the sphere of ethics and law, practically revolutionised English views on the subject. He was once or twice put upon a royal commission, but his health was bad, in 1841-44 he lived in Germany, and in 1844-48 in Paris The Revolution of 1848 drove him back to England, and he then settled at Weybridge, where he died His Lectures on Jurisprudence were published by his widow (1863, new ed. by Campbell, 1869) A Memoir by Mrs Austin was prefixed to a new edition of the Pro vince (1861) Mrs Aust n (1793-1867) was known by her translations from German and French, including Ranke's Popes and Guizot's Civilisa tion, and wrote books on Germany and national education The only child of this gifted couple, Lucie (1821-69), who married Sir Alexander Duff Gordon (1811–72, latterly a Commissioner of Inland Revenue), was also an accomplished translator from the German, and in South Africa, whither she had gone for her health, indited her vivacious Letters from the Cape (1862, new ed, with preface by George Meredith, 1903) From 1862 she lived, almost like a native, on the Nile or in Egypt, whence she sent to the press two series of Letters from Egypt See Three Generations of Englishwomen (1889), by Janet Ross, daughter of Lady Duff Gordon, who has also written several books on things Tuscan

Several tunes were the assailants driven back in disarray

After some hours of sharp conflict a short pause ensued But at three in the afternoon Vendome, having sent a second summons, which was rejected like the former. gave orders for a general assault. Besides playing field pieces from the hills, which were so close as to command most of the streets, and besides renewing the onset in the two breaches, he spring a mine under one of the gates Some of his men, moreover, found means to break passages through the wall into houses which adjoined it, and there they established themselves in force before they were per The English, however, with unabated spirit still fought on Still on every point they bent back their assailants How many an anxious look must they mean while have cast to the opposite heights, on which they expected every moment to see Staremberg and his army appear! Hour after hour passed and no sign of such succour came. Still worse was the rumour now rife among themselves, that their own ammunition had begun

Even then the resistance of these stout soldiers did not cease. 'Even with bayonets'-so writes Stanhope to Lord Dartmouth-'the enemy were more than once driven out by some of our troops who had spent their shot, and when no other remedy was left, the town was preserved some time by putting fire to the houses which they had possessed, and where many of them were de and when things were reduced to the last extremity, that the enemy had a considerable body of men in the town, and that in our whole garrison we had not five hundred men who had any ammunition left, I thought myself obliged in conscience to save so many brave men, who had done good service to the Queen. and will. I hope, live to do so again. So about seven of the clock I beat the chamade, and obtained the capitula tion of which I send your Lordship the copy '

In this capitulation the enemy had been willing to grant most honourable terms, and on these terms then did Stanhope and his gallant little army become prisoners of war. Their defence of Brihuega had cost them 600 men in killed and wounded, while that of the Spaniards was acknowledged by themselves as double, and may even have amounted to 1500, which was Stanhope's computation (From the History of England, Chap XIII)

Lord North's Resignation of Office

For some time past it had been manifest—and to none more clearly than to Lord North—that although the downfall of the Ministry might be a little delayed or a little quickened, it could not, at that juncture, be averted With honest zeal he had been striving to reconcile the King's mind to this unavoidable necessity. On the 10th, at last, His Majesty agreed that the Chancellor should see Lord Rockingham, and learn from him on what terms he might be willing to construct another Ministry. Lord Rockingham's demands were found to be, that a Ministry should be formed on the basis of peace and economy, and that three Bills-namely, Sir Philip Clerke's on Contractors, Mr Burke's on Economical Reform, and Mr Crewe's on Revenue Officers-should he made Govern ment measures. To the basis I hurlow offered no object tion, but he would by no means consent to the three At last, in a final conference with Rockingham, the Chancellor broke off in much wrath, declaring (and with many an oath, no doubt) that he would bave no further communication with a man who thought the exclusion of a contractor from Parliament, and the dis franchisement of an exciseman, of more importance than the salvation of the country at this crisis Rockingham,' added he, 'is bringing things to a pass where either his head or the King's must go, in order to settle which of them is to govern the country!'

Scarcely less ardent were, at one time, the feelings of the Sovereign himself He contemplated with the utmost aversion his return to the oligarchy of the great Whig Houses He had even some design of taking his departure for Hanover if the terms required of him should be altogether preconcilable with his sense of right. Such a design had once before arisen in his mind in the midst of the Gordon riots We now find a mysterious hint of it in his letters to Lord North, and it is certain, writes Horace Walpole, that for a fortnight together the Royal yacht was expediting and preparing for his vovage. What further steps His Majesty may have had in view -whether his recession was to be permanent or tem porary - whether he meant to leave the Queen as Regent or to take her and the Princes with him-can at present only be surmised

It appears, however, that by degrees the King became more reconciled to the present, or more hopeful of the future. Lord North being with him on the afternoon of the 20th, His Majesty acknowledged that, considering the temper of the Commons he thought the administra 'Then, Sir,' said Lord North, 'had I tion at an end not better state the fact at once?'-'Well, you may do so,' replied the King Enger to make use of this per mission, Lord North hastened down to the House of Commons in Court dress - He rose to speak at the same moment with Lord Surrey, and neither would give way Loud were the shouts and cries in that thronged House, the one party calling for Lord Surrey, and the other for Lord North At length, to restore some order, Fox moved 'That the Earl of Surrey do first speak ' But iminch ately Lord North, with presence of mind mixed with pleasantry, started up again 'I rise,' he said, 'to speak to that motion,' and, as his reason for opposing it, stated that he had resigned, and that the Ministry was no more Next, in some farewell sentences, he pro eeeded, with excellent taste and temper, to thank the House for their kindness and indulgence, and he would add forbearance, during so many years. And finally, to leave time for his successors, he proposed and carried an adjournment of some days.

There was on this occasion another slight but characteristic incident which more than one eve witness has recorded. It was a cold wintry evening, with a fall of snow. The other Members, in expectation of a long debate, had dismissed their carriages. Lord North, on the contrary, had kept his waiting. He put into it one or two of his friends, whom he invited to go home with him, and then, turning to the crowd chiefly composed of his bitter enemies, as they stood shivering and clustering near the door, he said to them with a placid smile, 'You see, gentlemen, the advantage of being in the secret Good night '--' No man,' says Mr Adam of his speech and whole conduct that evening, 'ever showed more calmness, cheerfulness, and sercint.' The temper of his whole family was the same. I dined with them that day, and was witness to it.'

Thus ended I ord North's administration of twelve years. It is certainly strange, on contemplating these twelve years, to find so many harsh and rigorous measures proceed from the most gentle and good humoured of Prime Ministers. Happy had but greater firmness in maintaining his own opinions been joined to so much ability in defending opinions even when not his own!

Charles Swain (1801-74), a Manchester man, was originally a clerk in a dye work, but after his thirtieth year became connected with a large engraving and lithographing business, of which he was ultimately the proprietor. He had begun to send poetry to the magazines, and in 1827 pub lished Metrical Essays, the first of a series of volumes of poetry, including Rhymes for Child hood and Diamatic Chapters, Poems, and Songs, besides The Mind and other Poems (1832), which reached a sixth edition in 1873, and Songs and Ballads (his twelfth volume, 1867), which was in a fifth edition in 1877. A Life was prefixed to an edition of his poems-mostly marked by sweetness, grace, and melody-published in the United States in 1887, at which date a Civil List pension was conferred on him at home

Thomas Cooper (1805-92), the Chartist poet, who lived to be called the 'last of the Chartists' and to write Thoughts at Fourscore, was born at Leicester in 1805, and was apprenticed to a shoe maker at Gainsborough where he became the friend of Thomas Miller (see below) Spite of liard labour and insufficient food (lie often swooned when he tried to take his cup of oatmeal gruel at the end of the day's work), he would rise at three in the morning to teach himself Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and French, and he became a schoolmaster at twenty-three, and about the same time a local Methodist preacher. He found time for very wide and varied reading in history and English literature, and after reporting for some of the newspapers in the Midlands, he became leader of the Leicester Chartists in 1841, and was an active editor of tracts He lectured in the Potteries during the riots in August 1842, was arrested on a charge of conspiracy and sedition, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment in Stafford Jul he wrote The Purgatory of Suicides, a poem in the Spenserian stanza, and Wise Sarus and Modein Instances, a series of tales, which were both published in 1845 In prison he had become a pronounced sceptic, though he never taught 'blank atheism,' he says, and the reading of George Ehot's translation of the Leben Jesu made him for years a whole-hearted disciple of Strauss In 1846 appeared his Baron's Ynle Feast, a Christmas Rhymu, and a series of papers headed 'Condition of the People of England' in Donglas Jerrold's Newspaper In 1848 lic began to lecture on history and politics in London, set up the Plain Speaker and Coopers Journal, two short heed penny weeklies, and published two novels, Alderman Ralph (1853) and The Family Lend (1854). In 1855 a new religious life dawned for him be utterly recented his sceptical views and doubts, became a zealous Christian, and joining the Bap tists, was an effective and acceptable preacher He was always an honest, if impulsive, thinker, and was latterly a sincere but old fashioned Radical In 1867 his friends purch ised an annuity for him. He published his Autobiography in 1872, The Paradise of Martyrs, an unfinished poem, in 1873, and an edition of his Poetical Works in 1878, and in the last year of his life he got a Civil Service pension of £200

The Purgatory of Suicides, the chief occupation of his prison life, was also Cooper's most no able In the prison he was ultimately production allowed to have his books, to read Gibbon through for the second time, to revel in Slinkespeare and Vilton, and to commit to memory, out of Chan bers's Cyclopwaia of Eiglish Literature, 'por tions of almost evers English poet of eminence.' Already in his reporter days he had 'conceived as in an instant in epic wherein the souls of suicidal kings and other remarkable personages should be interlocutors on some high theme or themes,' and had resolved on The Purgutery of Suicides as the title for it. It was primarily a vision of suicides, including all lie could remember, but omitting, to his subsequent regret, Lord Clive and Uriel Acosta, whose history had specially impressed linn, though in prison he had forgotten his name Oppressed with the cruelties, bischess, horrors, sliams, hypocrisies, and injustices of his own and past times-especially those which the poor suffer at the hands of the rich-the poet is driven to ask 'Is life worth having?' and to sym pathise with those who in despair have succumbed But the to fite by shortening their own lives poem does not deal much with suicide, it is a 'mind history,' and is largely an impeachment of oppression, a claim of human rights, a denunciation of priestcrast, bad government, Castlerea, h, Union workhouses, and slavery black and white, and there are still pretty strong traces of his early scepticism, conscientiously permitted to stand by the author after reconversion, as being part of his Disraeli (Beaconsfield), Dickens, actual lustory and Jerrold encouraged the convict-poet, and in the Purgatory Carlyle found 'indisputable traces of genius-a dark, Titanic energy struggling there for which we hope there will be clearer daylight by and by 'But the too friendly entic not unwisely advised him to say what he had to say in prose probably he too saw that the ten books of Spen serian stanzas were long and wearisome are touches of true sentiment in the 'prison rhyme,' much sound sense, not a little acute argument, and some bombastic rhetoric, but only a little poetry. Probably Cooper's best work was in some of his prose addressed to working men. The first verses of one of Cooper's 'Chartist hymns,' 'sung to the noble an of the Old Hundredth,' ran as follows (somewhat like the corresponding work of the Corn I aw rhymer, page 231)

God of the earth, and sea, and sky, To Thee Thy mournful children ery Didst Thou the blue that bends o'er all Spread for a general funeral pall?

Sadness and gloom pervade the land, Death—famine—glare on either hand, Didst Thou plant earth upon the wave Only to form one general grave?

Welcome, sweet kohin! welcome cheerful one!
Why dost thou slight the merry fields of corn,
The sounds of human joy, the plenty strown
I rom Antumn's teening lap and, by gray morn,
Ere the sun wakes, sing thus to things of scorn
And infamy and want and sadness whom Their stronger fellow criminals have torn From freedom and the gladsome light of home,
To quench the nobler spark within, in dangeon'd gloom?

Why dost thou choose, throughout the livelong day, A prison rampart for thy perch, and sing As thou wouldst rend thy fragile throat? Away, My little friend, away, upon light wing, A while! Me it will cheer, imagining Till thou revisit this my drear sojourn, How, on the margent of some silver spring Mantled with golden likes, thou dost turn Thy pretty head away, so meaningly, and yearn,

I rom out that beaming look to know what thoughts Within the beauteous arrow head may dwell—
The purple eye petalled with snow, that floats So gracefully Dost think the damosel, Young Hope, kirtled with Chastity, there fell Into the stream, and grew n flower so fur?
Ah! still thou linger'st, while I, dreaming tell Of pleasures I would reap, if free I were, Like thee, loved bird, to breathe sweet Freedom's balmy air

Away 1—for this is not n clime for thee—
Sweet childhood's secred one! While working at his trade in Nottingham he submitted his poems to Thomas Buley, a journalist, whose son was the author of Fistus, and Bulev encouraged Miller to publish Songs of the Sea Nyn phs (1832) Shortly afterwards he removed to London, hoping to contribute to the magazines, but he had a wears wait for recognition, and had to earn his living by working at his old trade. Having one day sent to Lady Blessington some biskets containing verses, he was welcomed to her house 'Often,' he wrote 'have I been sitting in Lady Blessington's splendid drawing-room in the morning, and talking and laughing as familiarly as in the old house it home, and on the same evening I might have been seen on Westminster Bridge, between an apple vendor and a baked potato merchant selling my baskets' About 1845 he was enabled, mainly through the assistance of Samuel Rogers to start business as a bookseller and publisher in Newgate Street, but, fuling to succeed, soon devoted him self entirely to writing. Ultimately he had produced not fewer than forty five volumes, including several works of fiction, in which country characters and scenes are drawn with skill. His best known novel is Royston Gover, or the Days of King John (1838), another tale is Gideon Giles the Roper volume of Rural Sketches was largely circulated, as were most of his books dealing with the country He contributed leading articles to the London daily papers, reviews to the Ithenaum, and much miscellineous prose and poetry to the periodicals but died in poverty

James Ballantine (1808-77) nuthor of 'Ilka blade o' grass keps its ain drap o' dev' and other Scotch songs, was born in Ldinburgh and trained as a house painter, but having studied drawing and painting, became conspicuous as a reviver of the art of glass painting. Some of his best I nown songs and ballads are to be found in two proseculumes, The Gab etuncie's Il allet (1843) and The Miller of Deanhaugh '1845).

with its vivid narrative of Dick Turpin's ride to York. In the interest and rapidity of his scenes and adventures, Ainsi orth showed some dramatic power, but little originality or felicity in humour or character. His romance, Crichton (1837), is founded on the marvellous history of the 'Admirable' Scot, and later works were Jack Shippard (1839), a sort of Newgate romance, The Fower of London, Guy Farkes, Old St Paul's, Windsor Castle, The Lancashire Witches, The Star Chamber, The Flitch of Bacon, The Spendthrift, &c. There are rich, copious, and brilliant descriptions in some of these stories, but both their resthetic value and their moral tendency were—and are now—open to much criticism, there are certainly too many scenes of low but successful villainv, too many ghastly and unrelieved details of human suffering As romances, they abound in incident, and are elaborately and ingeniously constructed, but in their strongest situations are often frankly incredible, and the style, especially in the conversations, is artificial and stilted to a degree Even in the most appalling crises his characters 'reply to one another in the affirmative' and call a church the sacred pile or the reverend structure. When a beautiful girl is being roasted alive in a burning house one friend says to another, 'I will ascertain' how the case stands, and 'liaving learned to his great satisfaction what had occurred' (viz., that she has been saved), 'he flex back and briefly explained the situation of the parties. The most intimate dialogue also is inno cently constructed so as 'to explain the situation of the parties' to the reader, and to expound incidents not elsewhere recorded The author is fond of such participal constructions as 4 nocking at the door, an elderly servant appeared, when it I

The Dance of Death

On the night of their liberation, Chowles and Judith pro ceeded to the vaults of Saint Paitli's, to deposit within them the plunder they had obtained in the prison found them entirely deserted Neither verger, sexton, nor any other person was to be seen, and they took up their quarters in the crypt. Having brought a basket of provisions and a few bottles of wine with them, they deter mined to pass the night in revelry, and, accordingly, having lighted a fire with the fragments of old cossins brought from the charnel, they sat down to their meal Having done full justice to it, and disposed of the first flask, they were about to abandon themselves to unre strained enjoyment, when their glee was all at once interrupted by a strange and unaccountable noise in the adjoining church Chowles, who had just commenced chanting one of his wild melodies, suddenly stopped, and Judith set down the glass she had raised to her lips in What could it mean? Neither of them could It seemed like strains of unearthly music, mixed with shrieks and groans as of tortured spirits, accom panied by peals of such laughter as might be supposed to proceed from demons

'The dead are burst forth from their tombs,' cried Chowles, in a quavering voice, 'and are attended by a legion of evil spirits.'

'It would seem so,' replied Judith, rising 'I should lil e to behold the sight Come with me'

'Not for the world!' rejoined Chowles, shuddering, 'and I would recommend you to stay where you are. You may behold your dead husband among them'

'Do you think so?' rejoined Judith, halting
'I am sure of it,' cried Chowles, eagerly 'Stay where

'I am sure of it,' cried Chowles, eagerly 'Stay where you are—stay where you are'

As he spoke, there was another peal of infernal laughter, and the strains of music grew louder each moment

'Come what may, I will see what it is,' said Judith, emptying her glass, as if seeking courage from the draught 'Surcly,' she added, in a taunting tone, 'you will come with me.'

'I am afraid of nothing earlily,' rejoined Chowles—'but I do not like to face beings of another world'

'Then I will go alone,' rejoined Judith

'Nay, that will never be,' replied Chowles, toltering

As they opened the door and crossed the charmel, such an extraordinary combination of sounds burst upon their cars that they again paused, and looked anxiously at Chowles laid his liand on his companion's each other arm, and strove to detain her, but she would not be stayed, and he was forced to proceed. Setting down the lamp on the stone floor, Judith passed into the sub terranean church, where she beheld a sight that almost In the midst of the nave, which was petrified her illumined by a blue glimmering light, whence proceed ing it was impossible to determine, stood a number of grotesque figures, apparelled in fantastic garls, and each Some of the latter grisly shapes attended by a skeleton were playing on tambours, others on psalteries, others on rebecs-every instrument producing the strangest sound imaginable. Viewed through the massive pillars, beneath that dark and ponderous roof, and by the mystic light before described, this strange company had a super natural appearance, and neither Chowles nor Judith donbted for a moment that they beheld before them a congregation of phantoms An irresistible feeling of curiosity prompted them to advance. On drawing nearer, the; found the assemblage comprehended all ranks of There was a pope in his tiara and pontifical dress, a cardinal in his cap and robes, a monarch with a sceptre in his hand, and arrayed in the habiliments of royalty, a crowned queen, a bishop wearing his mitre, and carrying his crosier, an abbot likewise in his mitre, and bearing a croster, a duke in his robes of state, a grave canon of the church, a knight sheathed in armour, a judge, an advocate, and a magistrate, all in their robes, a mendicant friar and a nun, and the list was completed by a physician, an astrologer, a miser, a mer cliant, a duchess, a pedlar, a soldier, a gamester, an idiot, a robber, a blind man, and a beggar-each distin guishable by his apparel.

By and by, with a wild and gibbering laugh that chilled the beholders' blood, one of the tallest and grishest of the skeletons sprang forward, and beating his drum, the whole ghostly company formed, two and two, into a line—a skeleton placing itself on the right of every mortal. In this order, the fantastic procession marched between the pillars, the uncartfuly music playing all the while, and disappeared at the further extremity of the church. With the last of the group the mysterious light vanished, and Chowles and his companion were left in profound darkness.

'What can it mean?' cried Judith, as soon as she recovered her speech. 'Are they human or spirits?'

'Human beings don't generally amuse themselves in this way,' returned Chowles 'But hark!—I still hear the music. They are above—in Saint Paul's'

'Then I will join them,' said Judith 'I am resolved to see the end of it'

'Don't leave me behind,' returned Chowles, following her 'I would rather keep company with Beelzebinb and all his imps than be alone'

Both were too well acquainted with the way to need any light. Ascending the broad stone steps, they presently emerged into the cathedral, which they found illumined by the same glimmering light as the lower church, and they perceived the ghostly assemblage gathered into an immense ring, and dancing round the tall skeleton, who continued beating his drain, and uttering a strange gabbering sound, which was echoed by the others. Each moment the dancers increased the swiftness of their pace, until at last it grew to a giddy whirl, and then, all at once, with a shriek of laughter, the whole company fell to the ground

Chowles and Judith then, for the first time, understood, from the confusion that ensued and the exclamations uttered, that they were no spirits they had to deal with, but beings of the same mould as themselves. Accordingly, they approached the party of masquers, for such they proved, and found on inquiry that they were a party of young gallants, who, headed by the Earl of Rochester—the representative of the tall skeleton—had determined to realise the Dance of Death, as once depicted on the walls of an ancient cloister at the north of the cathedral, called Pardon churchyard, on the walls of which, says

Stowe, were 'artificially and richly painted the Dance of Macabre, or Dance of Death, commonly called the Dance of Paul's, the like whereof was painted about Saint Innocent's at Paris. The metres, or poesy of this dance,' proceeds the same authority, 'were translated out of I rench into English by John Lydgate, monk of Bury and with the picture of Death leading all estates, painted about the cloister, at the special request and expense of Jenkin Carpenter, in the reign of Henry the Sixth'

The Duke of Wellington employed him in some pamphileteering work, and he was Secretary to the Board of Control in 1834-35, but although his maiden speech in Parliament had been greeted with applicast, he failed to win distinction in politics. He died of consumption at the fatal age of thirty-seven.

Pried's poems were collected and published first in America in 1844, the earliest authorised edition in England, with a Memoir by Derwent Coleridge, appeared only in 1864, and was followed in 1887 and 1888 by his prose essays and his poli tical squibs These last were accounted too goodnatured to be effective, and it is on his dainty  $\tau cs$ de société and his essays in what has been called 'metrical genie painting' that his poetic reputation The best of his verses—The Vicar, for example, and Quince-show a mingling of humour, wit, and pathos perhaps more refined, though less intense and vital, than is found in Hood-a poet to whom in some regards Praed bears a notable resemblance. Most of his society verses are mere trifles, but everywhere, even in his charades, one finds delicate good taste and finished execution His skill as a nietrist within certain limits is unfailing, but here again he shows a narrower range and a less vigorous energy than Hood world of English literature he stands in a small group apart—almost a coterie—with Locker Lamp son and Calverley and their like, and as yet he is perhaps the greatest of the band

The Vicar

Some years ago, ere time and taste
Had turned our parish topsy turvy,
When Darnel Park was Darnel Waste,
And roads as little known as scurvy,
The man who lost his way between St Mary's Hall and Sandy Thicket
Was always shown across the green,
And guided to the Parson's wicket.

Back flew the bolt of lissom lath,

Fair Margaret, in her tidy kirtle,
Led the lorn traveller up the path,

Through elean clipt rows of box and myrtle,
And Don and Sancho, Tramp and Tray,

Upon the parlour steps collected,

Wagged all their tails, and seemed to say,

'Our master I nows you—you re expected'

Uprose the Reverend Dr Brown,
Uprose the Doctor's winsome marrow,
The lady laid her knitting down,
Her husband clasped his ponderous Barrow,
Whate'er the stranger's easte or creed,
Pundit or Papist, saint or sinner,
He found a stable for his steed,
And welcome for himself, and dinner

If, when he reached his journey's end, And warmed himself in Court or College, He had not gained an honest friend, And twenty curious scraps of knowledge,— If he departed as he came,
With no new light on love or liquor,—
Good sooth, the traveller was to blame,
And not the Vicarage, nor the Vicar

His talk was like a stream, which runs
With rapid cliange from rocks to roses
It slipped from politics to puns,
It passed from Mahomet to Moses,
Beginning with the laws which keep
The planets in their radiant courses,
And ending with some precept deep
For dressing eels or shoeing horses

He was a shrewd and sound Divine,
Of loud Dissent the mortal terror,
And when, by dint of page and line,
He 'stablished Truth, or startled Error,
The Baptist found hlm far too deep,
The Deist sighed with saving sorrow,
And the lean Levite went to sleep,
And dreamed of tasting pork to morrow

His sermon never said or showed That Earth is foul, that Heaven is gracious, Without refreshment on the road
From Jerome, or from Athanasius
And sure a righteous zeal inspired
The hand and head that penned and planned them
For all who understood admired,
And some who did not understand them

He wrote, too, in a quiet way,
Small treatises and smaller verses,
And sage remarks on chalk and clay,
And hints to noble Lords—and nurses,
True histories of last year's ghost,
Lines to a ringlet, or a turban,
And trifles for the Morning Post,
And nothings for Sylvanus Urban

He did not think all inischief fair,
Although he had a knack of joking,
He did not make himself a bear
Although he had a taste for sinoking,
And when religious sects ran mad,
He held, in spite of all his learning,
That if a man's belief is bad,
It will not be improved by burning

And he was kind, and loved to sit
In the low hut or garnished cottage,
And praise the farmer's homely wit,
And share the widow's homelier pottage
At his approach complaint grew inild,
And when his hand unbarred the shutter,
The claims hips of fever smiled
The welcome which they could not utter

He always had a tale for me
Of Julius Cresar, or of Venus,
From him I learnt the rule of three,
Cat's cradle, leap frog, and Qua genus
I used to singe his powdered wig
To steal the staff he put such trust in,
And make the puppy dance a jig,
When he began to quote Augustine.

Alack the change ' in vain I look

For haunts in which my boxhood trifled,—
The level lawn, the trickling brook,

The trees I chimbed, the beds I rifled
The church is larger than before,

You reach it by a carriage entry,
It holds three hundred people more,

And pews are fitted up for gentry

Sit in the Vicar's sent you'll hear
The doctrine of a gentle Johnian,
Whose hand is white, whose tone is clear,
Whose phrase is very Ciceronian
Where is the old man laid?—look down,
And construe on the slab before you,
Hie jacet Gulelinus Brown,
Vir nullâ non donandus lauru'

The Rainbow

My First in torrents bleak and black
Was rushing from the sky,
When with my Second at his back Young Cupid wandered by,
'Now take me in, the moon hath past,
I pray ye, take me in'
The lightnings flash, the hail falls fast,
All Hades rides the thunder blast,
I'm dripping to the skin!'

'I know thee well, thy songs and sighs,
A wieked god thou art,
And yet most welcome to the eves,
Most witching to the heart '
The Wanderer prayed another prayer,
And shook his drooping wing,
The Lover bade him enter there,
And wrung my First from out his har,
And dried my Second's string

And therefore (so the urchin swore,
By Styx, the fearful river,
And by the shafts his quiver bore,
And by his shining quiver)
That Lover aye shall see my Whole
In Life's tempestuous Heaven,
And, when the lightnings cease to roll,
Shall fix thereon his dreaming soul
In the deep calm of even

Robert Stephen Hawker (1804-75), Cornish poet and unconventional parson, was born at Plymouth, the son of a physician who afterwards took orders, and grandson of a vicar of Plymouth who compiled the Morning and Evening Portions and wrote many other theological works Hawker went up from Cheltenham Grammar School to Pembroke College, Oxford, in 1823, his father found himself unable to keep him there, but that same autumn the poetic but practical and resolute undergraduate married a lady of fortune and forty one, and with her returned to Oxford He carried off the Newdigate in 1827, was ordained in 1831, and in 1834 became vicar of Morwenstow, on the Cornish coast. Its parishioners were demoralised by generations of wrecking, smuggling, and spiritual ignorance, but in his forty years' labour he rebuilt the vicarige, restored the church, built a school, and introduced a weekly offertory and a striking ceremonal largely of his own devis ing He was a devoted parson, but was fond of open air life, and was the intimate and ally of his seafaring parishioners, a mystic in religion, he even shared many of the superstitions of his people as to apparitions and the evil eye. His usual garb was an odd compound of seaman's rig and imposing hyper ecclesiastical costume-strange brightcoloured vestments imperfectly concealing seaboots to the knee In his poetry, the spontaneous outpouring of a complex but vigorous personality too much absorbed by active life and its duties and joys to become a 'professional poet,' Hawker is delightful His Tendrils by Reuben, published at seventeen, he did not reprint, but by his Cornish ballads in Records of the Western Shore (1832-36), the Quest of the Sangraal (1863), and other poems he showed himself unmistakably a poet. His Footprints of Former Men in Coinwall (1870) was a collection of miscellaneous papers on local traditions. None of Hawker's poems is so well known as his spirited 'Song of the Western Men,' based on the old Cornish refrain, 'And shall Trelawny die?' a ballad so spontaneous and swinging in its rhythms as to have deceived Sir Walter Scott and Lord Macaulay into accepting it as a genuine relic of the seventeenth century wife died in 1863—a blow that drove the eccentric parson-poet to melancholy and opium, from which he was saved only by the loyalty of his second wife (1864), daughter of a Polish exile, who bore him three daughters, and nursed his declining years with rare devotion. He died at Plymouth 15th August 1875, having been admitted twelve hours before to the Roman Catholic communion was a painful controversy after his death as to whether and how long he had been a Roman Catholic at heart

In Hawker's Sangraal, Arthur, much unlike his Tenny sonian namesake, speaks to his comrades of the Table Round as a mediæval English crusader might well have done

Ho for the Sangraal, vanished vase of God! Ye know that in old days, that yellow Jew Accursed Herod, and the earth wide judge, Pilate the Roman, doomster for all lands-Or else the judgment had not been for all-Bound Jesu master to the world's tall tree Slowly to die -Ha, sirs, had we been there They durst not have assayed their felon deed,-Excalibur had eleft them to the chine !-Slowly he died, a world in every pang, Until the hard centurion's cruel spear Smote his high heart and from that severed side Rushed the red stream that quenched the writh of heaven Then came Sir Joseph, hight of Arimathie, Bearing that awful vase the Sangraal! The vessel of the Pasch, Shere Thursday night, The self same cup wherein the faithful wine Heard God, and was obedient unto blood, Therewith he knelt, and gathered blessed drops From his dear Master's side that sadly fell,

The ruddy dews from the great tree of life Sweet Lord! What treasures! like the priceless gems Hid in the tawny easl et of a king-A ransom for an army, one by one ! That wealth he cherished long his very soul Aroun I his arl bent as before a shrine. He dwell in Orien Syria, God sown land The ladder foot of Heaven-where shadowy shapes In white apparel glided up and down ! His home was like a garner, full of corn And wine and oil a granary of God Young men, that no one knew, went in and out With a far look in their eternal eyes All things were strange and rare the Sangraal As though it clung to some ethercal chain Brought down high Heaven to earth at Arimathie

The Song of the Western Men.

A good sword and a trusty hand!
A merry heart and true!
King James's men shall understand
What Cornish lads can do

And have they fixed the where and when?
And shall Trelawny die?
Here's twenty thousand Cornish men
Will know the reason why!

Out spake their captain brave and bold,
A merry vight was he
'If London Tower were Michael's hold,
We ll set Trelawny free!

'We Il cross the Tamar, land to land,
The Severn is no stry,
With "one and all, and hand in hand,
And who shall bid us may?

'And when we come to London Wall,
A pleasant sight to view,
Come forth ' come forth, ye cowards all, licre's men as good as you!

'Trelawny he s in keep and hold, Trelawny he may die, But here s twenty thousand Cornish bold, Will know the reason why!'

Sir Beville The Gate-song of Stowe

Arise! and away! for the King and the land, Farewell to the couch and the pillow with spear in the rest, and with rein in the hand, Let us rush on the foe like a billow

Call the hind from the plough, and the herd from the fold,
Bid the wassailer cease from his revel
And ride for old Slowe, where the bunner's unrolled,
For the cause of King Charles and Sir Beville

Trevanion is up, and Godolphin is nigh, And Harris of Hayne's o er the river, From I unly to I ooe, 'One and all' is the ery, And the King and Sir Beyille for ever

As t by Tre, Pol, and Pen, ye may know Cornish men, 'Mid the names and the nobles of Devon,—
But if truth to the King be a signal, why then Ye can find out the Granville in heaven

Ride I ride! with red spur, there is death in delay,
"Tis a race for dear life with the devil,
If dark Cromwell prevail, and the King must give way,
This earth is no place for Sir Beville

So at Stamford he fought, and at Lansdown he fell,
But vain were the visions he cherished,
For the great Cornish heart, that the King loved so well,
In the grave of the Granville it perished

See Lives—from opposite points of view on the Catholic question—by Mr Baring Gould (1875, 3rd ed. 1886) and by Dr F G Lee (1876) an edition of Hawker's poems, with a short Life by J C Godwin (1879) one of his prose works (1893) and another of his poems with a bibliography by S. Wallis (1899)

Lord Houghton (1809-85), long known in literature and public life as Richard Monckton Milnes, was born in London, the only son of Robert Pemberton Milnes, 'Single speech Milnes' (1784-1858), of Friston Hall, Bawtry Hall, and Great Houghton, Yorkshire, who declined the Chancellorship of the Exchequer and a peerige, his mother was a daughter of the fourth Lord Galway Educated by private tutors at home and in Italy, he went up in 1827 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his M.A. in 1831, and where he was a leader in the Union and one of the famous 'Apostles' From 1837 to 1863 he re presented Pontefract, first as a Conservative, but latterly (after Peel's conversion to Free Trade) as an Independent Liberal, then he was called by Palmerston to the Upper House, of which for a score of years he was the 'only poet.' His friendships constituted a great part of his life, he knew everybody worth knowing at home and abroad, and cherished kindly and intimate relations with French statesmen, Italian revolutionaries, and American poets His catholicity and the trict which enabled him to bring together at his table men widely opposed in politics and religion earned for him Carlyle's (playful) recommendation for the post of 'perpetual president of the heaven and hell-amalgamation society' A Mecenas of pocts, Lord Houghton got Tennyson the hureateship, soothed the dying hours of poor David Gray, and was one of the first to recognise Mr Sumburne's gemus, he suffered at the hands of the Quarterly for his 'worship of such baby idols as Mr John Keats and Mr Alfred Tennyson' His own verse was always graceful, cultured, and thoughtful, though wanting in force and fervour, some of the shorter pieces were in their day exceedingly popular-'Strangers Yet,' for example, and 'The Beating of my Own Heart.' Besides this, Lord Houghton - the 'Mr Vavasour' of Disraeli's Tancred -- was a traveller, a philanthropist, an unrivalled after-dinner speaker, and Rogers's suc-He went cessor in the art of breakfast-giving up in a balloon, and down in a diving bell was the first publishing Englishman who gained access to the harems of the East, he championed oppressed nationalities, liberty of conscience, the Essays and Reviews, fugitive slaves, the reform of the franchise, and women's rights, and he carried a Bill for establishing reformatories. His works included Memorials of a Tour in Greece, chiefly Poetical (1834), Memorials of a Residence on the Continent (1838), Poetry for the People (1840), Poems, Legendary and Historical (1844), Palm Leaves (1844), Life and Remains of John Keats (1848), Monographs, Personal and Social (1873), and his Collected Poetical Works (1878) His Life has been admirably presented by Sir T Wemyss Reid (2 vols. 1890)

St Mark's at Venice

Walk in St Mark's the time the ample space
Lies in the freshness of the evening shade,
When, on each side, with gravely darkened face
The masses rise above the light arcade
Walk down the midst with slowly tuned pace,
But gay withal, for there is high parade
Of fair attire and fairer forms, which pass
Like varying groups on a magician's glass

Walk in St Mark's again some few hours after,
When a bright sleep is on each storied pile—
When fitful music and inconstant laughter
Give place to Nature's silent moonlight simile
Yow Taney wants no facry gale to waft her
To Magian haunt, or charm engirded isle,
All too content, in passive bliss, to see
This show divine of visible poetry

On such a night as this impassionedly
The old Venetian sung those verses rare
'That Venice must of needs eternal be,
For Heaven had looked through the pellucid air,
And east its reflex on the crystal sea,
And Venice was the image pictured there,'
I hear them now, and tremble, for I seein
As treading on an unsubstantial dream

That strange cathedral! exquisitely strange—
That front, on whose bright varied tints the eye
Rests as of gems—those arches whose high range
Gives its rich broidered border to the sky—
Those ever prancing steeds! My friend, whom change Of restless will has led to lands that he Deep in the Last, does not thy fancy set Above those domes an airy minaret?

The Men of Old

I know not that the mcu of old
Were better than men now,
Of heart more kind, of hand more bold,
Of more ingenious brow
I heed not those who pine for force
A ghost of time to raise,
As if they thus could check the course
Of these appointed days

Still is it true, and over true,
That I delight to close
This book of life self wise and new,
And let my thoughts repose
On all that humble happiness
The world has since forgone—
The daylight of contentedness
That on those faces shone!

With rights, though not too closely scanned,
Enjoyed, as far as known—
With will, by no reverse unmanned—
With pulse of even tone—
They from to day and from to-night
Expected nothing more Than yesterday and yesternight
Had proffered them before

To them was life a simple art
Of duties to be done,
A game where each man took his par,
A race where all must run,
A buttle whose great scheme and scope
They little cared to know,
Content, as men at arms, to cope
Lach with his fronting foe.

RICHARD MONCKTON MILNES
After the Portrait by George Richmond R.A.

Man now his virtue's diadem
Puts on, and proudly wears—
Great thoughts, great feelings, came to them,
Like instincts, unawares
Blending their souls' sublimest needs
With tasks of every day,
They went about their gravest deeds
As noble boys at play

And what if Nature's fearful wound
They did not probe and bare,
For that their spirits never swooned
To watch the misery there—
For that their love but flowed more fast,
Their charities more free,
Not conscious what mere drops they east
Into the evil sea.

A man's best things are nearest him,
Lie close about his feet,
It is the distant and the dim
That we are such to greet

For flowers that grow our hands beneath We struggle and aspire—
Our hearts must die, except they breathe
The air of fresh desire

But, brothers, who up keason's hill
Advance with hopeful cheer—
Oh! loiter not, those heights are chill,
As chill as they are clear,
And still restrain your haughty gaze,
The loftier that ye go,
Remembering distance leaves a haze
On all that hes below

From 'The Long-ago'

On that deep retiring shore
Frequent pearls of beauty he,
Where the passion waves of yore
Frerecly beat and mounted high Sorrows that are sorrows still Lose the latter rists of woe,
Nothing's altogether ill
In the griefs of I ong ago

Tombs where lonely love repines, Chastly tenements of tears, Wear the look of happy shrines. Through the golden mist of years. Death, to those who trust in good, Vindicates his hardest blow, Oh! we would not, if we could, Wake the sleep of Long ago I

Though the doom of swift decay
Shoel's the soul where life is strong.
Though for fruier hearts the day
Lingers sad and overlong—
Still the weight will find a leaven,
Still the spoiler's hand is slow,
While the future has its heaven,
And the past its Long ago

Shadows

They seem'd, to those who saw them meet,
The easual friends of every day,
Her smile was undisturb'd and sweet,
His courtesy was free and gay

But yet if one the other's name
In some unguarded moment heard,
The heart you thought so calm and tame
Would struggle lile a captured bird

And letters of mere formal phrase
Were blister'd with repeated tears—
And this was not the worl of days,
But had gone on for years and years!

Alas that love was not too strong
For maiden shame and manly pride!
Alas that they delay d so long
The goal of mutual bliss beside!

I et alla to chance could then reveal,
 In I neither would be first to own,
 I et fate and courage now conceal,
 When truth could bring remorse alone.

Thomas Gordon Hake (1809-95), the 'parable poet,' was born at Leeds, and educated at Christ's Hospital He travelled a good deal on the Continent, took his M D at Glasgow, and, practised at Bury St Edmunds, Richmond, and Among his friends were Borrow, elsen here. Trelawny, Rossetti, his cousin Gordon Pasha, and He published Madeline (1871), Watts-Dunton Parables and Tales (1873), The Scrpent Play (1883), New Day Sonnets (1890), &c Memoirs of Eighty Years (1893) The blind poet, Philip Bourke Marston, inspired one of his bestknown poems, 'The Blind Boy,' this is perhaps one of his most memorable sonnets

The Infant Medusa

I loved Medner when she was a child,
Her rich brown tresses herped in crispy eurl
Where now those locks with reptile prission whirl,
By hate into dishevelled serpents coiled
I loved Medusa when her eyes were mild,
Whose glances, narrowed now, perdition hirl,
As her self tangled hairs their mass infurl,
Bristling the way she turns with hissings wild.
Her mouth I kissed when curved with amorous spell,
Now shaped to the unuttered curse of hell,
Wide open for death's orbs to freeze upon,
Her eyes I loved ere glazed in jey stare,

Ere mortals, lured into their ruthless glare, She shrivelled in her gaze to pulseless stone

Elizabeth Pem ose ('Mrs Markham,' 1780-1837) was the daughter of the Rev Edmund Cartwright, inventor of the power loom, and as a child devoured folios of history with more appetite thun In 1814 she married the Rei John her meals Penrose, an industrious theological writer, and in 1823 published under the well-known pseudonym her History of England for the Use of Loung Persons, followed in 1828 by a similar History Other works were Amusements of of France Westernheath, A Visit to the Zoological Gardens, Historical Conversations, and Sermons for Children Her History of England, which, intention ally and expressly, omitted 'painful' scenes and party politics, won a great popularity and had numberless reprints (one, for example, in 1874), having been edited and continued by Mary Howitt.

Julia Pardoe (1806-62), daughter of an army officer, began to publish poems while yet a girl at home in Beverley Ill-health sent her abroad and provided materials for her Traits and Traditions of Portugal in 1833. A visit to Constantinople in 1836 led to her City of the Sultan, The Romance of the Harem, and The Beauties of the Bosphorus She visited Hungary, and wrote The City of the Magyar, and a novel, The Hungarian Castle (1842). A series of works deal with French history Louis XIV and the Court of Trance (1847), The Court and Reign of Trancis I (1849), The Life of Mary de Medicis (1852, nev ed 1891), and Episodes of Tranch History during the Consulate and the Tirst En pire (1859). Books of another type are The Confessions of a Pretty Woman, Flus in Amber, The Jealous Wife, Reginald Lyle, Lady Arabella, and The Thousand and One Days Her sprightly and pleasantly written novels were very popular, but hardly more so than her attractive presentations of the historical past. She was not trained in strict historical research, and her notions of evidence left much to be desired, but she was an acute observer, and her knowledge of the East was accurate and profound

The Baroness von Tantphœus (1807-93) was the daughter of James Montgomery of Seaview, County Donegal, and in 1838 Jemima Montgoniery married the Baron von Tautphous, Chamberlain at the Bayarian Court, and speni the rest of her life in Germany Her novels—The Initials (1850), Cyrilla (1853), Quits (1857), and At Odds (1863)—were written in English, but by their genial pictures of the most various ispects of South German life and character they reveal the Irishwoman's intimate sympathy with the nien and women, the nobles and persents, the rich and poor of her adopted fatherland. Her first venture was generally reckoned the most attractive and successful of her stories, the second dealt with a gloomy tragedy of crime and punishment

The Countess of Differin and The Hon His Norton sustained the honour of a gifted race. Richard Brinsley Sherid in, by his marriage with Miss Linley, had one son, Thomas (1775–1817), whose convival wit and fancy were scarcely less bright or less esteemed than those of his father, and who died Colonial Paymaster at the Cape of Good Hope. In 1805 Thomas was in Scotland as aide-de camp to Lord Moira, and he there married Caroline Henrietta, daughter of Colonel and Lady Elizabeth Callander of Craigforth, by whom he had seven children, and who wrote Carvell and two other novels.

Helen bellin (1807-67) was the first of the 'three Graces, of a hom the second became Mrs Norton and the third the Duchess of Somerset she married, through love at first sight and in the face of some parental opposition, Commander Black wood (1794-1841), a naval officer, who on the death of his father in 1839 succeeded as fourth Lord Dufferin After her husband's accidental death only two years later, she devoted herself mainly to the education of her son, afterwards, as fifth Earl and first Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, distinguished as author and diplomatist 1862, at the carnest request of the Earl of Gifford (son of the Marquis of Twecddale), a devoted friend, now on his deathbed, the countess went through the form of marriage with him a few weeks before his death. From her girlhood she had written songs and verses, Lispings from Low Latitudes, or Latracts from the Journal of the Hon Impulsia Gushington, was the outcome of a trip up the Nile with her son, to whom on his birthdays many of her poems were addressed The marquis collected her Songs, Poems, and Verses in 1894, prefixing a Life of his mother. Her best things are inimitably tender, sweet, pathetic, and humorous, the best known by far being

The Lament of the Irish Emigrant.

I'm sittin' on the stile, Mary,
Where we sat side by side
On a bright May mornin' long ago,
When first you were my bride,
The corn was springin' fresh and green,
And the lark sang loud and high—
And the red was on your lip, Mary,
And the love light in your eye

The place is little changed, Mary,
The day is bright as then,
The lark's loud song is in my ear,
And the corn is green again,
But I miss the soft clasp of your hand,
And your breath warm on my cheek,
And I still I eep list ning for the words
You never more will speak

'Its but a step down yonder lane,
And the little church stands near,
The church where we were wed, Mary,
I see the spire from here
But the graveyard lies between, Mary,
And my step might break your rest—
For I've laid you, darling ' down to sleep,
With your baby on your breast

I'm very lonely now, Mary,
For the poor make no new friends,
But, O, they love the better still,
The few our Father sends!
And you were all I had, Mary,
My blessin' and my pride
There's nothin' left to care for now,
Since my poor Mary died

Yours was the good, brave heart, Mary,
That still kept hoping on,
When the trust in God had left my soul,
And my arm's young strength was gone
There was comfort ever on your hip,
And the kind look on your brow—
I bless you, Mary, for that same,
Though you cannot hear me now

I think you for the fatient smile
When your heart was fit to break,
When the hinger pain was grawin' there,
And you hid it, for my sake!
I bless you for the pleasant word,
When your heart was sad and sore—
O, I'm thankful you are gone, Mary,
Where grief can't reach you more!

I'm biddin' you a long farewell,
My Mary—kind and true!
But I'll not forget you, darling!
In the land I'm goin' to,
They say there's bread and work for all,
And the sun shines always there—
But I'll not forget old Ireland,
Were it fifty times as fair!

And often in those grand old woods

I'll sit, and shut my eyes,

And my heart will travel back again

To the place where Mary hes,

And I'll think I see the little stile

Where we sat side by side,

And the springin corn, and the bright May morn,

When first you were my bride

Caroline Elizabeth Sarah (1808-77), the second of the 'three (races,' was married in her nineteenth year to a barrister, the Hon George Chapple Norton (1800-75), son of the first Lord Grantley The marriage proved most unhappy, and Mrs

CAROLINE NORTON
After the Portrait by 1 Carrick

Norton's friendship with Lord Melbourne led her husband to institute a groundless and unsuccessful action of divorce (1836) From her childhood she too had written verses. Her first publication was an ittempt at satire, The Dandies' Rout (1821), to which she added illustrative drawings. In her seventeenth year she wrote The Soito vs of Rosalic (1829), embodying a pathetic story of village life. A poem founded on the ancient legend of the Wandering Jew she called The Undying One (1831) A novel, The Wife and Woman's Re-vard (1835), succeeded, and in 1840 The Dicam, and The Child of the Islands (1845) was a poem written to draw the attention of the Prince of Wales to the condition of the people in a land and time wherein there is too little communication between classes,' and too little expression of sym pathy on the part of the rich towards the poorsubjects on which she had years before written letters to the Times At Christmas 1846 Mrs Norton issued two poetical fairy-tales, Annt Carry's Ballads for Children, charming alike for their graceful fancy and their sketches of birds, woods, and flowers In 1850 appeared Jales and Sketches in Prose and Verse, and next year a three volume novel, Stuart of Dunleath, a Story of Modern Times The incidents, too uniformly sad and gloomy, were doubtless partly tinged by the bitter experiences of the authoress, but the story has passages of humour and sarcasm. In 1844 appeared Lughsh Laws for Women in the Aine teenth Century, in 1862, The Lady of Garage, a poetic rendering of an old Breton story, in 1863, a novel, Lost and Saved A later novel was Old Sir Donglas, published in Macmillan's Magazine in 1867. She wrote on many social topics, and did much miscellaneous criticism. The improve ment in the English laws affecting married women, their rights over their earnings and their children, may be traced primarily to the eloquent pleadings, indignant denunciations, and untiring exertions of Mrs Norton, who was complimented on her earlier poems by Lockhart in the Quarterly Request is the Byron of modern poetesses 'She has very much of that intense personal passion by which Byron's poetry is distinguished from the larger grasp and deeper communion with man and nature of Words She has also Byron's beautiful intervals of tenderness, his strong practical thought, and his forceful expression? The influence of Byron is less noticeable in her later work, some of her blank verse reads liker Campbell or Crabbe. Her poetry is the work of a wom in of first-rate abilities, who was nevertheless but a minor poet her best verses will not compare with her sister's are striking passages, full of force and feeling, that are rather versified rhetoric than poetry, but some of her poems deserve to be remembered Norton (who is generally understood to have been one of several originals from whom Mr Mcredith drew his Diana of the Crossivass) was married to Sir William Stirling-Maxwell on 1st March 1877, and she died three months after

I do not love Thee

I do not love thee '-no! I do not love thee!

And yet when thou art absent I am sad,

And envy even the bright blue sky above thee,

Whose quiet stars may see thee and be glad

I do not love thee '—vet, I I now not why, Whate'er thou dost seems still well done, to me And often in my solitude I sigh That those I do love are not more like thee!

I do not love thee '-yet, when thou art gone,
I hate the sound (though those who speak be dear)
Which breaks the lingering echo of the tone
Thy voice of music leaves upon my ear

I do not love thee !—; et the speaking eves, With their deep, bright, and most expressive blue, Between me and the midnight heaven arise, Oftener than any eves I ever knew

I know I do not love thee 'yet, alas'
Others will secreely trust my candid heart,
And oft I catch them smiling as they pass,
Because they see me gazing where thou art.

To the Duchess of Sutherland.

Once more, my harp 1 once more, although I thought Never to wake thy silent strings again, A wandering dream thy gentle chords have wrought, And my sad heart, which long hath dwelt in pain, Soars, like a wild bird from a cypress bough,

Into the poet's heaven, and leaves dull grief below!

And unto thee-the beautiful and pure-Whose lot is cast amid that busy world Where only sluggish Duliness dwells secure,

And Fancy's generous wing is faintly furled, To thee-whose friendship kept its equal truth Through the most dreary hour of my embittered youth-

I dedicate the lay Ah! never bard, In days when poverty was twin with song,

Nor wandering harper, lonely and ill starred, Cheered by some castle's chief, and harboured long, Not Scott's Last Minstrel, in his trembling lays, Woke with a warmer heart the earnest meed of praise I

For easy are the alms the rich man spares To sons of Genius, by misfortune bent, But thou gav'st me, what woman soldom dares, Belief-in spite of many a cold dissent-When, slandered and maligned, I stood apart From those whose bounded power hath wrung, not crushed, my heart

Thou, then, when cowards hed away my name, And scoffed to see me feebly stem the tide, When some were kind on whom I had no elaim, And some forsook on whom my love relied, And some, who might have battled for my sake, Stood off in doubt to see what turn the world would take-

Thou gav st me that the poor do give the poor, Kind words and holy wishes, and true tears, The loved, the near of kin could do no more, Who changed not with the gloom of varying years, But clung the closer when I stood forlorn, And blunted Slander's dart with their indignant scorn

For they who credit crime, are they who feel Their own hearts weak to unresisted sin, Memory, not judgment, prompts the thoughts which steal O'er minds like these, an easy faith to win, And tales of broken truth are still believed Most readily by those who have themselves deceived

But like a white swan down a troubled stream, Whose ruffling pinion hath the power to fling Aside the turbid drops which darkly gleam,

And mar the freshness of her snowy wing-So thou, with queenly grace and gentle pride, Along the world's dark waves in purity dost glide

Thy pale and pearly cheek was never made To crimson with a faint false hearted shame, Thou didst not shrink—of bitter tongues afraid, Who hunt in packs the object of their blame, To thee the sad denial still held true, [drew For from thine own good thoughts thy heart its mercy

And though my faint and tributary rhymes Add nothing to the glory of thy day, Yet every poet hopes that after times Shall set some value on his votive lay And I would fain one gentle deed record, Among the many such with which thy life is stored

So when these lines, made in a mournful hour, Are idly opened to the stranger's eye, A dream of thee, aroused by Fancy's power, Shall be the first to wander floating by, And they who never saw thy lovely face Shall pause, to conjure up a vision of its grace!

Lady Eastlake (1809-93), drughter of Dr Edward Rigby of Norwich (a copious writer on agriculture as well as on medical subjects), spent some years in Germany, and as Elizabeth Rigby was by the end of the thirties writing articles on Goethe for the reviews and the famous Letters from the Shores of the Baltic From 1842 till her mar riage in 1849 to Sir Charles Eastlake, the eminent artist who was made Director of the National Gallery, her home was, with her mother, mainly in Edinburgh, where her accomplishments and her handsome and majestic presence made her a very conspicuous and popular personality. And from 1842 till a year or two before her death she was one of the most industrious and effective of the Quarterly reviewers, on subjects as various as German life, German painting, evangelical novels, the Amperes, music, dress, Madame de Stael, on Michelangelo, Durer, and many others of the world's great painters, on Samuel Rogers, Ruskin's errors in æsthetics, Rossetti's crimes against the laws of painting, and Morelli's art criticism wrote also for the Edinburgh and many magazines, completed some of Mrs Jameson's work, alone or with her husband translated and edited Kugler and Waagen's art handbooks, wrote tales, and produced lives of her husband, of Gibson the sculptor, and of her friend Mrs Grote A woman of strong mind, keen prejudices, and outspoken dislikes, she was for many years a very distinguished figure in the best London society Perhaps her most famous work-at least her most notorious-was the (anonymous) bitter critique of Jane Eyre in the Quarterly of December 1848 long regarded as one of Lockhart's most unkindly extravagances Miss Rigby not merely found Jane Eyre anti Christian but unpardonably sulgar. thought it better to believe it the work of a man than of a woman who 'for some sufficient reason had forfeited the respect of her own sex,' and was pretty sure that Currer, Acton, and Ellis Bell were three Lancashire weaver-brothers of Lady Eastlake's work was in a very different tone—notably Fellowship Letters addressed to my Sister-Mourners, which, written after her own husband's death, touched and comforted the hearts of Queen Victoria and many another widow her Journal and Correspondence (1895)

Lady Charlotte Guest (1812-95), born Lady Charlotte Elizabeth Bertie, daughter of the ninth Earl of Lindsey, give an extraordinary impulse to the study of Celtic literature and folklore in England by her translation of the Mabinogion, and carned an imperishable name for the skill, grace, and power of her English renderings learnt Welsh thoroughly as the wife of Sir J J Guest, and after his death (1852) she managed his ironworks near Merthyr Lydfil with energy and success. She married ig in in 1855, her second husband being Mr Schreiber, MP for Poole she is rarely referred to in literature sine as Lady Charlotte Guest, and apart from her worl in Welsh she was chiefly known as a zealous collector of china and earthenware, fins and playing cards On fans she wrote two volumes, on of all nations playing cards three But here she is commemorated for The Mahinogian from the Llyft Cocl. o Hergest and other Ancient Welsh Manuscripts, with ar English Translation and Notes (3 vols 1838-49) The second edition (1877) omitted the Welsh text and was abridged, and she prepared also a 'Boy's Mabinogion' (1881) Rhys and Evans have superseded her text of the leed Book of Hergest by a diplomatic masterpiece (2 vols 1887), M. Loth's French translation (1889) is more literal, but her version which Mr Nutt re edited with learned notes in 1902, can hardly be superseded or surpresed. She had some help in making out the meaning of difficult passages from the Rev John Jones (the bardie 'Fegid') the very delicate and difficult business of giving English readers the old Welsh romances she attained an extraordinary triumph, a triumph ill Mr Nutt, a critic hard to please, pays a her own warm tribute to 'the mingled strength and grace of her style, the unerring skill with which she selects the right word, the right turn of phrase, which suggests an atmosphere ancient, remote laden with magic, without any resort to pseudo arch usin, to Wardour Street English?

Sarah Ellis (1810<sup>2</sup>–72), a modern and minor Hannah More, was already as Miss Stiel ney known as an author when in 1835 she married the Rev William Ellis, a South Sea missionary then secretary to the London Missionary Society, who was known chiefly for his books about Madagase in The best known of Mrs Ellis's works (some thirty in all) were The Women of England (1838), The Daughters of England (1842), The Wives of England (1843), Hearts and Homes (1849), and The Mothers of Great Men (1859)

Harriet Hartineau (1802-76) was the sixth of the eight children of a Norwich cambet manufacturer, whose family, I rench by origin and Uniturian in faith, had had at Norwich ever since the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. She ascribed her taste for literary studies to her feeble health in childhood, and to the deafness with which she was afflicted ever after. Work as an authoress, begun to amuse herself, became for her a source of honourable independence when, in 1829, her father's family became involved in commercial disaster. Her literary career commenced in 1823, when she published Devotional Exercises for Young Persons, followed by tracts and short moral tales. The Rioters and The Two Out were among the first attempts to expound in a popular form the doctrines of political econom, In 1832-34 she produced more reliable Illustra tions of Political Feonom, Laxation, and Poer Lars A visit to the Unit d State led to Society m America (1837) and I hetrespect of Hestern It rail (1438) to the same period belong her Letter to the Deaf, two mill builds to Service, and other domestic minurals. In Deceleral (1839), a novel of Lin lish dome tie life, her democratic opinion, are stremiously insisted on Tre Heur and the May (16,0) was a commer on the his tory of Ion sunt 1 Ouverture. He Billow and the Roll (1849) was a wholl non polinical tale founded on the captivity of Lad, Gringe the inconvenien vife of an eighten ! century Scotch judge, who was secretly ilsfurted to St Kilda, and confined there for seven venrs

The interest of the trivel pictures in Lasterr Life, Present and Par' (1848 was disturbed by us unorthodox opinions on Scripture histori ar i character and on my merisin and claimwares. This, in her own opinion the best of her enting reveiled her as alread fine longer a Unitarian or a believer in resulting at all? A solume or Huseheld Little ter appeared in 1849, and in the same year her ofus organization taken up at Charles Knight's suggestion, the History of Ire land anring the Tearly Years Pears, Joshadh the Hotors is the worl of a continced, acute and sagacious philosophical Rackal with a strong sense of justice a keen sympa by with the propie and popular movements and a steady effort after impartiality, though her frank and outspoken judg ments on men and things betray the bias of but school, and are cometimies, as in the case of O Connell and Brougham, harsh and unfur. Though it makes no claim to original research, the work deserves to rank as popular in the best sense. In 1851 Miss Martineau published a collection of letters between herself and Mr H G Atkinson On the Lares of Man's Nature and Decelops at -an eminently agnostic work which met with all but universal condemnation, even from her brother James in the Prespective Review Charlone Bronte greved over 'the first exposition of avowed atheism and materialism she had ever read-the first unequivocal declaration of disbehef of God or a future life,' As Miss Martineau aftern ards said, the book 'brought upon its writers, as was inevitable, the imputation of atheism from the multitude who cannot distinguish between the popular and the philosophical sense of the wordbetween the disbelief in the popular theology which has caused a long series of religious men to be called atheists, and the disbelief in a First Cause -a disbelief which is expressly disclaimed in the book.' An important work in a new field was an abridged translation or condensation of Comte's Positive Philosophy (2 vols 1853), from which most Englishmen learnt all they knew of Comte and Comtism In 1854 Miss Martineau published a Complete Guide to the Lakis, nine years before she had fixed her residence in the beautiful Lake country, at Ambleside, where she managed her little form of two acres with the skill of a practical agriculturist, and was esteemed as an affectionate friend and good neighbour She was a regular contributor of political and social articles to the Daily News, 1852-66, writing more than a hundred articles a year, and in 1869 she reproduced in one volume all the short memoirs she had written for it. Till her health failed, she also contributed articles to the Edinburgh Revnew, Once a Wiek, and other periodicals Immediately after her death the Daily News printed a brief auto biographical notice sent to that journal by Miss Martineau when she believed she was near death in 1855 Here, as in the later and fuller auto biography, she is as frank in criticising herself as she was wont to be with others. She recognised that she had 'no approach to genius,' and that her claim to remembrance must rest on carnestness and intellectual clearness within a certain range. On herself as a writer of fiction she passed a judicial condemnation 'None of her novels or tales have, or ever had, in the eyes of good judges or in her own, any character of permanence. The artistic aim and qualifications were absent, she had no power of dramatic construction, nor the poetic inspiration on the one hand, nor critical cultivation on the other, without which no work of the imagination can be worthy to live Two or three of her Political Economy Tales are perhaps her best achievement in fiction' The ampler Autobiography edited by Mrs M W Chapman, published in 1877, contains very vivid pictures of her own life and of her contemporaries down to 1855, when the record was finished and entrusted to the editor the later twenty one years of Miss Martineau's life are dealt with in a somewhat meagre addition by the editor

Sydney Smith.

My first sight of Sydney Smith was when he called on me, under cover of a whimsical introduction, as he considered it. At a great music party, where the drawing room and staircases were one continuous crowd, the lady who had conveyed me fought her way to my seat—which was, in consideration of my deafness, next to Mahibran, and near the piano. My friend brought a message, which Sydney Smith had passed up the staircase—that he understood we desired one another's acquaintance, and that he was awaiting it at the bottom of the stairs. He pirt it to my judgment whether I, being thin, could not more easily get down to him than he, being stout, could get up to me, and he would wait five minutes for my answer. I really could not go, under the circumstances, and it was a serious thing to give up my seat and the music, so Mr Smith sent me a good night, and promise to call on me, claiming this negotia tion as a proper introduction. He came, and sat down, broad and comfortable, in the middle of my sofa, with his hands on his stick, as if to support himself in a vast development of voice, and then he begin, like the great bell of St Paul's, making me start at the first stroke. He looked with shy dislike at my trumpet, for which there was truly no occasion. I was more likely to fly to the furthest corner of the room. It was always his boast that I did not want my trumpet when he talked with me.

I do not believe that anybody ever took amiss his quizzical descriptions of his friends I am sure I never did, and when I now recall his fun of that sort, it seems to me too innocent to raise an uneasy feeling. There were none, I believe, whom he did not quiz, but I never heard of any hurt feelings. He did not like precipitate speech and among the fastest tall ers in Lingland were certain of his friends and acquaintance-Mr Hallam, Mr Lmpson, Dr Whewell, Mr Macaulay, and myself None of us escaped his wit His account of Mr Empson's method of outpouring stands, without the name, in Lady Holland's Life of her father His pruse of Macaulty is well known - 'Macaulay is improved! Macaulay improves! I have observed in him of late-flashes of silence!' His account of Whewell is something more than wit - Science is his forte omniseience is his foible' As for his friend Hallam, he knew he might make free with his characteristics, of oppigning and haste among others, without offence In telling us what a blunder he himself made in going late to a dinner party, and describing how far the dinner had proceeded, and how everybody was engaged, he said, 'And there was Hallam, with his mouth full of cabbage and contra diction 17 Nothing could be droller than the description of all his friends in influenza, in the winter of 1832-3, and of these, Hallam was the drollest of all that I re 'And poor Hallam was tossing and tumbling in his bed when the watchman came by and called, "Twelve o'clock, and a starlight night" Here was an opportunity for controversy when it seemed most out of the question! Up jumped Hallam, with "I ques tion that-I question that! Starlight! I see a star, I admit, but I doubt whether that constitutes starlight" Hours more of tossing and tumbling, and then comes the watchman again "Past two o'clock, and a cloudy morning" "I question that—I question that," says Hallam And he rushes to the window, and throws up the sash-influenza notwithstanding "Watchman! do you mean to call this a cloudy morning? I see a star And I question its being past two o'clock -I question it -I question it!" And so on The story of Jeffrey and the North Pole, as told by Sydney Smith, appears to me strangely spoiled in the Life The incident happened while the Jeffreys were my near neighbours in London, and Mrs Sydney Smith related the incident to me at the time Captain (afterwards Sir John) Ross had just returned from an unsuccessful polar expedition, and was bent upon going again. He used all his interest to get the Government stirred up to fit out another expedition. and among others, the Lord Advocate was to be applied to, to bespeak his good offices The mutual friend who undertook to do Captain Ross's errand to Jeffrey arrived at an unfortunate moment. Jeffrey was in delicate health at that time, and made a great point of his daily ride, and when the applicant reached his door, he was putting his foot in the stirrup, and did not want to be detained. So he pished and pshawed, and cared nothing for the North Pole, and at length 'damned' it. The applicant spole angrily about it to Sydney Smith, wishing that Jeffrey would take care what he was about, and use more civil language. 'What do you think he said to me?' cried the complainant 'Why, he damned the North Pole!' 'Well, never mind! never mind!' said Sydney Smith, soothingly 'Never mind his damning the North Pole. I have heard him speak disrespectfully of the Equator' (From the Autobiography)

The Year of the Comet [1811].

The preceding winter had been intensely cold snow had choked up the mail roads, and buried thousands of sheep among the hills, and lain heavy on the hearts of thousands of weary families who were already chilled with hunger, and could no more huy fuel than they could clothe themselves in furs The Thames was very nearly frozen over that winter The spring was backward, and then the heats came rushing on, with more disastrous effect than the storms of winter. The meadows were parched up before any grass had been obtained, the springs ran dry Church towers were struck by lightning, and the bells melted. Cattle and men were found scorched in the fields, and if a fire occurred, there was no putting it out. In Prussia, miles of woodland were left in a few hours strewed with ashes, and in the Tyrol, the conflagration of the forests proceeded from league to league, till sixty four villages and ten thousand head of cattle were destroyed Twenty four thousand peasants were turned out to be scorched by the sun at noon, and drenched by the dews at night, and a multitude of them died in a few weeks by an epidemic thus occasioned Everywhere the har vest was deficient, and in England the average price of wheat became 106s 8d. The superstitious were more and more apprehensive, as time brought added distresses, that the nation was under the wrath of God. and in the early days of September, many believed there was no further doubt that the end of the world was at A sign appeared in the sky, which to them seemed to show that Napoleon was the last great enemy of the race, and that the day of judgment was come. A comet, like none that they had seen or heard of, wheeled rapidly up the sky. The learned and the wise enjoyed the spectacle, as the vast new light arose in the still autumn evenings, half as large as the moon, with its hroad train of light streaming down to the horizou, but the rude and the timid could not lift up their heads to gaze at it Here and there a man stood up in church or chapel, warning sinners to repent, and the righteous to stand fast for death, as the day of the Lord was at hand. Others were preaching at the corners of the streets, and in lanes, and on the hillside and among the hearers were some who were almost glad to be told the tidings, for they were worn out with misery, and the grave is a place where 'the weary are at rest.' But before the clouding over of the sky for winter the sign had passed away, and the day of judgment had not come. Instead of this, the wicked were more rampant than ever As the days shortened, midnight murder terrified those who had not been alarmed before On the night of the 5th of December the entire household of a Mr Marr was mnrdered within a quarter of an hour-himself, his wife, their infant in the cradle, and the shop boy under the counter, and on the 19th the entire household of a Mr Williamson was butchered in the same manner Such scenes of violence went forward in different parts of the country that many began to be of Romilly's opinion, that the English character had undergone some unaccountable and portentous change.

Portentous these horrors were, but not unaccountable. Many soldiers had become weary of the war, which to them had been thus far all hardship and no glory They deserted They could not show themselves at home, the penalty for desertion being death. They gathered together in gangs, took possession of some forsaken house among the hills, or of caves on the sea shore, and went forth at night in masks and grotesque clothing, and helped themselves with money and clothes, wherever they could find them, sacrificing life where it was necessary to their objects. In these times of dear food the salaries of clerks and other persons valuable from their filling situa tions of trust were doubled, to enable them to hold their Artisans too had high wages from those who could afford to employ them We find that those who were employed at Greenwich Hospital were at this time receiving from 30s to 35s. per week-a mere subsistence at such a season of high prices, but still a subsistence. But those whose services were not immediately wanted sank in proportion. In the factories there was no increase of wages, and where, through dread of the despair of the people, there was a nominal rise of wages, it was usually compensated for by a reduction of the hours of labour The fate of the handloom weavers appears to have been the hardest. In 1806 they had felt themselves badly off with 17s. 6d a week, and now they had only 7s. 6d This was at Glasgow, but it was a season of extreme pressure with spinners and weavers throughout the manufacturing districts of England It was no consolation to them to be told that their de pression could not be helped, because their labour had been displaced by machinery At this date one person could, with the help of machinery, spin as much cotton as 200 persons could have spun in the same time when the sufferers were setting out in life, and in weaving, a proportionate supersession of labour had taken place. Wise men knew that this machinery would, in a few years, employ many times more than the number of persons at first turned adrift, but this truth did not feed those who were hungering now, and it is no wonder that their misery avenged itself on the machinery which was doing their work and, as they declared, stealing their A gleam of moral light at such a time is too precious to pass away unnoticed, and it must therefore be mentioned that, in this dreary year, when the whole west of Scotland was in a wretched condition, the poor weavers of Hamilton refused to receive alms, and desired to work for their bread A subscription had been raised for the unemployed, but they would not touch it till they had earned it A footpath from Hamilton to Bothwell Bridge was therefore made, and the honour able weavers kept their honour. They little knew how they had thus beautified that footpath to many that should come after them (From the History of England.)

James Wartineau ranks pre eminently amongst philosophical thinkers of the nineteenth century as the apostle of Christian Theism This school of ethical and religious thought approvimates to the Theism of Theodore Parker, Francis William Newman, and Frances Power Cobbe, but differs from it somewhat in its estimate of the character and mission of Jesus of Nazareth Martineau was not the founder of any philosophical system, although Christian Theism doubtless owes more to him than to any one else From first to last he was a diligent student and secker larly open for the reception of new ideas, he sought for them and received them from many antago nistic sources, both ancient and modern acute reasoner and critic, he was not readily misled into mistaking superficial suggestions for substantial truth, and the sifting process which he applied to the theories and conclusions of others give to the world some admirable ev positions of philosophical doctrines fir removed from his own, and also served to build up, step by step, that conception of a spiritual philosophy on the lines of Theism-organised and consistent, but not amounting to a system-which is associated with his name The life of Dr Martineau was full of activity without being remarkably He was born at Norwich on the 21st His father was Thomas Martineau, of April 1805 His mother a manufacturer, fairly prosperous was Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Rankin of Newcastle-upon Tyne James was the fourth son and seventh child, and his sister Harriet-destined like himself to distinction—was the third daughter and sixth child. At home he came under strong intellectual and religious influences, and he received an excellent education The original intention was that he should become an engineer, a profession for which his considerable mechanical and mathematical talents would have gone far to qualify him. Soon, however, he realised that his true vocation was the Unitarian ministry. After serving for a time in the school of Dr Lant Carpenter at Bristol, he became assistant minister at the Eustace Street Presbyterian Meeting House, Dublin—one of the many places of worship which, with Presbyterian foundations, had an Arian or Unitarian faith. Four years later he removed to Liverpool, where he remained, as minister of the principal Unitarian congregation of the town, for twenty-five years. In 1840

he added to his ministerial duties a lectureship in Moral and Mental Philosophy at Manchester New College, and in 1857, when he severed his connection with Liverpool, it was to take up the more important work of a professor in the same institution—then removed to London From that time forward, even to a greater extent than before, he devoted himself to religious and philosophical study and teaching But not long after his settle ment in London he added the ministerial charge of Little Portland Street Chapel to his already heavy duties He was a man of untiring energy, taking upon himself and fulfilling efficiently, even to the last years of his long life, tasks and responsibilities seemingly far beyond any one man's strength In 1881 he was a candidate for the professorship of the Philosophy of Mind and Logic at University College, London, a position his fitness for which was generally admitted His opponent was Mr Croom Robertson, a scholar only less able than himself A curious incident occurred in connection with this contest.

The Archhishop of York-Dr Thompson-with held his support from Dr Martineau, notwith standing that he knew his fitness for the position, hecause, as he afterwards ncknowledged, he could not see his way to assist to the vacant office one who did not subscribe to the doctrine of By reason of this scruple, all un the Trinity consciously he aided indirectly in the election of Dr Martueau's opponent, who was a Positivist 1 In 1869 Dr Martineau was appointed to the principalship of Manchester New College, a position lie held until 1885, when, practically, he withdrew from public life. His intellectual activity, however, continued unabated ifter this date that his principal bools, which emhodied the results of a lifetime of thought, were completed and published. He died on the 11th of January 1900

Not until late in life was any public recognition offered by the great centres of learning to this learned man. Harvard University came first with an LLD degree in 1872 Other universities fol lowed-Leyden in 1875, Edinburgh in 1884, Oxford in 1888, and Dublin in 1892 Dr Martincau's chief writings were Lindeavours after the Christian Life (1843-47), Hours of Thought on Sacred Things (1876-79), A Study of Spinoza (1882), Typis of Ethi al Theory (1885), A Study of Religion (1888), The Seat of Authority in Religion (1890) Some of the numerous essays which he had contributed to the Prospective, National, Theological, and Westminster Reviews formed the basis of chapters in his subsequent works, and others were collected in volumes. He edited several collections of livings and prayers, all of which contained original contributions from his pen From 1845 to 1855 he was one of the four editors of the Prospective Review His literary style was dignified, yet markedly simple in structure, and often highly poetical moderate gift of humour, and sarcasm was a weapon which he used sparingly but with effect the faculty of lucid exposition in a high degree His Types of Ethical Theory is probably the clearest statement extant of the philosophical doctrines discussed therein, and his mental vision was comprehensive enough to enable him to do entire justice to ideas far removed from those he held to be true By temperament and conviction alike he was an upholder of liberty Stienuous to maint in his own convictions and to give to them all the force of his strong advocacy, he was just as strenuous in maintaining the right of others to hold and to express what they believed to be true, and to help, if occasion arose, to give them a just hearing opinion would not have seemed to him ripe for acceptance unless it could hold its own against differing opinions and against criticism. However strong his desire might be to be finally assured that certain ideas were true, he was a lover of truth for its own sake, too sincere consciously to permit any bias to direct his judgment. If in the course of his fearless search for truth he had discovered that the evidences were against his most cherished hopes, and seemed conclusive in support of doctrines repugnant to his feelings, he would-sorrow fully, no doubt, but in all sincerity—have accepted the conclusion Any unconscious bias of tempera ment is another matter. In his case it may have Cert in it is that whereas at one been strong time he accepted the necessarian and utilitarian principles of Hartley, Priestley, and Jimes Mill, while finally his ideas approximated to those of Kant—although on some points, is, for example, the objective reality of space, there was divergence -his fundamental convictions from first to last re mained the same. As the Rev J H Thom happily described it, his 'spiritual identity' continued. With certain modifications of phrase and emphasis, what he preached concerning divine guidance and moral responsibility during his early pulpit nunistrations was the same as the teachings contained in his It was as though this futh was part last books and parcel of his own essential nature, and all his seeking served simply to give it a fuller logical justification and a more valid expression. Yet he never ceased to be a seel er. When at ninety years of age he said, 'I have not outlived the habit of learning evermore from my fellows,' he described truly the lifelong attitude of his mind

Temptations of Power

There is a sphere in the life of every one, except the child, in which he is appointed to rule, and to exercic some functions by the methods of his own will. From the monitor in a selicol to the minis er of an empire, there are gradations of authority that leave no one with out a place. Would you know the real worth of any soul, be it another's or your own, that is the sphere on which you must fix your eye. It is little that n man goes right under orders and when he is obliged to serve you may always male a good soldier by sufficient drill, and annd the pre-sure of custom and beneath the light of the public gare, even a passive and pliant conscience may be But hon is it shaped into good lool's and wear a gloss with you in your place of power-among the servants whom you govern the children whom you train, the companions who place you at their head? Do you tale liberties there, as if there were nothing to restruin, and flug about your self will, as if it were free of all the field? Do you profine the law of duty by making it a homage to yourself, instead of letting its authority pass through you, as yourself chief expire of the will of God? Do you grant exemptions to yourself, exemptions of sloth, exemptions of temper, exemptions of truth, as if it were given you to loose as well as bind? There is no surer mark of a low and unregenerate nature than this tendency of power to loudness and vanton To souls ness instead of quietude and reverence. baptized in Christian nobleness the largest sphere of command is but a wider empire of obedience, calling them, not into escape from holy rule, but to its full im Only now that no outer rule is given them personation by another, and they have nothing to copy with painful imitation, have they to bring forth the interpretation from within, and set themselves at one with the will of God by a heart of self renunciation—a love that seizes all divine ends, and in expressing itself realizes them. In short, power is never felt as to ver, except by those who abuse it. Like other things that awaken desire at a distance, no sooner is it entered than it is found to be not more triumphant happiness, but deeper life, utterly disappointing to him who wants more for himself, ennobling to him who can dispense and administer for God (From Hours of Thought on Sacred Things)

The Beneficence of Change

If, then, the very law of life is a law of change, if every blossom of beauty has its root in fallen leaves, if love, and thought, and hope would faint beneath too constant light, and need for their freshening the dark ness and the dews, if it is in losing the transient that we gain the Eternal, then let us shrink no more from sorrow and sigh no more for rest, but have a genial welcome for vicissitude, and make quiet friends with loss Through storm and calm, fresh be our courage and quick our eye for the various service that may await us. Nay, when God himself turns us not bither and thither, when he sends us no changes for us to receive and consecrate, be it ours to create them for ourselves, by flinging ourselves into generous enter prises and worthy sacrifice, by the stirrings of sleepless aspiration, and all the spontaneous view-itudes of holy and progressive souls, keeping always the moral spaces round us pure and fresh by the constant thought of truth and the frequent deed of love And then, when, for us too, death closes the great series of mortal changes, the past will be behind us green and sweet as I den, and the future before us in the light of eternal peace Trunquil and fearless we shall resign our claes to God, to conduct us through that ancient and invisible way, which has been sanctified by the feet of all the faithful, and illumined by the passage of the Man of griefs

(From Hours of Tlought on Sacred Things)

God in Humanity

Divine guidance has never and nowhere failed to men, nor has it ever, in the most essential things, largely differed amongst them but it has not always been recognised as divine, much less as the living contact of Spirit with spirit—the communion of affection between God and man While conscience remained an impersonal lav, stern and silent, with only a jealous Nemesis behind, man had to stand up alone, and work out for lumself his independent magnanimity, and he could only be the When conscience was found to be insepar pagan hero ably blended with the Holy Spirit, and to speak in tones immediately divine, it became the very shrine of worship its strife, its repentance, its aspirations, passed into the incidents of a living drama with its crises of alienation and reconcilement, and the cold obedience to a mysteri ous necessity was exchanged for the allegiance of personal affection . And this is the true emergence from the dark ness of ethical law to the tender light of the life divine The veil falls from the shadowed face of moral authority, and the directing love of the all holy God shines forth

(From The Scal of Authority in Religion )

Two excellent works have been written about Dr Martineau-namely, James Martineau, a Biography and Study by A W Jackson A.M (1900), and The Life and Letters of James Mar mean, by James Drummond, LLD, Litt.D, and C B. Upton, P A, B.Sc. (2 vols. 1902) In the latter the full and accurate history of the career of Dr Martineau is not more important than Mr Upton's admirable critical estimate of his mental progress and ultimate philosophical standpoint.

WALTER LEWIN

Richard Chenevix Trench (1807-86). Archbishop of Dublin, was born at Dublin, and passed from Harrow in 1825 to Trinity College. Cambridge, where he graduated in 1820 a voyage to Gibraltar (its object to fight in the cause of Spanish liberty), he took orders and became curate at Hadleigh, incumbent of Curdridge, and in 1841 curate at Alverstoke to Samuel Wilberforce, afterwards Bishop of Oxford and of Winchester During 1835-55 he published seven volumes of poetry—The Story of Justin Martyr, Sabbation, Genoveva, &c In 1845 he became rector of Itchenstoke, in 1847 theological professor in King's College, London, in 1856 Dean of Westminster, and in 1864 Archbishop of Dublin, an office which he resigned in 1884. He died in London, and was buried in Westminster Abbey In philology Trench contrived to fascinate his readers with the 'fossil poetry and fossil history imbedded in language, his English Past and Present (1855) and Select Glossary of English Words (1850) are among the most suggestive and entertaining works on the subject, though critical studies in English have been greatly developed since his time, and some of his etymological conclusions are no longer tenable. His ecclesiastical scholarship is shown in his Lectures on Mediaval Church History (1877) and his Sacied Latin Poetry (1855), which, in spite of some serious imperfections, is still the best English anthology of the hymns of the Medreval Church the Parables (1841), Notes on the Miracles (1846), and Studies on the Gospels (1867) are among his best-known theological works. His verses show culture and fine feeling, but do not secure for him distinction as a poet

On Proverbs

The fact that they please the people, and have pleased them for ages, that they possess so vigorous a principle of life as to have maintained their ground, ever new and ever young, through all the centuries of a nation's existence—nay, that many of them have pleased not one nation only, but many, so that they have made them selves a home in the most different lands, and further, that they have, not a few of them, come down to us from remotest antiquity, borne safely upon the waters of that great stream of time, which has swallowed so much beneath its waves—all this, I think, may well make us pruse should we be tempted to turn away from them with anything of indifference or disdain

And then, further, there is this to be considered, that some of the greatest poets, the profoundest philosophers, the most learned scholars, the most genlal writers in every kind, have delighted in them, have made large and frequent use of them, have bestowed infinite labour on the grithering and elucidating of them. In a fastidious age, indeed, and one of false refinement, they may go nearly or quite out of use among the so called upper classes. No gentleman, says Lord Chesterfield, or 'No man of fashion,' as I think is his exact word, 'ever uses a proverb' And with how fine a touch of nature Shakespeare makes Coriolanus, the man who with all his greatness is entirely devoid of all sympathy for the

Shakespeare loves them so well that, besides often eiting them, and innumerable covert allusions, rapid side glances at them, which we are in danger of missing unless at home in the proverbaof England, several of his plays, as Measure for Measure, All's Well that Ends Well, have popular proverbs for And Cervantes, a name only inferior to their titles. He was also chaplain to the Prince of Wales (whom he accompanied on his tour in the East, 1862) and chaplain in ordinary to Queen Victoria He was the most prominent figure in the Broad Church movement, and scandalised High Church men by championing Colenso, preaching in Scot tish Presbyterian pulpits, and administering the Euch crist to Unitarian and Presbyterian revisers of the Bible. Probably nothing gave more offence than his vigorous denunciations of the compulsory use in religious worship of the (so called) Athana A popular preacher, he was also a he celebrated the English favourite at Court marriage of the Duke and Duchess of Edin burgh, and it was in his house that Carlyle met Dean Stanley's principal works Queen Victoria are—The Life of Dr Arnold (1844), one of the best of English biographies, Sermons and Essays on the Apostolical Age (1846), Memoir of Bishop Stauley, his father (1850), The Epistles to the Corinthians (1854), his one purely theological work, Sinai and Palestine in connection with their History (1855), containing some of his most attractive writing, Historical Memorials of Canterbury (1855), Lectures on the Eastern Church (1861), History of the Jewish Church (1863-76), the delightful Historical Memoirals of Westminster Abbey (1866), and Lectures on the Church of Scotland (1872) His main aim as a Christian divine and as a Churchman was to pro mote mutual understanding and sympathy between the most opposed schools of thought, he always maintained that the essence of Christianity was practically independent of dogma, rites, or ceremonies. He not merely contended for toleration, denouncing with equal warmth the prosecution of ritualists and of rationalists, but insisted earnestly on such wide 'comprehension' in the National Church as to make enemies within and without, and even disciples and friends, doubt whether such comprehension could be attained without the effacement of essential belief. The charm of his character and the beauty of his charity did more to conciliate esteem than his logic to enforce conviction his personal influence was weighter than his books, of which, perhaps, the Life of Arnold was his most permanent addition to English literature. In historical writing his concern was more with the personal, the pictorial, and the dramatic than with wide generalisations or listoric precision, in commentary, with the vital spirit than with critical accuracy, in theology, with love than with truth He married in 1863 Lady Augusta Bruce of the Elgin family, and is buried along with her in Henry VII's Chapel in Westminster Abbey

At Heliopolis.

Rising wild amidst garden shrubs [is] the solitary obelisk which stood in front of the temple, then in company with another, whose base alone now remains. This is the first obelisk I have seen standing in its proper place, and there it has stood for nearly four thousand years. It is the oldest known in Egypt, and therefore in the world—the father of all that have arisen since. It was raised about a century before the coming of Joseph, it has looked down on his marriage with Asenath, it has seen the growth of Moses, it is mentioned by Herodotus, Plato sat under its shadow of all the obelisks which sprang up around it, it alone has kept its first position. One by one, it has seen its sons and brothers depart to great destinies elsewhere. From these gardens came the obelisks of the Lateran, of the Vatican, and of the Porta del Popolo, and this vener able pillar (for so it looks from a distance) is now almost the only landmark of the great seat of the wisdom of Egypt. (From Sinai and Palestine, I xxxii)

The Children of the Desert.

The relation of the Desert to its modern inhabitants is still illustrative of its ancient history. The general name by which the Hebrews called 'the wilderness,' including always that of Sinai, was 'the pasture.' Bare as the surface of the Desert is, yet the thin clothing of vegetation, which is seldom entirely withdrawn, especially the aromatic shrubs on the high hillsides, furnishes sufficient sustenance for the herds of the six thousand Bedouins who constitute the present population of the pennisula

'Along the mountain ledges green,
The scattered sheep at will may glean
The Desert's spicy stores'

So were they seen following the daughters or the shep So may they be seen climbing the herd slaves of Jethro rocks, or gathered round the pools and springs of the valleys, under the charge of the black veiled Bedoum And in the Tivâha, Towâra, women of the present day or Alouin tribes, with their chicfs and followers, their dress, and manners, and habitations, we probably see the likeness of the Midjanites, the Amalekites, and the Israelites themselves in this their earliest stage of exist The long straight lines of black tents which cluster round the Desert springs present to us, on a small scale, the image of the vast encampment gathered round the one Shered Tent which, with its coverings of dyed skins, stood conspicuous in the midst, and which recalled the period of their nomadie life long after their settlement in Palestine The deserted villages, marked by rude enclosures of stone, are doubtless such as those to which the Hebrew wanderers gave the name of 'Hazeroth,' and which afterwards furnished the type of the primitive saneturry at Shiloh The rude burns grounds, with the many nameless headstones far away from human habitation, are such as the host of Israel must have left behind them at the different stages of their progress-at Massah, at Sinai at Kibroth hattaavah, 'the graves of desire' The salutations of the chiefs, in their bright scarlet robes, the one 'going out to meet the other,' the 'obeisance,' the 'kiss' on each side the head, the silent entrance into the tent for consultations, are all graphically described in the encounter between Moses and Jethro The constitution of the tribes, with the sub ordinate degrees of sheyks, recommended by Jethro to Moses, is the very same which still exists amongst those who are possibly his lineal descendants—the gentle race of the Towara (From Sinai and Palestine, L, pp 22, 23.)

The Conversion of St Augustine

Augustine's youth had been one of reckless self indul gence. He had plunged into the worst sins of the heathen world in which he lived, he had adopted wild opinions to justify those sins and thus, though his parents were Christians, he himself remained a heathen in his manner of life, though not without some struggles of his better self and of God's grace against these evil habits. Often he struggled and often he fell, but he had two advantages which again and again have saved souls from ruin-advantages which no one who enjoys them (and how many of us do enjoy them!) can prize too highly-he had a good mother and he had good friends. He had a good mother, who wept for him, and prayed for him, and warned him, and gave him that advice which only a mother can give, forgotten for the moment, but remembered afterwards good friends, who watched every opportunity to en courage better thoughts, and to hring him to his better self. In this state of struggle and failure he came to the city of Milan, where the Christian community was ruled by a man of fame almost equal to that which he himself afterwards won, the celebrated Ambrose now the crisis of his life was come, and it shall be de scribed in his own words. He was sitting with his friend, his whole soul was shallon with the violence of his inward conflict—the conflict of breaking away from his evil habits, from his evil associates to a life which seemed to hun poor, and profitless, and burdensome Silently the two friends sat together, and at last, says Augustine, 'when deep reflection had brought together and heaped up all my misery in the sight of my heart, there arose a mighty storm of grief, bringing a mights shower of tears' He left his friend, that he might weep in solitude, he threw himself down under a fig tree in the garden (the spot is still pointed out in Milan), and he cried in the bitterness of his spirit, 'How long? how long?—to morrow? to morrow? Why not now? -why is there not this hour an end to my uneleanness?" 'So was I speaking and weeping in the contrition of my heart, he says 'when, lo! I heard from a neigh bouring house a voice as of a child, chanting and oft repeating, "Take up and read, take up and read' Instantly my countenance altered, I began to think whether children were wont in play to sing such words, nor could I remember ever to have heard the like checking my tears I rose, taking it to be a command from God to open the book and read the first chapter I should find' There by the volume of St Paul's Epistles, which he had just begun to study 'I seized it,' he says, 'I opened it, and in silence I read that passage on which my eves first fell "Not in rioting and druntenness, not in chambering and vantonness, not in strife and en ying But put we on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof" No further could I read, nor needed I, for instantly, at the end of this sentence, by a serene light infused into my soul, all the darkness of doubt vanished

We need not follow the story further. We know how he broke off all his evil courses, how his mother's heart was rejoiced, how he was baptised by the great Ambrose, how the old trudition describes their singing together, as he came up from the baptismal waters, the alternate verses of the hymn called from its opening words Te Deum Laudamur. We know how the profligate African youth was thus transformed into the most illustrious saint of the Western Church, how he hived long as the light of his own generation, and how his works have been cherished and read by good men, perhaps more extensively than those of any Christian teacher since the Apostles. It is a story instructive in many ways. It is an example, like the conversion of

St Paul, of the fact that from time to time God calls His servants not by gradual, but by sudden changes

His liberal sympathies led him to protest against the more rigid Sabba tarranism as Jewish rather than Christian, and his views on the historic significance of the 'decalogue quá decalogue' rused in 1866 suspicion of his ortho-But in 1867 the Assembly honoured him with a commission to visit the mission field in India, and in 1869 rused him to the Moderator's chair

For many years lie edited the Clistian In structor, but it was as first editor of Good Words (1860) that he became known to the reading public not merely as a tactful and enterprising editor, but as a constant contributor of stories and iniscellaneous articles, some of which were also published as books. His genial manliness and somewhat of his gifts of humour and pathos are reflected in his stories, which are, however, rather lacking in power and literary finish. Hee Danie and The Starling are short tales of Scottish domestic life,

The Old Lieutenant and his Son (1862) is on a larger canvas, but hardly so successful. He wrote also a biography of a cousin, The Earnest Student (1854), Reminiscences of a Highland Parish (his grandfather's, 1867), books or addresses on parochial needs and social duties, and records of two Oriental tours. Of his verses, a curling song became popular, and a religious poem, 'Courage, brother! do not stumble,' was at once admitted into British hymn-books, and is now regularly sung as a hymn. There is a Life of him (1876) by his brother, Dr Donald Macleod, who succeeded him as editor of Good Words.

James M'Cosli (1811-94), an exponent of the Scottish philosophy, was an Avrshire farmer's son who, becoming a minister of the Church of Scotland, joined the Tree Church (in which he held several cures), in 1851 was appointed Professor of Logic at Belfast, and from 1868 to 1888 was president of Princeton College in the United States His Method of the Divine Government (1850, 9th ed 1867) was followed by The Intuitions of the Mind (1860), and in these and in an examination of Mill (1866) he defended what he considered the Natural Realism of Reid against both the empirical school and the relativist views of Kant, Hamilton, and Mansel He published also a comprehensive work on The Scottish Philosaphy (1875), and books on psychology, evolution, fundamental truths, and morals

James Spedding (1808-81) was born at Mirehouse near Bassenthwaite, 26th June 1808, the younger son of a Cumberland squire From Bury St Edmunds he passed in 1827 to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became a scholar, and of which at his death he had long been an honorary From 1835 to 1841 he held a post at Fellow the Colonial Office, in 1842 he attended Lord Ashburton to America as private sercretary, and in 1847 he might, had he chosen, have become Under-Secretary of State, with £2000 a year But he had already devoted himself to the task of his life-- to re edit Bacon's works, which did not want any such re-edition, and to vindi cate Bacon's character, which could not be vindi cited' So wrote Edward FitzGerald, the oldest of Speddings many brilliant friends-Tennyson and Carlyle were also of the number—and he added 'He was the wisest man I have known, not the less so for plenty of the boy in him, a great sense of humour, a Socrates in life and death, which he faced with all serenity so long as consciousness lasted' It was in St George's Hospital that Spedding died, on 9th March 1881, having eight days before been run over by a cab Hardly any writer of equal parts and eminence is so completely identified with the one work to which he chose to devote his best energies for thirty years—the study of Lord Bacon, the editing of his works, and the writing of his life. In Everings with a Kev ever (written in 1845, but privately printed) he had little difficulty in showing, not without caustic comments, that Michally was not justified in the very low view he took of Bacon's character It was Spedding who did by far the principal part of the magistral edition of Bacon's Horks (7 vols 1857-59) undertaken in conjunction with Ellis and Heath, the accompanying Life and Letters (also in 7 vols 1861-74), pronounced by Carlyle (who ought to be a judge on that point at least) 'the hugest and futhfullest bit of literary navay work I have met with in this generation,' was all Sped ding's own. The general conclusion of more recent critics is that Spedding is decidedly too favourable to Bacon, and is on some points even an apologist -the shorter works by Dean Church (1884) and Dr Abbott (1885) are useful commentaries on Spedding's arguments and conclusions, which must, however, always receive respectful consideration, and, as against Macaulay, are in large measure universally accepted. Sir Leslie Stephen has said that 'Spedding's qualities are in curious contrast with Macaulty's brilliant audacity, and yet the trenchant exposure of Macaulay's misrepresentations is accompanied by a quiet humour and a shrewd critical faculty which, to a careful reader, make the book more interesting than its rival? Spedding produced in 1878, in two volumes, an abridged and popularised Life and Times of Francis Bacon He was one of the first scholars seriously to examine-and denounce-the attribution to Bacon of Shakespeare's plays No man, he summed up, who knew Bacon's work and Shakespeare's well could ever mistake five lines of the one for five lines of the other Other works are a pamphlet on Publishers and Authors (1867), Reviews and Discussions not relating to Bacon (1879, reprints from serials), and a share in the Studies in English History, mostly written by Mr James Gairdner (1881) There is a Life by Venables prefixed to the 1882 edition of Evenings The following short extract with a Reviewer shows Spedding's method of dealing with the crucial question of

Bacon and Bribery

I know nothing more inexplicable than Bacon's unconsciousness of the state of his own case, unless it be the case itself. That he, of all men, whose fault had always been too much carelessness about money-who, though nlways too ready to borrow, to give, to lend, and to spend, had never been either a bargainer, or a grasper, or a hoarder, and whose professional experience must have continually reminded him of the peril of meddling with invilling that could be construed into corruption-that he should have allowed himself on any account to accept money from suitors while their cases were before him is wonderful That he should have done it without feeling at the time that he was laying himself open to a charge of what in law would be called bribers is more wonderful still should have done it often, and not lived under an ab d ing sense of insecurity-from the consciousness that he had secrets to conceal, of which the disclosure would be fatal to his reputation, yet the safe keeping did not rest solely with himself—is most wonderful of all. Give him credit for nothing more than ordinary intelligence and ordinary prudence—wisdom for a man's self—and it seems almost incredible. And yet I believe it was the fact. The whole course of his behaviour, from the first ruinour to the final sentence, convinces me that not the discovery of the thing only, but the thing itself, came upon him as a surprise, and that if maybody had told him the day before that he stood in danger of a charge of taking bribes, he would have received the suggestion with unaffected incredulity. How far I am justified in thinking so, the reader shall judge for himself, for the impression is derived solely from the tenor of the correspondence.

Augustus de Morgan (1806-71), son of Colonel de Morgan of the Indian army, was born at Madura in the Madras Presidence, and brought up at Worcester and Faunton Educated it several private schools, he 'read algebra like a novel'-ordinary novels lie always devoured insatiably, but ifter four years at Trinity, Cambridge, he came out only fourth wrangler (1827) In consequence of his revolt from early evangelical training lie did not take orders, law proved dististeful, from 1828 to 1831 he was the first Professor of Mathematics in University College, London - 1 post he resumed in 1836-66, and he was secretary of the Astronomical Society (1831-38 and 1848-54) A mathematician of the first order, he was minutely versed in the history of the mathematical and physical sciences, he also devoted himself to the development of the Aristotelian or 'Formal' Logic His works include, besides books on arithmetic, algebra, trigonometra, numbers, logic, the famous Budget of Paradoxes (1872), reprinted from the Athenaum He also contributed largely to the Penny Cyclopadia (eight hundred and fifty articles) and many scientific The Memoir of lum (1882) is by his journals wife, Sophia Elizabeth Frend, who printed also her own Remuiscences (1895)

James Frederick Ferrier (1808-64) was born in Edinburgh His father was a brother of Miss Ferrier, the novelist (see page 300), his mother a sister of Christopher North He studied a while at Edinburgh, graduated BA at Oxford in 1831, and next year was admitted to the Scottish Bar, but never practised. An intimate friend of Sir William Hamilton, he studied philosophy seriously at Heidelberg and at home, and by 1840 was contributing to Blackwood's Magazine on philosophical subjects, some of his articles attracting much notice. In 1842 he became Pro fessor of History at Edinburgh, in 1845 of Moral Philosophy at St Andrews In his Institutes of Metaphysics (1854) he sought to construct a system of idealism in a series of propositions demonstrated somewhat after the manner of Euclid His rather thorough going idealism, his 'theory of knowing and being,' has little in common with Kantianism or Hegelianism, and though it professes to be Scottish, is inevitably opposed to Hamilton and ill the 'Scottish school,' with decided affinities to Berkeley. But Feirier belonged to no school and founded none. The Lectures on Greek Philosophy (1866) constituted a most attractively written and unusually luminous introduction to the subject. To these lectures his son in law, Sir Alexander Grant, prefixed a Life
